Save yourselves a lot of pain and anquish over our politicians and
the reality of life in Washington,
just forget about term limits, it
will never happen, just remember to limit their terms in office to 2 terms and vote them out regardless of whether you think their doing a good job....the lust for money in their pockets will eventually color their thinking
so out they go. If they were doing a good job, let them run again and vote them in.Do so whether they are Republicans or Democrats in the House or Senate.
We created this "monster" need of money and more money to get re-elected and the vultures out there know it, so let's wake up and smell the coffee....the ballot box
is your only option.

If a couple of Democratic Senators were indicted and convicted of bribery from the Abramoff scandal, do you think Harry Reid would push for their removal from the senate? Even, if it meant he would give his new postition as Majority leader in the Senate? This investigation is going nowhere. I would not be surprised in Abramoff found his "demise" by some con with a shank in the shower.

Why the "Rush" to prison? I mean, if Abramoff can dish the goods on more corrupt politicians, why put him away where he won't be as effective? I think the next two years ought to be very interesting.....Dirty Harry, Big John Murtha and others.. ....Gotta love it.....and I was in a depressed state.....I just hope that Abramoff is not taken out while he is the big house.

Abramoff has met with hundreds of people in Congress.Meeting with Abramoff by itself doesn't mean corruption, Dem or Rep. But if illegal gifts or bribery took place, the guilty parties should leave congress. We've got to be careful of a vindictive Abramoff who might lie to the FBI just to get less jail time.

Six Democratic Senators? Hmmm, same number of seats won? Coincidence? If true, let the chips fall where they may, but let's see the facts before we buy anything Abramoff tries to sells us. Known and convicted liars don't make reliable sources.

i am not a politician. i am an average American. funny how we assume politicians are all corrupt. guess what? they are people first just like the rest of us. it is not the occupation that dictates who they are. it is their character that matters. just like the way the big oil companies are criticized...as if they are these giant aliens of another being. they are corporations run by people...people just like us. Quit judging broadly your fellow Americans. If you are an honest good citizen then chances are most politicians are too.

Term limits are needed; they'll help the keep the corruption down on both sides.

Sorry if we "lose" some good leaders, but that's the price we must pay to "try" to keep our government clean.

Down with all bribe takers and givers.

Posted by: CPMJohin | Nov 14, 2006 6:11:40 PM

Why do we just keep hearing accusations of democrats being involved but no one ever names them?

I don't believe this is bi-partisan at all. If there were democrats involved we'd know their names like we do with the Republicans. Its easy to say democrats were involved but it doesn't seem so easy to say exactly who they are.

You think this is bs? You haven't seen it all yet. And realize there is more to come. When you finally do "get it", it will leave you shaking your heads. Ladies and gentlemen, it is going to be too late to do anything about it, even if you could do something.

Think about it, Doubtful: Abramoff "rewarded" Republicans; in most cases, they already agreed with him. But he "bribed" Democrats, who otherwise (presumably) would have opposed what he was selling. If you paid careful attention, the names of potential Democrat targets have been in the news. Their names have been downplayed by the media going into the election. But, watch: There will be at least three Democrat Senators whose "crimes" will match the ones that defeated Conrad Burns.

Look at Abramoff's staff. Some of Reid's top guys worked for Abramoff. The guy knew the system, and he played both sides. I'm betting at least two-three democratic senators are at least in as much hot water as Congressman Ney.

Posted by: wizbang | Nov 14, 2006 6:22:37 PM

Jack Abramoff has admitted in the past that he did not pay much attention to Democrats. Why should he have? The Democrats were not in power and could do nothing to help enrich him or his clients.

Someone has leaked this phony story for obvious reasons. Six to eight Democratic Senators? Give me a break. If there are corrupt Democratic Senators, please provide the evidence.

My goodness, Democrats took bribes too?! Shocking. NOT.

They're all politicians. It is in the nature of what they do that they must lie and be dirty dealing behind the scenes in order to accomplish anything. The only way out is to find some way to structure our elections in a way that money is not a factor. If you don't have to raise money, you're not beholden to any donor of funds, lobby group, industry, union, eco group, or anyone else. You're only obligated to those you represent.

Unfortunately I don't think I've yet heard a good idea of how to go about getting to the point where you don't have to be rich or bent over taking cash in order to get into office.

Of course Abramoff had to bribe Democrats. In fact, he probably had to bribe more Dems than Repubs. Since he was a Republican, most Repubs would be inclined to agree with his agenda and would not need to be bribed to go along with him. Democrats, on the other hand, would be opposed to what he wanted and would have to be bribed to go along.

Several Democrats in Congress are known to have accepted significant campaign contributions from entities associated with Abramoff. However Abramoff has been sentenced by a Florida state court so he would normally go to a Florida prison, which he almost certainly wants to avoid. If federal investigators can get Abramoff assigned to a federal prison instead, perhaps he will keep talking.

The recent exit polls where corruption was listed a top issue by voters must be encouraging to federal prosecutors, who are apparently in a public corruption unit where Attorney General Gonzalez has been unable to protect Congressional Republicans.

Posted by: Chris Baker | Nov 14, 2006 7:11:55 PM

First, we ought to congratulate Mr.Ross and Ms Schwartz for impartiality. Too many times The Blotter has been accused of siding with the Democrats or the other way around.

Second, the posters so far have stayed off the partisan path-- only one has expressed some doubt as to the timing of Abramoff's disclosure and it is not hard to see why. But the fact that the vast majority here is for the need to clean up, regardless of political make up of the cesspool, deserves yet another slap on the back.

Third, my own opinion is that the corruption has to be stopped. The best way to do it is by a non partisan approach, indeed.

And let the chips fall as they may!

If America ever needed a united front, this is it. The next will come so much easier. Be it sorting the mess in Iraq or real fight against the other common enemy which is terrorism, or the urgently needed change in foreign policy, the start of cleaning up the American government is the right priority if all the other problems are to have a chance to be solved.

University Urged To Take Ney's Name Off Building (USAT)

By Dennis Cauchon

USA Today, November 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0094475

First, Bob Ney lost his job as a congressman. Now, he's on his way to losing another classic political honor — having a building named after him.

Ney, a six-term Republican from Ohio, will be sentenced Jan. 7 for his role in providing favors to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Ohio University has begun the process of removing Ney's name from the Robert W. Ney Center for Health and Physical Education at its campus in St. Clairsville, near the West Virginia border.

The building was named after Ney in 1997 because, as a state senator, he helped secure the $5.5 million in state funding to construct it.

The building has a 3,300-seat gymnasium, a fitness center, bookstore and cafeteria. It's the meeting place on the small campus of 600 commuter students.

"We haven't heard a lot of talk, but what we've heard supports removing the name," says Charles Bird, the vice president in charge of the university's regional campuses.

On Monday, a university advisory council of local leaders, headed by a judge, urged removing Ney's name.

Bird says the recommendation will be given to the university trustees at their meeting Dec. 1. A call and an e-mail to Ney's attorney were not returned.

James Harris, who lost to Ney in the Republican primary in May, has one word for erasing Ney's name: "Good."

"I have no interest in kicking someone who is down for the count, but on this small matter, taking his name down and moving forward is understandable," Harris says. "His corruption undercut the Republican message of restraining government spending."

However, the fallen congressman gets some sympathy from an unlikely source: Gregory DiDonato, whom Ney narrowly defeated in his first congressional race in 1994.

"I'd be cautious about taking away the legitimate credit someone earned, by removing a name. He played a major role in the project. Nothing can undo that," says DiDonato, who later became a Democratic leader in the Ohio Senate.

If the trustees decide to remove Ney's name, the task won't take long. "We'll take the letters out of the masonry and fill the holes," says Ohio University architect Richard Shultz. "A new name will probably go up some day."

Federal Panel Begins Hearings On Curbing Prison Rape (AP)

By Don Thompson, Associated Press

AP, November 15, 2006

FOLSOM – Thomas Clinton says he and six of the other 10 homosexuals in his cell block were raped in prison.

National prison officials and experts on Tuesday said they have no idea if the 36-year-old Los Angeles man's experience is typical. They are only now beginning studies to see how widespread sexual assault and consensual sex are behind bars.

Spurred by a 2003 federal law, the U.S. Department of Justice's new Review Panel on Prison Rape began two days of hearings Tuesday at California's Folsom Prison to learn what the country's largest state prison system is doing about the problem.

It is the start of a monthslong national effort to find how many prison inmates are victims of sexual assault and how to deter the attacks.

"We don't know to what extent the problem exists," the federal rape panel's chairman, Steve McFarland, said in an interview.

Reports of assaults "may be just the tip of the iceberg. We haven't a clue," said McFarland, who also directs the Justice Department's Task Force for Faith-Based and Community Initiatives.

Congress, in passing the federal rape law, cited estimates that 13 percent of inmates are assaulted nationwide. The federal Bureau of Justice Statistics, in a 1997 survey, put the incidence at less than 1 percent.

California legislative researchers found 4.4 percent of California inmates reported assaults in 2000, compared to 4 percent in Florida, 2.5 percent in Texas, 2.3 percent in New York and 1.7 percent in federal penitentiaries. But reporting methods vary so widely that the figures are useless, McFarland said.

For Clinton, the assaults began soon after he was sent to prison in California on a drug charge in October 2003.

"I was stabbed and cut because a skinhead wanted me to 'service' a lifer (inmate serving a life sentence) for some cigarettes," Clinton said in an interview before testifying under oath Tuesday.

He said he was attacked with a knife after he refused to perform the sex act.

Clinton said he was later raped by another inmate in a shower at an inmate firefighters' camp near Susanville in November 2004.

"'Maybe you deserve to be raped because you choose to be homosexual in prison.' I was told that many times by guards," said Clinton, who has since been released and is suing the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation in federal court in Sacramento over his treatment.

But McFarland said California is at the national forefront of prison rape prevention efforts. A 2005 state law requires a statistical study of sexual coercion, along with training programs, posters, brochures and videos to raise awareness of the problem.

The federal Bureau of Justice Statistics is starting its own scientific sampling of inmates nationwide in state and federal prisons, county and city jails and juvenile facilities.

The goal of the federal survey is to identify, by July, the best and worst facilities as far as the number of rapes, as well as consensual sex among inmates and between inmates and employees.

The federal review panel will then examine what the prisons and jails are doing right and wrong to prevent rapes and discourage consensual sex, and make recommendations to an eight-member National Prison Rape Elimination Act Commission, said McFarland.

The commission will then recommend rape prevention policies to prisons nationwide.

Two MS-13 Members Are Convicted Of Racketeering (WP)

By Ruben Castaneda

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

In the first major victory for federal prosecutors in a sweeping legal assault on MS-13 in Maryland, a federal jury in Greenbelt yesterday convicted two members of the violent Latino street gang of criminal racketeering.

Edgar Alberto Ayala, known as "Pony," 29, and Oscar Ramos Velasquez, 21, known as "Casper," both Salvadoran immigrants, were found guilty of conspiracy to commit murder to further the racketeering enterprise.

The racketeering prosecution is part of an investigative and legal offensive begun by federal authorities last year against a gang that as recently as five years ago was little known outside law enforcement circles and the neighborhoods it operates in.

Locally, law enforcement officials have attributed dozens of homicides and nonfatal assaults in recent years to MS-13 members in suburban Maryland, Northern Virginia and, to a lesser extent, the District. Nationwide, federal officials have formed an MS-13 task force, which began operating last year out of FBI headquarters.

The jury's decision, reached during five days of deliberations, means that both men are eligible for a maximum possible sentence of life in prison without parole.

The defendants were among 22 in Maryland charged more than a year ago under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act. The RICO indictment alleges that members of MS-13, a gang also known as Mara Salvatrucha, killed six people and attempted to kill four others between April 2003 and June 2005 in Prince George's and Montgomery counties.

Eight of the attacks were in Prince George's, and two were in Montgomery, in neighborhoods that hug the border between the counties. In addition, federal prosecutors presented evidence that Ayala participated in the fatal shooting of a Fairfax County teenager.

Ayala and Velasquez showed no emotion as the guilty verdicts were read.

Ayala's relatives and Gary A. Ticknor, his attorney, declined to comment. According to evidence presented by the government, Ayala was a leader of one of the local MS-13 cliques.

Velasquez's attorney, Richard C. Bittner, repeated a theme yesterday that he set forth in his opening and closing arguments -- that being a member of a violent gang does not make a person guilty of that group's actions.

"If the pope was in the Nazi youth, was he responsible for the Holocaust? No," Bittner said. "I haven't seen anyone say he [Velasquez] planned a murder, participated in a murder or was present when a murder occurred."

Maryland U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein said "chilling" evidence presented by federal prosecutors showed that MS-13 members live by the motto "kill, rape and control."

"We hope this conviction sends a message to them and their conspirators," Rosenstein said.

At least four onetime members of MS-13 testified for the government about the gang's inner workings and about attacks carried out by gang members.

One of the most important witnesses was Noe "Shorty" Cruz, a former MS-13 member who wore a wire to a handful of gang meetings and called his police handler to tip him off about planned attacks and the location of firearms in the homes of gang members.

Cruz agreed to become an informant after meeting with Prince George's police Detective Felipe Ordo?o, who is a member of a local-federal anti-gang task force. Cruz said he was disgruntled because the gang had killed one of his friends, who was also an MS-13 member, and because fellow gang members criticized him for not attending enough meetings.

For nearly three years, Cruz risked his life by gathering evidence against members, who, he testified, would have cut out his tongue and killed him if they had discovered his actions.

Cruz is now in the federal witness protection program and has been moved to another state. Rosenstein praised the work of county police in identifying gang members and persuading some to cooperate with the government. The investigation was led by agents with the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

Federal prosecutors presented evidence that MS-13, made up primarily of immigrants from El Salvador and other Latin American countries, is not just a typical street gang but an international criminal conspiracy.

For example, members in Maryland receive directions from MS-13 leaders in El Salvador, local MS-13 gang members pay dues at meetings, and some of that money is sent to gang leaders in El Salvador, according to government witnesses.

Before the trial began, three MS-13 gang members named in the indictment pleaded guilty to racketeering or related charges. Seventeen defendants await trial on racketeering charges.

U.S. District Judge Deborah K. Chasanow scheduled sentencing for Ayala and Velasquez for Feb. 23.

DOJ Allowed To Examine Some Jefferson Papers (RC)

By John Bresnahan And Tory Newmyer

Roll Call, November 15, 2006

With the corruption investigation of Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) stalled for the last several months by a legal battle, a federal appeals court on Tuesday ordered Jefferson's lawyers to begin turning over some documents to the Department of Justice.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit also set a briefing schedule for its review of whether the May 20 FBI raid on Jefferson's Capitol Hill office was constitutional.

The briefing schedule signals that Jefferson's legal challenge to the raid is likely to continue into next summer or even well into the fall, although legal experts believe that Tuesday's order by the court could provide the Justice Department with a "face-saving" means of indicting Jefferson before the appeals court issues a ruling.

It is still unlikely, however, that Jefferson will be indicted before the end of the year, according to legal experts — good news for the embattled incumbent who faces a tough slog in his Louisiana runoff election. Jefferson finished first in his New Orleans-based open primary but garnered only 30 percent of the vote in a field crowded with a dozen challengers.

Tuesday's order by the appeals court means that federal prosecutors finally can begin to review documents recovered during the nighttime raid, which have been sealed since late May. Justice Department officials will receive any documents over which Jefferson's team does not claim constitutional "Speech or Debate" privilege. Chief District Judge Thomas Hogan will continue to review the remaining documents.

Federal prosecutors originally were set to wait until Hogan had ruled on all the materials before they could review any of them, according to a July ruling by the same court. Jefferson's legal team has sought to block prosecutors from looking at the documents from the raid until the appeals court ruled on the propriety of the FBI search.

Nigerian Vice President Atiku Abubakar was charged last month with more than a dozen counts of corruption in the case for allegedly receiving more than $4.6 million in bribes to divert public money to private interests.

One of Jefferson's former aides and a Kentucky businessman — Vernon Jackson, chairman and CEO of iGate Inc. — have already received lengthy prison sentences for their roles in the scandal.

Jefferson has so far proclaimed his own innocence, although FBI agents last year videotaped him allegedly accepting $100,000 in marked bills from an informant. A search of Jefferson's home several days later reportedly turned up $90,000 of the marked cash in the lawmaker's freezer.

Court Order May Delay Jefferson Investigation (NOTP)

By Bruce Alpert And Bill Walsh, Washington bureau

New Orleans Times-Picayune, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON —In an order that could delay the government's decision on whether to indict Rep. William Jefferson, a three-judge panel has put off until at least the spring a final decision on legal challenges to some documents taken in a historic raid of the congressman's Capitol Hill office last May.

While the U.S. Court of Appeals for Washington D.C., said that the Justice Department can immediately begin examining those documents and computer files not challenged by Jefferson and his attorneys, it is the disputed documents that are expected to be most critical to the government's 20-month probe into allegations of bribery and corruption. Jefferson has denied wrongdoing and has not been charged in the investigation that has netted guilty pleas from two of his former associates.

"I can't imagine that the (unchallenged) documents would yield anything of value to the government," said Carl Tobias, a constitutional law expert at the University of Richmond.

The ruling will likely force another delay in the case, which began in March 2005 and has stalled over the question of whether the search of the congressional office breached the separation between the executive and legislative branches.

Justice Department officials could decide that the additional delay in the investigation it hoped to wrap up shortly after its May 20-21 raid of Jefferson's office is unacceptable and move forward based on evidence it has already collected in the case. But that would make it harder for the agency to justify what was a highly controversial raid of Jefferson's office, drawing charges of overreach by the top Republican and Democrat in the House of Representatives.

Justice Department officials refused comment Tuesday on the Court of Appeals ruling by Judges David Sentielle, Karen Henderson and David Tatel. The three judges ordered that briefs in the case be filed between Feb. 28 and April 13, with oral arguments scheduled for sometime after the last brief is filed.

Robert Trout, Jefferson's attorney, said that the ruling reflects "the continuing respect by the judges for the importance of the speech or debate privilege and we appreciate that." The speech or debate clause was intended by the framers of the Constitution to promote the separation of powers between the three branches of the federal government by shielding lawmakers from harassment in the discharge of their duties.

Jefferson, who is seeking reelection in a Dec. 9 runoff against fellow Democrat Karen Carter, did not comment on the ruling.

Jonathan Turley, a constitutional law professor at George Washington University who has been critical of the raid of Jefferson's office, said that it "triggered an unnecessary constitutional crisis and served to delay any indictment to Jefferson's obvious advantage."

Although the Appeals Court panel said that the Justice Department can gain immediate access to the seized material not challenged by his lawyers, a process will still need to be worked out to accomplish that. By court order, Jefferson's lawyers have been raising objections to certain material in closed hearings before Chief U.S. District Court Judge Thomas Hogan.

No one outside of Jefferson's lawyers, Jefferson and Hogan know which material has been challenged, and what material has not been and therefore can be turned over to the Justice Department investigators.

Trout said that he won't stand in the way of turning over the material and will work out a process with the Justice Department. "We are in the process of complying with the court's order," he said.

John Harrison, a constitutional law expert at the University of Virginia, said that Jefferson's lawyers probably don't want to overplay their hands.

"Jefferson's lawyers will most strongly resist release of the documents that are most unfavorable to their client, but their argument is based on the Speech or Debate clause privilege including, I think, the claim that even going through documents to find those that aren't privileged is impermissible," he said.

The investigation of Jefferson began March 15, 2005, when an investor in a Western African technology project championed by Jefferson went to the FBI complaining that she may have been defrauded of a multimillion dollar investment. In July 2005, the government secretly recorded the witness, Lori Mody, giving Jefferson $100,000 that the congressman, according to the FBI, suggested would be used to bribe the vice president of Nigeria to advance the project. All but $10,000 of the cash was later found in the freezer of Jefferson's Washington, D.C. home.

The probe has netted guilty pleas from two former Jefferson associates, including Vernon Jackson, the head of iGate Inc., who said in court documents that he paid more $400,000 to a company controlled by Jefferson's family in return for the congressman's help getting telecommunications contracts in Nigeria and Ghana.

Mob Boss James "Whitey" Bulger Spotted In San Diego (KFMB)

KFMB-TV, November 15, 2006

The News 8 CrimeFighters are on a manhunt for a notorious Boston mob boss who was spotted in San Diego. James "Whitey" Bulger has a $1 million reward on his head.

He is one of the most high-profile fugitives in America, second only to Osama bin Laden on the FBI's 10 Most Wanted list.

Bulger is a master of disguise. His nickname "Whitey" comes from his long blonde hair when he was a kid.

On the run for the past 11 years, Bulger was spotted here in San Diego, catching a screening of the gangster movie "The Departed" at a theater in Horton Plaza. In the movie, Jack Nicholson's mob boss character is based on "Whitey" Bulger. The matinee was playing at the UA Theatres in Horton Plaza on Friday, October 6.

A law enforcement officer says he spotted Bulger in the crowd, and followed him to a trolley stop at Fifth Avenue and C Street downtown, before losing him. Sources confirm the FBI grabbed surveillance video from both the mall and the movie theater.

While the FBI says it's a non-credible sighting, sources who viewed the surveillance tape say one agent remarked out loud, "that's him" when the suspect appeared in the video.

The man was wearing a white fisherman's hat with a floppy rim, dark sunglasses and a windbreaker. Bulger is known to wear hats and sunglasses in public, and carries a knife at all times.

Over the years, he has been spotted in at least eight states, and 19 different countries. He's under indictment in Boston for 18 organized crime murders, possession of machine guns, extortion and money laundering. In March, prosecutors released a decades-old surveillance video of Bulger, hoping someone might recognize him.

Bulger served nine years in prison for robbing banks in the 1950s. For nearly 20 years, he operated as an FBI informant, feeding information to the feds on rival wise guys, while at the same time leading his own South Boston crime ring.

It was a Boston FBI agent who tipped Bulger off to the pending indictment against him in 1995. That agent was later sent to prison.

Bulger is believed to be hiding out with his longtime girlfriend, 55-year-old Catherine Greig. Both fugitives use fake names, enjoy playing with dogs, and may be living near the beach.

If you have seen Bulger, do not approach him. He is extremely dangerous. Call the San Diego FBI office at (858) 565-1255.

Agent Claims He Saw Whitey On Surveillance Tape (CBS4BOS)

CBS 4 Boston, November 15, 2006

(CBS4) BOSTON There is a new lead in the hunt for Whitey Bulger coming on the heels of the reports that he was seen in southern California.

An FBI agent believes he spotted the fugitive mob boss on surveillance tape.

Could it really be Bulger at the movies? Watching a movie with a Jack Nicholson character based on him -- an Irish mob boss from South Boston?

A sighting of this master of disguise was first reported at a movie theatre in San Diego where "The Departed" opened on October 6.

A police officer claims he spotted Bulger in the crowd and followed him to a nearby trolley stop before losing him.

Sources tell our San Diego affiliate that the FBI grabbed surveillance video from both the movie theatre and the surrounding mall and one agent remarked out loud "that's him" when the suspect appeared on the tape.

The man was wearing a white fisherman's hat with a floppy rim, dark sunglasses and a windbreaker. Bulger is known to wear hats and sunglasses in public.

On the run for 11 years, Bulger has been spotted in at least eight states and 19 countries. Back in March, prosecutors released decades-old surveillance video of Bulger hoping to trigger someone's memory.

If he was able to catch a screening here, it seems he took a look in the mirror and is on the run again.

The FBI here in Boston isn't shedding any light on this new claim from a San Diego agent that it could, in fact, be Bulger.

They'll only say the Bulger investigation remains a high priority and they follow up on any and all leads.

Currently, there is a $1 million reward for Bulger's arrest. He's second only to Osama bin Laden on the FBI's ten most wanted list.

Report: Feds Seize 'Whitey' Theatre Tapes (BOSH)

Boston Herald, November 15, 2006

The FBI seized videotapes from the theater where an off-duty San Diego cop possibly spotted fugitive mob boss James "Whitey" Bulger exiting from after watching the Boston-based crime movie "The Departed," according to a news report.

On Oct. 8 or 9, an off-duty San Diego police officer, who sources say was originally from the Boston area, spotted the Bulger lookalike leaving a theater and boarding a trolley bound for the Mexican border, the Herald reported last week.

Yesterday, San Diego TV station KFMB reported the FBI had seized security tapes from the theater and the mall where the off-duty cop sighted the Bulger lookalike.

When agents viewed the tapes, the station reported that one exclaimed, "That's him," referring to a man wearing a fisherman's cap and sunglasses.

Bulger is wanted for 19 murders.

Gail Marcinkiewicz, spokeswoman for the Boston FBI office, which is leading the task force to hunt down Bulger, said last night she could not confirm that agents seized the tapes.

"I would assume that they would," she said.

April Langwell, spokeswoman for the FBI's San Diego's office, said earlier yesterday they have yet to confirm that Bulger was spotted leaving the cinema.

"It would be exciting to capture him, but for right now, it was just considered non-credible information," she said.

However, several sources have told the Herald the FBI is taking the sighting seriously.

Former Driving School Owner Sentenced For Bribing Officials (TENN)

By Christian Bottorff, Staff writer

The Tennessean, November 15, 2006

The former owner of a Murfreesboro driving school was sentenced to six years in prison for bribing employees of the Tennessee Department of Safety to help customers, federal prosecutors announced Tuesday.

The sentencing follows a guilty plea entered in July by Bryan Guess to three public corruption charges related to bribes he paid the Tennessee Department of Safety, according to a press release issued by the Office of the United States Attorney for the Middle District of Tennessee.

Guess had faced a maximum of 15 years in prison after pleading guilty in July. His arrest was part of Operation Crooked Highway, a multi-agency investigation that resulted in six people charged with bribery and conspiracy.

Guess was the former owner of Winchester Driving School, which was in the same building as the driver's examination center on Samsonite Boulevard.

In return for the bribes paid by Guess, state Department of Safety examiners provided favors such as helping Guess's customers pass written and vision tests required to obtain drivers' licenses and overlooking proof-of-residency documents, officials said.

Guess admitted the value of the driver's licenses and certificates his customers received exceeded $400,000. He forfeited more than $162,000 he earned as part of the scheme.

Guess pled guilty to one conspiracy count and two substantive counts of bribing public employees.

Manhattan: No Trace Of Missing Goya (NYT)

By Anthony Ramirez

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

The F.B.I. yesterday said it had no updates on the theft of a painting by Goya that was being trucked to an exhibition opening on Friday at the Solomon R. Guggenheim Museum. On Monday, authorities said little about the theft of "Children with a Cart," painted in 1778. Jerri Williams, a special agent and spokeswoman for the F.B.I.'s Philadelphia office, elaborated yesterday by saying the painting was found to be missing near Scranton, Pa., on Nov. 9 while the truck was unattended. "The people who were transporting it stopped for a break," she said, "and the painting was taken from the vehicle." Anyone with information was urged to call the F.B.I. at (215) 418-4000.

ABC News' The Blotter, November 15, 2006

A million dollar masterpiece being transported to New York's Guggenheim art museum was stolen in transit, when the artwork was "left unattended" in the transport vehicle somewhere in the Scranton, Pa., area last week, FBI officials tell ABC News.

The insurer has offered a $50,000 reward for information leading to the recovery of the painting by the Spanish artist Goya, "Children with a Cart," which was being sent from the Toledo Museum of Art to New York's Guggenheim Museum for a special art exhibit set to open this Friday.

"It appears that the person or persons involved knew what they were doing," a FBI spokesperson told ABC News. But the spokesperson added, "There is no reason to believe the people transporting the artwork were involved."

A statement issued by the Guggenheim Museum said the painting "was in the care of a professional art transport provider."

The Philadelphia FBI office is leading the investigation and asks that persons with information regarding the painting contact them directly at (215) 418-4000.

FBI Says 1778 Goya Was Stolen (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 15, 2006

Federal officials yesterday asked the public's help finding a valuable painting and the thieves who stole it as it was traveling through Pennsylvania.

The 1778 painting - Children with a Cart by Francisco José de Goya y Lucientes - was taken while in the care of a professional art transport provider last week. At the time, the painting was traveling through the Scranton area en route from Toledo, Ohio, to New York, according to an FBI statement issued yesterday.

The insurer of the painting is offering a reward of up to $50,000 for information leading to the recovery of the painting, the FBI said.

Anyone with information on the painting is asked to contact the Philadelphia Division of the FBI at 215-418-4000 or another FBI office.

The Baby Godfather (NYDN)

By John Marzulli, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, November 15, 2006

The Bonanno crime family has tapped a man of steel to rebuild its crumbling empire, the Daily News has learned.

He's Salvatore (Sal the Ironworker) Montagna, the newly minted boss of the Mafia family, according to law enforcement sources - and he's practically a bambino at only 35 years of age.

The Sicilian-born Montagna and his wife, Francesca, own a small ironworks company in Brooklyn, but they show no signs of living the high-life of a Mafia don.

The couple and their three daughters live in a modest ranch house in working-class Elmont, L.I., not far from the Queens border.

"Putting someone that young and relatively unknown in charge indicates that they're desperately seeking to salvage the remnants of the family from the recent prosecutions and convictions," said Mark Feldman, former chief of organized crime for the Brooklyn U.S. attorney's office.

Feldman said the move clearly "signals desperation" on the part of a mob family that has seen three bosses and acting dons bite the dust in three years.

Most noteworthy was the conviction of longtime family boss Joseph Massino, who is now serving life in prison.

Last night, a teenage girl answered the door of Montagna's vinyl-sided home on Oakley Ave. and said the reputed crime kingpin was not at home.

Two little sisters stood at her side. Outside, a small construction crew was wrapping up its day working on Montagna's brick driveway.

A short time later, Francesca Montagna drove up in a late-model Lexus SUV and turned angry when asked if her husband was the new head of the Bonanno family.

"I don't know what you're talking about," said the dark- haired woman, dressed in a sweatsuit. "I have kids in here. It's not appropriate for you to be here."

Until now, Montagna has rarely appeared on the radar of the NYPD and the feds, and neighbors said they knew nothing about any reputed mob ties. Still, the Mafia talk didn't worry them.

"Am I scared?" said one local. "Absolutely not. I come from Brooklyn. Believe me, when you live next to one of these people, there's nothing to be afraid of."

Another neighbor found the suggestion "ridiculous," but quickly added, "We'd be shocked and scared at the same time if that is true. Wow!"

The Montagnas run the family-owned Matrix Steel Co. on Bogart St. in Brooklyn. According to Dun & Bradstreet, the firm supplies structural material for builders and reported a modest $1.5 million in sales last year.

In 2003, Montagna pleaded guilty to criminal contempt charges and was sentenced to probation for refusing to answer questions before a Manhattan grand jury.

He had been indicted a year earlier after a probe by the Manhattan district attorney's office as one of 20 wiseguys charged in a takedown of a Mafia crew allegedly involved in gambling, loansharking and weapons possession.

Whether the new Bonanno boss has any other arrests was unclear yesterday.

"He's well-liked by the rank and file," said an underworld source, adding that Montagna is also known as Sal the Zip, a reference to the name bestowed on members of the crime family's Sicilian wing.

Sources said Montagna was close to legendary Bonanno gangster Baldassare (Baldo) Amato, another immigrant from near Castellammare del Golfo in Sicily, and served in the crew of capo Patrick (Patty from the Bronx) DeFilippo.

Those guys are largely history now, with Amato recently sentenced to life in prison and DeFilippo facing a retrial on murder charges.

Led by Assistant U.S. Attorney Greg Andres, the feds have indicted and convicted more than 70 Bonanno gangsters since 2002, leaving behind about 75 shell-shocked members on the street. Sources said Montagna's promotion couldn't have happened without the blessing of Vincent (Vinny Gorgeous) Basciano, who once operated Hello Gorgeous, a hair salon in the Bronx, and became the official boss of the crime family after Massino turned rat.

Thomas Reppetto, author of the just-published "Bringing Down The Mob: A War Against the American Mafia (Henry Holt)," said the new breed of boss pales in comparison to past godfathers like the late John Gotti or Vincent Gigante.

"There may no longer be a boss in the sense that we understood the term, an all-powerful figure at the top, because naming an official boss provides the FBI with a clear target," Reppetto said.

JHU Student's Killer Gets Life Term (BSUN)

By Julie Bykowicz And Dan Thanh Dang

The Baltimore Sun, November 15, 2006

The high school dropout and transient Baltimore restaurant worker ingratiated himself into a social circle of Johns Hopkins students. But all the while, he was honing his burglary skills near the prestigious university, lifting little things, such as music play ers, coins and even food from the students' refrigerators.

It was late Jan. 22, 2005, when Donta Maurice Allen broke into the Charles Village apartment that Linda Trinh shared with two other women, a botched burglary that, prosecutors said Tuesday, led to Allen's choking and beating Trinh and leaving her face down in her bathtub.

Allen, 28, pleaded guilty Tuesday in Baltimore Circuit Court to first-degree murder, securing a life sentence with the possibility of parole. He is to be sentenced in January.

Until Tuesday, which was to be the first day of trial, city prosecutors had sought life without the possibility of parole.

Trinh's parents, Vietnamese immigrants, said after the hearing that they were thankful to avoid a trial. They said the plea spares them what would have been a daily, heart-heavy journey from their home in Silver Spring to Baltimore to file into the courthouse.

"We thank God that we didn't have a trial," said Hoan Thi Trinh, Linda's mother. "It would kill us a little more every day to hear the details."

More than a dozen of Trinh's relatives and friends sat silently Tuesday on the courtroom benches. When Trinh's father saw Allen, for the first time, he felt neither hate nor forgiveness, he said later.

Allen is remorseful, his lawyer said.

During and after the court hearing, the prosecutor and defense attorney gave the first in-depth explanation of how and why the promising student, a 21-year-old biomedical engineering major with dozens of friends, died.

Allen didn't think anyone was home that January night, one of the final days of winter break, but there was Trinh, wearing only a T-shirt and bra, said defense attorney Warren A. Brown.

He tried to assure the terrified woman that he wasn't there to sexually assault her, Brown said.

Clutching her roommate's cell phone, Trinh said she was going to call the police. Allen tried to dissuade her, but she kept threatening to make the call, Brown said.

Their "argument soon escalated to a physical confrontation," Assistant State's Attorney Matthew Fraling said in court. He began to hit her, and she scratched him on the left side of his neck.

He beat her and choked her with his hands, Fraling said. She was left in two inches of standing water in the bathtub. The cell phone was there, too.

According to the medical examiner's report, there were signs that Trinh might have been alive when she went into the tub. There was no evidence of sexual assault, the report says.

Neither Fraling nor Brown elaborated on how the bathtub fitted in to the crime scene, or whether Allen had tried to stage a suicide or accident.

"I don't want to get into the gory details," Brown said.

Another mystery of the crime scene was the timing of a maintenance worker's visit to Trinh's apartment that night.

DOJ_NMG_0094484

Smelling natural gas, other residents had summoned maintenance. Fraling said a worker arrived at the apartment about 10 p.m. He found the gas of the stove on but the pilot lights out, Fraling said. He also found a candle burning on the stovetop, Fraling said.

He did not find Trinh, who by then was dead. One of her roommates found her body the next day.

Crucial clues

When Allen left the apartment, he took several purses, Fraling said. But he behind crucial clues. Security tapes show Allen in the building, and skin cells under Trinh's fingernails contained Allen's DNA, Fraling said.

Allen was arrested and charged in March 2005, and he gave police a taped statement admitting that he was in Trinh's apartment on the night of her death.

In court Tuesday, Allen, tall, lanky and closely shaven, showed no outward emotion, though he was escorted out briefly after saying he felt ill.

Brown said his client is "racked with guilt. He did not intend for this to happen."

Allen, Brown said, had been pilfering from the apartments of Trinh and other students "only when he knew people weren't there."

Allen grew up in Cherry Hill, but his family moved frequently. He attended Perry Hall High School but dropped out in 1998. He later earned a General Education Development diploma. At one point, he has said, he was hospitalized after attempting suicide.

In the months before Trinh was killed, Allen worked in bars and restaurants near the Hopkins campus. Students befriended him, but some called him "Mr. Sketchy" behind his back.

Allen pleaded guilty because he felt remorse, Brown said, and because "he doesn't want to die in jail. The plea will allow him to one day come home."

Under state law, Allen's life sentence means he will be eligible for parole in about 11 1/2 years, said Thomas Pennewell, program manager for hearings with the state parole commission.

Before obtaining parole, an inmate must convince a majority of the 10 parole commissioners and the governor that he is fit to return to society, Pennewell said.

The release of any inmate serving a life sentence is subject to the governor's approval. Gov. Parris N. Glendening had a no-parole policy for lifers, and Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. has paroled them rarely.

It was unclear why city prosecutors abandoned their plan to pursue life without parole for Allen. Noting the January sentencing hearing, neither Fraling nor Deputy State's Attorney Cynthia Jones would comment.

Brown said prosecutors might have wanted to avoid "a circus." Brown, known for courtroom showmanship and a fiery delivery, said he would have raised issues of class and town-gown tension during a trial.

Trinh's was one of two homicides in less than a year near the Hopkins campus of 4,000 undergraduates.

Early one morning in April 2004, Christopher B. Elser, 20, a junior from South Carolina, was stabbed to death in an apartment building on the southwest corner of St. Paul and 30th streets. Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity rented that building.

Police have never made an arrest in that case, though they have said the apparent motive was burglary.

Security bolstered

Hopkins has beefed up security in Charles Village since those killings.

In addition to increased foot patrols by campus security and off-duty police officers, the university has installed 88 closed-circuit television cameras on and around campus, officials said.

The university thinks the increased security has deterred crime. "But it's impossible to say whether that kind of presence would have made any difference in either of these cases," said Hopkins spokesman Dennis O'Shea.

A former president of her Alpha Phi sorority, Trinh was active socially and academically.

The last couple of years have been hard on the Trinh family. Every day since Linda was buried, the family has visited the Roman Catholic church near their home to pray for strength and that their pain will pass.

On Sundays, they visit her grave and pray that her soul rests in peace.

"We've lost Linda," said Quy Van Minh, Linda's father. "But we carry her in our hearts forever."

Linda's older brother, Quang Minh Trinh, did not attend Tuesday's hearing.

"There were two," Quy said. "Brother and sister. And now there is one. He cannot bear it. He does not want to be reminded of how she died."

As the family gathered to drive back home, Quy and Hoan discussed Allen's life sentence and thought about what they will say at the sentencing hearing, scheduled for Jan. 8.

"Whether he gets 10 years, 50 years or 100 years, it will not bring Linda back," Quy said. "When we saw him for the first time today, we felt nothing. We did not feel hate. We did not feel anger or forgiveness. We don't know how to feel.

"We just know that we will support whatever the justice system decides to do. We will not ask for more time or for less. We just want it to be fair."

'This Is Not A Cold Case,' F.B.I. Says 5 Years After Prosecutor's Killing (NYT)

By Jessica Kowal

SEATTLE, Nov. 14 — A failed polygraph test by a gun collector. Handwriting samples from a chief suspect. A daughter's plea for the public's help. These three strands have breathed new life into the stalled five-year investigation of a federal prosecutor's killing here.

The prosecutor, Thomas C. Wales, 49, an assistant United States attorney, was shot to death on Oct. 11, 2001, as he sat typing at his computer in his basement. Someone standing in Mr. Wales's secluded backyard fired through a window, hitting him in the neck and torso, investigators have said. A neighbor told reporters at the time that she had seen a man stride from the scene, climb into his car and speed away.

No one has been charged with the crime, which the authorities say appears to have been premeditated because of its precision and the paltry evidence left behind. If Mr. Wales was murdered in retaliation for his work, he would be the first federal prosecutor killed in the line of duty.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation, which has offered a $1 million reward for information leading to a conviction, says it has interviewed about 4,000 people and followed 10,000 leads in 50 states and several Eastern European countries.

But there was a strong sense in Seattle that the case was stuck. The authorities used the fifth anniversary of the shooting to raise the profile of the investigation and even urged Mr. Wales's son and daughter to ask the public for help in solving the crime.

"I wholly encourage anyone who has information to come forward, to be brave, and to provide a measure of justice to the system," his daughter, Amy Wales, said in a recent interview in a coffee shop near her father's house. At 27, she looks prematurely worn by what she calls his "shattering" death.

Robert Geeslin, the F.B.I. agent who is supervising the investigation, said, "This is not a cold case."

Forensic tests conducted soon after the killing identified the weapon as an inexpensive semiautomatic Makarov handgun, one of millions produced in Soviet-bloc countries and China, Agent Geeslin said. The gun had been refitted with an American-made stainless-steel replacement barrel, one of 3,600 sold in the United States.

Since then, the F.B.I. has focused on its "Makarov project," a search for these silver-colored barrels. The bureau has located about 1,800 of them, Agent Geeslin said.

One person on the Makarov list is a gun collector, Albert Kwan, who lives in a Seattle suburb, Bellevue. Mr. Kwan's lawyer, Joseph Conte of Washington, D.C., said that the F.B.I. apparently thought Mr. Kwan bought two gun barrels a decade ago, but that Mr. Kwan remembered buying only one. Mr. Kwan's collection of several hundred weapons includes eight Makarov pistols, Mr. Conte said.

In September, the United States Attorney's office here indicted Mr. Kwan on one count of illegal possession of a machine gun. Mr. Conte said the agency told him that it would consider dropping the charge if Mr. Kwan testified before a grand jury investigating Mr. Wales's killing and passed a polygraph test.

Mr. Kwan took the polygraph last week, his lawyer said, adding that the government told him his client had failed two questions, whether he bought two gun barrels and where the second one is.

"My interpretation is that he didn't give the government the answers they wanted," Mr. Conte said.

Before the polygraph, F.B.I. officials did not characterize Mr. Kwan as someone who was likely to provide a major break in the case. This week, the F.B.I. would not comment about Mr. Kwan or the polygraph results. Bill Redkey, an assistant United States attorney here, said Mr. Kwan was likely to go to trial on the machine-gun charge in March.

Mr. Conte said the F.B.I. erroneously thought Mr. Kwan might have provided a gun barrel to a chief suspect, a commercial airline pilot. Mr. Wales indicted the pilot and three business partners on conspiracy and fraud charges in 2000.

In 2001, the government dismissed the charges against the pilot and his partners after their company pleaded guilty to federal criminal violations related to the sale of a military helicopter and paid a fine.

Soon after, the pilot sued the government to recoup his legal fees, saying he was the victim of a "bad faith" prosecution. Four months later, Mr. Wales was killed. The pilot's lawsuit was ultimately dismissed.

The F.B.I. will not discuss the pilot. His lawyer, Larry Setchell, however, has said the F.B.I. had searched his client's homes and vehicles and confiscated clothing and shoes.

Mr. Setchell confirmed a report that first appeared in The Seattle Post-Intelligencer, that the pilot had agreed to provide handwriting samples to prove he was not the author of a mysterious letter related to the killing. In the letter, sent last January from Las Vegas to the F.B.I.'s downtown Seattle office, someone using the name "Gidget" claimed to have been hired by a "nice talking lady" to kill Mr. Wales.

Mr. Setchell has compared the pilot to Richard Jewell, the security guard whom the F.B.I. erroneously accused of setting off a bomb at the Atlanta Olympics in 1996.

Candidate Elected As Sheriff Despite Facing Rape Charges (NYT)

By New York Times Regional Newspapers

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

COLUMBUS, N.C., Nov. 13 — A campaign for sheriff usually focuses on who would be the best candidate to fight crime. In Polk County, N.C., voters have elected a new sheriff who faces charges of raping two girls more than 15 years ago.

The winner, Chris Abril, was until recently the police chief here in Columbus, a small town about 80 miles west of Charlotte and the seat of Polk County.

Mr. Abril, who defeated Sheriff David Satterfield on Tuesday, has been on nondisciplinary suspension with pay since his arrest on Aug. 28 on charges that he committed two rapes, one in 1988 and the other in 1989. The victims, according to court papers, were two Polk County girls, ages 10 and 12.

Mr. Abril, 45, was charged with five counts of first-degree statutory rape and one count of first-degree sexual offense and was released after posting a $100,000 bond. He said the charges were politically motivated.

"I am not capable of committing these crimes," Mr. Abril, a Democrat, said at a rally of his political supporters shortly after his release. "To my prosecutors, if this is not politically motivated, give me a trial in Superior Court so I can clear my name prior to the election."

Mr. Abril said later that he had been a suspect in a single rape in the late 1980s but that no evidence existed to charge him . Somehow, he said, a second alleged victim surfaced in March, but he said he had no information beyond that.

Court papers do not say why the charges were brought a decade and a half after the rapes are said to have occurred.

Jeff Hunt, a Republican and the district attorney for the area that includes Polk County, said in a statement that the office of the state attorney general, Roy Cooper, a Democrat, sought indictments against Mr. Abril after the North Carolina Bureau of Investigation began looking into the rape allegations on March 29.

But a spokesman for the Department of Justice, Noelle Talley, said Mr. Hunt requested the investigation. She would not say why.

Sheriff Satterfield, a Republican who was first elected eight years ago, has refused to comment about his defeat or about the charges against Mr. Abril, other than to say that he had nothing to do with the investigation.

Mr. Abril beat Mr. Satterfield, a state trooper for 30 years, 54 percent to 46 percent. There were 7,556 votes cast, a 53 percent turnout, which locals officials said was higher than in previous elections.

Mr. Abril's swearing-in as sheriff is scheduled for Dec. 4. Exactly one month later he is to appear for a hearing in the rape case in Superior Court here, at which time a trial date is to be set.

Cheney Asks Judge To Toss CIA Leak Suit (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Vice President Dick Cheney asked a federal judge Tuesday to dismiss a lawsuit brought against him by a former CIA operative who says the White House leaked her identity to the press.

Cheney's attorneys criticized the lawsuit in court papers, saying it invented constitutional rights, intruded on national security discussions and came two years after the statute of limitations had expired.

Former CIA operative Valerie Plame Wilson claims that she was outed as retribution for her husband's criticism of the administration's prewar intelligence on Iraq.

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald spent years investigating who revealed her identity to syndicated columnist Robert Novak in 2003 but nobody was charged with the leak. Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, who faces trial in January on perjury and obstruction, is the only person charged in the case.

Wilson's civil lawsuit is continuing alongside Libby's criminal case. In seeking to dismiss the case, Cheney said Wilson doesn't have any grounds to bring the suit and, even if she did, the vice president is shielded from civil suits.

The suit centers on conversations between Cheney and Libby about Plame's job at the CIA.

"Plaintiffs invite the judicial branch to permit intrusive discovery into those communications and to discern which among them might be, as a matter of tort law, wrongful and which not," Cheney's attorneys wrote. "Such an inquiry cannot be squared with basic separation of powers principles."

The Justice Department also weighed in on behalf of Cheney and other Bush administration officials including presidential adviser Karl Rove. In briefs, the agency said government officials are shielded from civil lawsuits and that Wilson has not shown that a constitutional right was violated.

Omnicare Settles Generic Drug Suit For $49.5 Million (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Andrew Harris

Bloomberg, November 15, 2006

Nov. 14 (Bloomberg) -- Omnicare Inc., the largest provider of pharmacy services to U.S. nursing homes, agreed to pay $49.5 million to settle claims by the U.S. government and 42 states that it overcharged them for drugs provided to senior citizens.

Omnicare substituted more expensive forms of generic versions of drugs including Zantac, an antacid, and Prozac, an antidepressant, to evade price limits for Medicaid reimbursement, said Michael Behn, a Chicago plaintiffs' attorney. The U.S. joined the false claims act suit after it was filed.

``The health care industry should be wary of manipulating federal and state programs in this manner," Chicago U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald said today in a statement.

The settlement includes a ``corporate integrity agreement" requiring training and oversight at Covington, Kentucky-based Omnicare, the company said in a statement. The amount of the accord has been ``fully reserved," said Omnicare, which didn't admit any wrongdoing as part of the accord.

``This was the first case targeting generic drug switching under the false claims act to help protect both patients and taxpayers," Behn said. The company said patient safety ``was never an issue."

Omnicare's profit fell 11 percent in the third quarter, hurt by lower insurance payments from UnitedHealth Group Inc., the company said Oct. 31.

Tablets to Capsules

Omnicare defrauded the government by changing prescriptions for a popular antacid from tablets to capsules in order to inflate government reimbursements by as much as 400 percent, according to the lawsuit filed five years ago by Behn on behalf of Illinois pharmacist Bernard Lisitza.

While popularly prescribed tablet-forms of Ranitidine, a generic form of Zantac, are subject to federal price reimbursement limits, the capsule forms aren't, Behn said.

Omnicare was also accused in the complaint of swapping more expensive forms of two other drugs: Fluoxetine, a generic version of Prozac, and Buspirone, the generic version of the ant-anxiety medication Buspar. Some of the swaps were made without the knowledge of the patients' doctors, the Justice Department said.

``Those switches increased the price substantially while adding no medical benefit and violating federal and state regulations," Fitzgerald said in a statement.

Lisitza worked for nine years as an Omnicare pharmacist in DesPlaines, Illinois, Behn said.

`They Fired Him'

``He couldn't fill prescriptions with the drug that was prescribed," the lawyer said. ``After he complained, they fired him."

Behn filed suit in 2001. David Kammerer, Omnicare's former director of Medicaid reimbursement, later filed his own suit.

Lisitza will receive $6.4 million and Kammerer will get $792,593 as their shares of the state and federal settlements, the Justice Department said.

Kammerer's lawyer, Charles Atkins of Cincinnati, didn't immediately return a call seeking comment.

The U.S. government will receive $29.6 million, of which $19.8 million will be allocated to the states participating in the settlement. Medicaid is a joint federal-state program that provides health care benefits for low-income and disabled people.

43 Cents

In the third quarter, Omnicare's net income declined to $52.2 million, or 43 cents a share, compared with $58.5 million, or 54 cents, a year earlier, the company said. Sales rose 9.5 percent to $1.59 billion.

The company reduced its earnings forecast for the fourth quarter because of the lower insurance payments and problems at a drug repacking plant in Toledo, Ohio. Omnicare said UnitedHealth cut payments for providing drug benefits to the elderly under the U.S. Medicare program. The action cost $19.7 million in sales and operating profit, the company said. Omnicare sued UnitedHealth over the cuts.

Omnicare shares rose 34 cents to $38.65 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

The cases are U.S. ex. rel. Lisitza v. Omnicare, 01cv7433 and U.S. ex. rel. Kammerer v. Omnicare, 04cv2074, in the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division (Chicago).

CIVIL RIGHTS:

U.S. Attorney General Says No Region Immune To Human Trafficking (AP)

By Carolyn Thompson

AP, November 15, 2006

BUFFALO, N.Y. - Citing a farm labor contractor who withheld wages from upstate workers and used threats to keep them in line, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced Tuesday the creation of a human trafficking task force in western New York.

"Human trafficking is a violation of the human body, mind and spirit," Gonzales said during a stop which also included a helicopter tour of U.S.-Canadian border crossings.

Buffalo was among 10 cities to receive funding last month to focus on anti-trafficking efforts. Nationally, 32 such task forces already exist.

Federal officials pointed to the arrest of Maria Garcia and several family members in Albion, Orleans County, as proof no region is immune to the problem. Garcia pleaded guilty in December 2004 to a forced labor charge following an investigation that began when some Mexican workers she recruited to upstate farms escaped her control and sought help.

Prosecutors said the workers were charged up to $1,800 for a van ride from Arizona and had money deducted from their pay for rent, food, electricity and rides to the fields. They were told they could not leave crowded housing units unless their debts were paid.

"They had lost all liberties," said Terrance Flynn, U.S. attorney for New York's Western District.

The task force, with nearly $900,000 in federal funding, will train law enforcement agencies to spot potential trafficking victims and organizations and focus resources on prosecutions.

Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Customs and Border Protection, the FBI and U.S. Department of Labor will work with local agencies and the state police. Law enforcement will also team up with organizations that deal with the immigrant community, such as the International Institute of Buffalo and Farmworkers' Legal Services.

Gonzales said the government has increased its focus on human trafficking in recent years. In fiscal 2006, 79 people were convicted in federal cases, more than twice the number in the previous year.

"We know that we must work together to fight human trafficking, and we must intensify our efforts," Gonzales said. "Because right now the victims of these criminals are out there. They are suffering and they are waiting for our help."

Western New York is particularly attractive to traffickers, he said, because of its ethnic diversity, numerous farms and use of migrant labor.

Garcia was sentenced last year to 46 months in prison. Her son Elias Botello, who pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit forced labor, was sentenced to 37 months. Another son, Jose J. Garcia, received a 14-month term for alien harboring and her husband, Jose I. Garcia, was given one year of probation on the same charge.

WIVB-TV, News 4, Buffalo, NY, November 15, 2006

(Buffalo, NY, November 14, 2006) - - U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez made his first official visit to Buffalo Tuesday, and Senior Correspondent Rich Newberg reports America's top law enforcer is launching a new task force to combat human trafficking across the U.S.-Canadian border.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said, "Human trafficking is a violation of the human body, mind and spirit."

Gonzales came to Buffalo to announce $900,000 in funding to crack down on human trafficking, for everything from prostitution to forced labor on farms.

Gonzales said, "Right now, the victims of these criminals are out there. They are suffering, and they are waiting for our help."

Buffalo and the region are susceptible because of border crossings and the large number of seasonal workers who come here.

Last year, Maria Garcia was prosecuted for exploiting Mexican migrants she brought to Albion.

U.S. Attorney Terrance Flynn said, "Wages were being taken from them. They were living and working in deplorable conditions. They had lost all liberties when they entered this country under that circumstance."

There may be all sorts of similar situations in our communities we're not aware of, according to Erie County Sheriff Tim Howard.

Howard said, "Their passports have been seized. They're being forced by certain unscrupulous individuals to engage in different types of labor, sometimes illegal acts like prostitution, against their will."

Pamela Kefi of the International Institute of Buffalo said, "Even domestic servitude can be an issue in a community like ours, where somebody may bring somebody from another country and force them to stay in the home and care for their children and take care of their home without a salary, without freedom to move around."

Justice Department To Investigate L.A. County Youth Camps (LAT)

By Susannah Rosenblatt, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 15, 2006

The U.S. Justice Department plans an investigation into conditions at L.A. County juvenile facilities, authorities say.

The U.S. Justice Department plans to investigate dangerous conditions at Los Angeles County probation camps for teens, county officials said Tuesday.

The probe, announced to the Board of Supervisors last week, comes after years of federal scrutiny of county juvenile halls, and could lead to a lawsuit or consent decree, officials say.

Although details of the investigation, expected to begin early next year, remained confidential, Supervisor Gloria Molina alluded to problems with use of force and restraints of inmates during Tuesday's supervisors meeting.

"You don't pop somebody in the face just because you had a bad day," Molina said of probation officers. She described the pending investigation as "very troubling" and expressed surprise at the Justice Department's planned oversight. "I was sort of shocked by it because I thought we had been doing better."

Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson confirmed plans to investigate probation camps but declined to disclose specifics.

The Probation Department, which houses about 4,000 teenagers across the county on any given day, has grappled with growing violence among inmates. Youthful offenders stay for short periods in the county's three juvenile halls while their cases are adjudicated; convicted teens serve their sentences in 19 rural probation camps scattered across the region.

A 2003 Justice Department report criticized the halls for substandard medical and mental-health care, poor sanitation, overuse of pepper spray and dangerous conditions. The facilities also lacked adequate educational, social and religious opportunities, and had no effective way for minors to air grievances, federal officials found.

Many of the 66 required changes have been made, including increasing staff in the juvenile halls by about 20%, but stemming physical conflicts remains a challenge, said David Grkinich, a Probation Department director. "It's tough to predict behavior," he said.

There were 2,630 youth-on-youth fights in the camps last year, with between 2,300 and 2,600 projected for this year, according to department statistics. In the juvenile halls, there were 2,738 fights last year, and 1,702 altercations through August of this year. Although none of the confrontations, which are difficult to track accurately, resulted in fatalities, one youth was paralyzed and another lost an eye during attacks at the Sylmar facility earlier this year.

The federal inquiry is expected to be similar to the previous one, said David Davies, Probation Department chief deputy.

"They just want to make sure that the children, the minors are getting the services they should be getting," Davies said.

Presiding Juvenile Court Judge Michael Nash said, "I don't think anybody is satisfied with how the juvenile justice system at this time performs."

A county study released earlier this year found the Probation Department lacking in mental-health support, compiling data on youth inmates, education and aid to teens' families.

Supervisors postponed until next week a decision on a sole-source $865,000 contract for an outside consultant to aid with juvenile justice reform. Supervisor Zev Yaroslavsky cast the lone dissenting vote, urging immediate approval.

"Our system was failing," Yaroslavsky said, calling board members "oblivious" to the probation system's woes.

"This is one consent decree I may welcome," Yaroslavsky said. "I don't know what it takes to get our attention."

Police Look Into Use Of Force Shown In Videos (USAT)

By William M. Welch

DOJ_NMG_0094491

LOS ANGELES — Video of officers using force in two separate arrests have put a new spotlight on this city's police department, 15 years after the Rodney King beating case ignited riots.

In the latest case, the video shot by a witness in a public area at Venice Beach appears to show an officer using pepper spray on a handcuffed man who had been placed in the back of a patrol car.

The incident happened in February 2005 but just came to light in a report Tuesday by the Los Angeles Times. It said the officer has since resigned.

Los Angeles Police Chief William Bratton said in a news conference Tuesday that prosecutors investigated the pepper spray case and concluded officers did not use excessive force but that an administrative review is continuing.

He said a judge found no excessive force was used in the other recent videotaped case, in which police appeared to strike a suspect who was on the ground after a foot chase in Hollywood. It is also the object of an internal investigation.

"Finders of fact have determined they are lawful," Bratton said of police actions in the unrelated cases. "The reality is, LA police officers show great restraint."

Connie Rice, a civil rights lawyer, says she turned the latest videotape over to police. "The LAPD has a very long history of having a reputation for use of excessive force in low-income communities," she says. "Its history weighs it down."

Rice says, however, that the city's police have come a long way in restraining uses of force since 1991, when the videotaped beating of King after a motor vehicle stop led to charges against four officers. The officers' acquittals touched off riots.

Rice said she gave the latest tape to police officials because she was confident the department would investigate itself — evidence in itself, she said, of an improvement in sensitivity to such issues by the department.

"When they saw the pepper spray tape, they were livid," she said.

The latest report comes days after another tape was distributed on the YouTube video website that appears to show an officer hitting a man in the face after a foot chase Aug. 11.

Prosecutors dropped charges of resisting arrest and battery on a police officer after viewing the tape of the pepper spray case, the newspaper said. Bratton identified the defendant as Benjamin Barker.

John Raphling, an attorney for Barker, said his client was not threatening police.

"It's an act of violence against a person who's sitting there helpless," Raphling told KABC-TV.

Latest Video Brings More Controversy To Los Angeles Police (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Nov. 14 — Less than a week after video of a city police officer punching a prone man in the face began circulating on the Internet, a tape of a man being pepper-sprayed by officers was generating more controversy.

Critics called the tapes the latest evidence of police brutality, but Chief William J. Bratton pointed to rulings that were sympathetic to the officers involved in both incidents.

The episodes are under investigation by the Los Angeles Police Department. The F.B.I. is also investigating the punching incident for possible civil rights violations.

Department policy allows officers to use nonlethal force when a suspect is uncooperative, Chief Bratton said.

The pepper-spraying incident, in February 2005, was first disclosed by the Los Angeles Times on Tuesday.

An investigation by the Los Angeles district attorney's office concluded that the suspect, Benjamin Barker, spat at Officer David Guiterman twice after being placed in a police car and that the spray was a reasonable reaction.

The video of the punching on Aug. 11 shows the suspect, William Cardenas, on his back while Officer Alexander Schlegel straddles his torso and Officer Patrick Farrell punches Mr. Cardenas in the face at least five times.

At a hearing in September, a court commissioner found that Mr. Cardenas used force to resist arrest and that the officers' response was "more than reasonable."

Video Spurs Bratton To Weigh Review Of Pepper-spray Policy (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0094492

Bratton says he may order a review in light of the taped Venice arrest. The ACLU and some police watchdog groups call for a reexamination.

LAPD Chief William J. Bratton said Tuesday that he was concerned when he saw a videotape showing an officer using pepper spray on a handcuffed suspect in the back of a patrol car and that he is considering a review of the policy governing when officers can use the spray.

Bratton said the tape, shot in 2005 on the Venice boardwalk and made public Monday, concerned him enough when he saw it last year that he immediately removed the officers involved from active duty pending an internal investigation. The officer who used the pepper spray has left the department, but an investigation is continuing, Bratton said.

The chief said the videotaped incident "may look awful," but he added that the Los Angeles County district attorney's office found no crime committed by the three officers involved in the Venice Beach arrest in their treatment of the suspect.

Still, Bratton said his own administrative decision on whether they complied with department policy is still days away.

The chief said he was uneasy that the officer shut the door of the patrol car, leaving the handcuffed suspect alone inside, after administering the pepper spray.

The closing of the door "was one of the reasons I had concern," Bratton said.

"My interest there is: Was that pepper spray used to control the behavior of that individual or was it used punitively?" he said.

"If in my judgment the individual ceased to be a threat to the officer and other tactics could have been used, then I could conceivably find the officer out of policy. That whole case really comes down to that issue. And also the closing of the door."

Bratton's comments come as some police watchdog groups and the American Civil Liberties Union called Tuesday on the LAPD to reexamine when officers can use pepper spray, particularly if suspects are handcuffed. Current rules allow the spray to be used whenever a suspect is "combative," but some say that definition is far too broad.

"It's appalling," Catherine Lhamon, an attorney for the ACLU of Southern California, said of the Venice incident. "There is no question that spitting on an officer does not merit pepper-spraying someone when they are handcuffed in the back of a patrol car."

Bratton said he is considering an examination of when officers should use the spray.

"This would not be too onerous a burden for the department to engage in that review," he said.

Members of the Los Angeles Police Commission, meanwhile, ordered the inspector general to launch an assessment of how the LAPD handled the Venice incident.

"It is a disturbing tape," Police Commissioner Andrea Sheridan Ordin said. "I ask that these matters be given the highest priority so we can assure ourselves and the public about what has occurred."

Ordin said the evaluation by Inspector General Andre Birotte Jr. might raise questions about the policy allowing officers wide discretion in the use of pepper spray on handcuffed suspects if they are judged to be combative. But she and others said it was premature to consider policy changes yet.

The videotape was played for The Times on Monday by an attorney who represented the defendant, identified in police reports as Benjamin Barker.

Barker, a transient, was arrested after getting into a scuffle with a merchant on the boardwalk.

He pleaded guilty to misdemeanor battery on the shopkeeper.

The videotape shows Barker in handcuffs as he is bent over a patrol car. As the officer pushes him into the car, Barker can be heard saying, "Why am I going to jail?"

Once Barker is in the back seat, he starts shouting: "I can't breathe! I can't breathe! Don't spray me!"

One officer is heard saying: "He knows what's happening."

Another officer takes a pepper-spray canister from his belt, shakes it and leans in to apply it to Barker's face.

The officer closes the doors of the patrol car and steps back. Barker is seen holding his face up to the car window, his features contorted in pain.

The district attorney's investigation looked at whether there was enough evidence to show that the officers had committed a crime against Barker. The LAPD inquiry is looking at whether the officers violated department policies.

The closing memo from the district attorney, released Tuesday by Bratton, said the officer and two colleagues "did not use excessive force" and instead "showed remarkable restraint and demonstrated professional courtesy toward Barker despite his belligerent, threatening and combative behavior."

The officers involved told authorities that Barker spat on one of them and was threatening to spit again when he was pepper-sprayed.

Bratton acknowledged discrepancies between the police reports and the videotape.

Two officers said in initial reports that the spitting and use of pepper spray occurred outside the car, but the video shows that the pepper spray was used in the car.

The district attorney's office dismissed the disparity, which was corrected in a follow-up police report, as "a product of mistaken recollection and not intentional misstatements of material fact," the closing memo said.

The Venice incident comes as the LAPD and FBI have begun investigations into another videotape showing a police officer hitting a suspect in the face several times at the end of a foot chase in Hollywood.

Police union President Bob Baker issued a statement Tuesday urging the public to be understanding of the job that officers face.

"Asking officers to refrain from using approved tools or techniques in their arrests is akin to telling the soldiers in Iraq to just reason with the insurgents," Baker said. "Perhaps the activists would like to talk to the families of the LAPD officers who have been maimed or killed when some thug who was resisting arrest decided to shoot the arresting officer because he didn't feel like going to jail that day."

Councilman Bernard C. Parks was among those who called on the commission to deal more effectively with the latest allegations of excessive force.

Parks, a former police chief, said the LAPD has, for more than a year, ignored his warnings about "the ongoing discipline problem" in the department.

"Now, after last week's release of the videotaped LAPD beating of William Cardenas, we are left to try to close the barn door after the horses have already left," Parks wrote. "In trying to find a resolution to the problem that we knew existed more than a year ago, I again ask the commission to get to the bottom of the issue."

Parks said the commission should look at complaints and dispositions from the five years before Bratton became chief compared with those from the time since Bratton has headed the department, arguing that a "relatively low number of employees" have been disciplined in the last three years.

The councilman also called on the commission to reconsider the policy of concealing officers' identities in reports on officer-involved shootings and Boards of Rights investigations.

"The decision to shut the public out of these two processes goes against preserving the idea of transparency at the department," Parks wrote.

Later in the day, the head of the council's Public Safety Committee called a public hearing for Monday to examine whether a proposal to install video cameras in police cars might provide the public with better information on controversial incidents than it gets from bystanders using camera phones.

"In light of these YouTube beatings, the public needs to know there is a public policy solution here, which is rapidly installing video cameras in cop cars," said Councilman Jack Weiss, the chairman.

Even if the car cameras do not capture video of an incident, microphones that pick up sound several hundred feet away might capture audio that can put a use-of-force incident into context, Weiss said.

He added that the images in the latest videotapes may be disturbing but that he trusts the LAPD to fully investigate any use of force and that some force may be justified.

"I don't know where people got the idea that you could ever have a Police Department without violence," Weiss said.

Officers In Suspect-Beating Video Investigated (KCAL)

KCAL-TV, November 15, 2006

(CBS) LOS ANGELES The Los Angeles Police Commission called Tuesday for a speedy and thorough investigation into the conduct of two officers caught on videotape holding down and repeatedly punching a man, 23, during an arrest in Hollywood.

The LAPD and FBI have launched investigations into the circumstances of the Aug. 11 arrest, when Officer Alexander Schlegel held down William Cardenas as Officer Patrick Farrell placed his knee on the man's neck and punched his face six times near the intersection of Gordon Street and Fountain Avenue.

The video of the arrest was posted on the popular YouTube Web site. "I would just encourage all parties who are involved ... that it be treated with the utmost speed," Police Commissioner Andrea Ordin, who served on the Christopher Commission that investigated the LAPD in the wake of the 1991 Rodney King beating said.

"It is clearly something the public is interested in and is entitled to have information (about)," Ordin said. "Sometimes that means shifting our priorities so that we can get that information out."

Andre Birotte, the commission's inspector general, said he is reviewing the case daily.

The LAPD has launched criminal and administrative investigations of the officers, who have been assigned to desk duty.

Additionally, the FBI opened a preliminary inquiry into the arrest last Thursday, in response to media coverage of the video. The inquiry results will be forwarded to the U.S. Justice Department, which will determine whether further investigations are required, according to FBI spokeswoman Laura Eimiller.

"It shouldn't have to be said that we know the department wants and we want a full, complete, accurate, fair investigation on a timely basis," Commissioner Alan Skobin said.

Cardenas remains in custody on $40,000 bail. Charges of receiving stolen property, which were tied to an arrest warrant against Cardenas, were dropped due to insufficient evidence, but he still faces two felony counts of resisting arrest, according to his attorney B. Kwaku Duren.

Cardenas is due back in court Nov. 20. Trial is scheduled for Nov. 27, Duren said.

Judge Says Inmate Death Was 'Torture' (NYT)

By Libby Sander

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

CHICAGO, Nov. 14 — Shackled to a concrete slab, Timothy Joe Souders spent the final days of his life naked and lying in his own urine, sweating through temperatures over 100 degrees in an isolated prison cell.

Mr. Souders, a 21-year-old with a history of severe mental illness, died Aug. 6 after spending four days in a segregation cell at the Southern Michigan Correctional Facility in Jackson. His death prompted state prison officials to revise their restraint policies for unruly prisoners, limiting the use of "top of the bed" restraints to a maximum of six hours.

But this week, a federal judge in Kalamazoo said those revisions were not sufficient. Scolding corrections officials for failing to provide adequate treatment to mentally ill inmates, the judge said on Monday that the conditions leading to Mr. Souders's death constituted "torture."

"You are not coat racks who collect government paychecks while your work is taken to the sexton for burial," wrote Richard A. Enslen, a senior federal district judge. "If a patient does not receive necessary medical or psychological services, including medicines and specialty care, it is not his problem, it is your problem."

Medical experts cited in Monday's ruling have speculated that Mr. Souders died of dehydration, though an autopsy report has not been completed.

Judge Enslen ordered an immediate ban on punitive restraints in three Jackson prison facilities holding roughly 4,500 inmates. The court has been monitoring those facilities as part of a 1985 consent decree.

Russell L. Marlan, a spokesman for the Michigan Department of Corrections, said the department disagreed with the ruling and planned to appeal. Top of the bed restraints, he said, are "nationally accepted, effective practices in correctional populations. We think the changes we've made in regard to these restraints are what is necessary."

Mr. Souders, who suffered from depression and psychosis and had previously tried to hang himself at a county jail, was serving a sentence for shoplifting, said Paul W. Broschay, who is representing Mr. Souders's estate in a federal wrongful death lawsuit against the Department of Corrections. At the time of his death, he was taking at least six medications for mental disorders.

On July 31, Mr. Souders was transferred to the segregated cell for disobeying orders. Three days later, after slipping out of soft restraints, Mr. Souders was restrained atop the concrete bed slab. Though Mr. Souders had been scheduled for a transfer to a mental health facility after a social worker found him "floridly psychotic," the transfer never happened, and on Aug. 6, he was pronounced dead. A court-appointed doctor visiting the prison on Aug. 7 learned of Mr. Souders's death. The doctor, Robert L. Cohen, wrote in an Aug. 14 letter to Judge Enslen: "No psychiatrist was consulted. No emergency psychiatric evaluation was obtained." He concluded that Mr. Souders's death "was predictable and preventable."

Monday's ruling is believed to be the first ban on punitive restraints in state prisons, said Elizabeth Alexander, director of the National Prison Project of the American Civil Liberties Union.

"This really is a precedent-setting decision," Ms. Alexander said.

Officials Clash Over Mentally Ill In Florida Jails (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough

MIAMI, Nov. 14 — For years, circuit judges here have ordered state officials to obey Florida law and promptly transfer severely mentally ill inmates from jails to state hospitals. But with few hospital beds available, Gov. Jeb Bush's administration began flouting those court orders in August.

Now, in a growing standoff between the government of Florida and its judges, the state is being threatened with steep daily fines if it does not comply. And at least one judge has raised the possibility that the secretary of the Florida Department of Children and Families could go to jail for contempt of court.

"This type of arrogant activity cannot be tolerated in an orderly society," Judge Crockett Farnell of Pinellas-Pasco Circuit Court wrote in an Oct. 11 ruling.

State law requires that inmates found incompetent to stand trial be moved from county jails to psychiatric hospitals within 15 days of the state's receiving the commitment orders. Florida has broken that law for years, provoking some public defenders to seek court orders forcing swift compliance.

With the state now rebuffing even those orders, a rising number of mentally ill inmates, now more than 300, have been left without treatment in crowded jails because the state's 1,416 psychiatric beds are full.

Two mentally ill inmates in the Escambia County Jail in Pensacola died over the last year and a half after being subdued by guards, according to news reports. And in the Pinellas County Jail in Clearwater, a schizophrenic inmate gouged out his eye after waiting weeks for a hospital bed, his lawyer said.

Public defenders in Miami-Dade County describe psychotic clients who have hallucinated, mutilated themselves and attempted suicide while awaiting transfer to hospitals. The state says that shortages of beds and financing have made compliance impossible, and that court orders forcing the transfer of certain inmates are unfair to those who have waited longer.

Most judges have responded skeptically, asking why the Department of Children and Families has not sought more state money as the number of committed inmates has soared. The agency cut its budget by $53 million this year, which public defenders say makes no sense given the inmate crisis and the state's $8 billion budget surplus.

In one of the toughest rulings to date on the subject, Judge Farnell said last month that he would start fining the department $1,000 a day for each mentally ill inmate who stayed in the Pinellas County Jail longer than 15 days. The judge, based in Clearwater, expressed outrage about the agency's "conscious decision" to ignore court orders.

Judges in Broward, Hillsborough and Miami-Dade Counties are also weighing motions to force the department to comply with the law or to hold it in contempt for letting the mentally ill pile up in unsuitable jails. The department appealed after three state judges in Miami ordered it to take custody of several inmates last month, but a panel of the Third District Court of Appeal indicated last week that it might rule against the department and its secretary, Lucy D. Hadi.

"It strikes me that ultimately you've got contempt issues," Judge Frank A. Shepherd said during oral arguments, "and Ms. Hadi may be going to jail."

The problem is not unique to Florida, although it is especially severe in Miami-Dade County, which has one of the nation's largest percentages of mentally ill residents, according to the National Alliance for the Mentally Ill, an advocacy group.

A Justice Department study released in September found that 64 percent of inmates in county jails around the nation reported mental health problems within the last year. Many are arrested for petty crimes, advocates say, yet remain in jail an inordinately long time because there is nowhere else for them to go.

Only 40,000 beds remain in state psychiatric hospitals around the nation, down from 69,000 in 1995. Advocates for the mentally ill say that community-based treatment programs, which were supposed to replace psychiatric hospitals after the deinstitutionalization movement of the '60s and '70s, have not begun to make up for the loss.

Long waits for beds are especially common in the nation's urban areas. Last week, 307 mentally ill inmates were waiting for one of Florida's 1,416 psychiatric beds, and 72 percent had waited longer than 15 days. The state has three psychiatric hospitals with secure beds.

"This is a national problem, and it's a direct reflection of the lack of adequate beds and coordination between the criminal justice and mental health systems," said Ronald S. Honberg, legal director of the National Alliance for the Mentally Ill.

In Miami, an average of 25 to 40 acutely psychotic people live in a unit of the main county jail that a lawyer for Human Rights Watch, Jennifer Daskal, described as squalid after visiting last month. Seventeen such inmates are currently waiting for state hospital beds, said Valerie Jonas, a county public defender, adding that the number has been as high as 30 in recent weeks.

Ms. Daskal said that some of the unit's 14 "suicide cells" — dim, bare and designed for one inmate — were holding two or three at a time, and that the inmates were kept in their cells 24 hours a day except to shower. None of the mentally ill inmates receive group or individual therapy, she said in an affidavit.

Officials with the Department of Children and Families have argued that the agency cannot be held in contempt when it simply has no more beds, and that it could not have anticipated this year's sharp rise in commitments. In June 2005, they said, only 125 inmates were waiting for hospital beds, of which 38 percent had waited longer than 15 days.

"We are at the moment on a daily basis trying to find a short-term solution to the bed shortage," said Al Zimmerman, a spokesman for the department. "We are trying to find ways to pay for additional space, pay for additional beds."

The department requested and received money for about two dozen new secure beds this year, and it has asked for 38 next year. Each bed costs $100,000 a year, Mr. Zimmerman said.

Ms. Jonas, the public defender, said it was unconscionable that the department would not ask for more. "Given they've got a wait list of over 300 and they're running all over the state claiming inability to comply," she said, "where do they get off requesting only 38 new beds?"

Yet Mr. Honberg said that putting more mentally ill inmates in state hospitals should not be the ultimate goal. The treatment they get there often skims the surface, he said, and many end up deteriorating when they return to jail, only to end up on the wait list for a hospital bed again.

"You have large numbers of people sent to state hospitals not for therapeutic purposes, but for purposes of making them competent to proceed to trial," Mr. Honberg said. "We're not going to solve these problems until we invest adequate resources into services that work for people before they get to jail."

ANTITRUST:

Regulators Clear Purchase Of BMG Music (AP)

By Alex Veiga, AP Business Writer

AP, November 15, 2006

The Federal Trade Commission and the Justice Department gave antitrust approval Tuesday to Universal Music Group's planned acquisition of BMG Music Publishing for $2.09 billion.

The deal must now receive approval from European regulators to become final.

DOJ_NMG_0094497

BMG - owned by German media company Bertelsmann AG - owns the rights to more than a million songs by contemporary recording artists such as Nelly, Maroon 5 and Coldplay, as well as classic hits by the Beach Boys, Barry Manilow and other entertainers.

Universal Music Group is a unit of Paris-based Vivendi SA. Its publishing arm controls the rights to songs by artists such as 50 Cent, Mary J. Blige and Chamillionaire.

If approved, the deal would combine the No. 3 and No. 4 music publishing catalogs.

"We were confident that the regulatory authorities would find that the acquisition did not raise competition concerns, and we appreciate that the Justice Department promptly reached the same conclusion," Universal Music Group said in a prepared statement.

European Union regulators said earlier this month they would issue a ruling on the deal by Dec. 8.

Unlike the recording business, which sells CDs and other products to be sold at retail, music publishers make money by licensing songs for use in movies, TV shows, CDs, video games, ringtones and other media.

The companies also collect performance fees when songs are played on the radio or in public venues such as clubs.

Some analysts have warned that EU regulators are likely to scrutinize the deal, in part because of an EU court ruling in July that overturned the European Commission's go-ahead for the merger that created Sony BMG Music Entertainment.

That 2004 deal, which reduced the number of major recording companies from five to four, is being re-examined.

NAR Changes Controversial MLS Policy (INMAN)

By Glenn Roberts Jr.

Inman News, November 15, 2006

Policy limits some MLS restrictions on public display of listings

NEW ORLEANS -- Responding to antitrust actions and investigations by the U.S. Justice Department and Federal Trade Commission over multiple listing service restrictions for a category of property listings, directors for the National Association of Realtors approved policy changes that allow individual MLS participants to decide whether to implement restrictions on the Internet display of property listings.

Laurie Janik, general counsel for the Realtors group, has said that the change is legally significant in that individuals are making decisions rather than MLSs, which represent a group of real estate industry participants. The issue is unrelated to the Justice Department's antitrust lawsuit filed last year against the association over other policies for online property listings display.

Under the policy change approved Monday at the group's annual real estate conference, MLS participants may select listings they choose to forward for display -- or not forward -- to Web sites that are part of a broker-supported cooperative property listing system based on "objective criteria."

This criteria, according to the approved policy, can be based on factors such as geography, or location, list price, property type, cooperative compensation offered by listing brokers, type of listing (such as properties under "exclusive right to sell" or "exclusive agency" listing contracts), or "the level of service provided by the listing firm," according to language in the approved policy.

The FTC and Justice Department had engaged in 15 investigations over MLS policies that block exclusive agency property listings from public display on the Realtor.com and some other public-facing property-search sites, such as those MLS participants' sites that are part of the broker-sharing system known as Internet Data Exchange or IDX. Exclusive agency listings are contracts in which sellers are not obligated to pay the listing broker in a real estate transaction if the seller finds a buyer for the property without any assistance from the listing broker.

The FTC has announced a series of consent agreements with MLSs that settle some of the investigations over the exclusive agency restrictions, and also has announced complaints against two MLSs in Michigan that refused to change their policies. The FTC has also said that other investigations are ongoing.

"Selection of listings to be displayed on an IDX site must be independently made by each participant," according to the policy adopted by the Realtor group's directors. The policy adopted by the directors also states that MLSs must, if requested by a participant, "provide basic downloading of all current listings and may not exclude any listings from the information which can be downloaded or displayed under IDX except those listings for which a participant has withheld consent."

Janik had said in earlier meetings at the Realtors conference that there is no guarantee that the federal agencies will not take action against the revised policy, though she said that there were greater risks in leaving the policy intact.

The association's board of directors also approved the removal of a section in the policy that stated, "MLSs may, as a matter of local option, limit information which can be downloaded and/or otherwise displayed under IDX to properties listed on an exclusive right to sell basis." Exclusive right to sell listing agreements, unlike exclusive agency listing agreements, require sellers to pay the listing broker regardless of who locates a buyer for the property.

The federal agencies have charged that exclusive agency agreements are more likely to be used by alternative real estate business models, such as discount or limited-service business models.

Realtor-association directors also adopted a change to MLS that gives MLSs the option to block its transmission of property listings to some public Web sites if the street address or location of the property is displayed to the public and if "a 'for sale by owner' or other sign or notice is displayed on the property telling the public the seller is soliciting direct contacts from potential buyers."

According to a description of the proposed policy, it "establishes that MLSs are not required to transmit participants' listings to third-party aggregators or to operate publicly accessible MLS Web sites."

Also during the meeting, Realtor directors approved several new standards of practice for its 1.3 million members. One of the new standards provides that Realtors are obligated "to present a true picture in their advertising and representations to the public," including the use of Web URLs and domain names that they use.

This standard prohibits Realtors from "engaging in deceptive or unauthorized framing of real estate brokerage Web sites," "manipulating (e.g. presenting content developed by others) listing content in any way that produces a deceptive or misleading result," or "deceptively using meta-tags, keywords or other devices/methods to direct, drive or divert Internet traffic, or to otherwise mislead consumers."

Another change in standards approved by the directors provides that Realtors have a duty "to not knowingly or recklessly repeat, retransmit or republish false or misleading statements made by others. This duty applies whether false or misleading statements are repeated in person, in writing, by technological means or by any other means."

Directors clashed over an unrelated proposal related to local Realtor associations that adopt alternative business names other than their formal, established names. An association committee's work group recommended a policy change providing that all associations using these "DBAs" would be required to submit an application for approval by the Realtor group, and requiring these DBAs to comply with the same policies governing the formal names of associations.

The basis for the policy change, according to the work group, was that some DBAs could be "deceptively similar" to formal names already established by other Realtor associations and could mislead people about the geographic coverage area of that association. After some debate and the defeat of a proposed amendment that would have eliminated the retroactive nature of the proposal, a majority of directors approved the change.

Judge Denies New York's Quick Bid To Block Insurance Merger (AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 15, 2006

NEW YORK -- A judge on Tuesday refused a city request to immediately stop the merger of two nonprofit insurance companies that provide coverage to city workers because it violates antitrust laws.

U.S. District Judge Kenneth M. Karas said he did not believe the city would suffer irreparable harm if he permitted the merger to go forward Wednesday while he takes a longer look at the facts of the case and the legal history of similar mergers.

In a statement made after the hearing, city lawyer Michael Cardozo said the city would look for other health care providers "who can offer comparable _ but less expensive _ health care benefits."

On Monday, the city filed a lawsuit to block the pending merger of Group Health Inc. and the HIP Health Plan of New York, saying the union would create a virtual monopoly in the public service health care sector.

The merger, which has been approved by the Department of Justice and state insurance regulators, would control more than 90 percent of the city's municipal health care market and 100 percent of the low-cost market, the city said in a release.

It asked the judge to issue an immediate restraining order to block the merger from going forward while lawyers submitted arguments and evidence to prove their positions.

Before his ruling, the judge listened to arguments Tuesday.

City lawyer John Low-Beer said an immediate order was necessary to protect competition in the insurance industry. He said the two companies had "been competing vigorously for business" before deciding to merge.

"For this product we want to buy, there is no other seller who comes close in price," he said.

GHI lawyer Stephen M. Axinn said the merger was announced 14 months ago and the city delayed challenging it, hopeful that the federal government would stop it.

"This is none of their business," he said. "This is not an anticompetitive transaction. This is a pro-competitive situation."

Axinn said the combined companies would save money on office expenses and pass those savings along to customers.

He said the merged entity would be better able to compete against insurance giants that are 50 times its size.

HIP lawyer Bruce Schneider said there was no need to temporarily block the transaction, especially since the contracts with the city do not expire until the end of June.

High Court Asked To Hear IPO Case (DEAL)

By Cecile Kohrs Lindell

The Deal, November 15, 2006

Lawyers for the government last week asked the Supreme Court to take a case that has the potential to wreak havoc on initial public offerings in the United States by calling into question much of the cooperation investment banks engage in when they form underwriting syndicates.

The class action, Glen Billing v. Credit Suisse First Boston Ltd., charges that common practices such as setting prices and allocating shares among themselves is essentially illegal collaboration among competitors.

Aside from the threat to current IPO practices, the case already has sparked a turf battle between the Securities and Exchange Commission, the primary regulator for Wall Street, and the Department of Justice, which has jurisdiction over antitrust enforcement.

But Solicitor General Paul D. Clement, answering the Supreme Court's request for a unified federal position, seems to be offering a solution that pleases both DOJ's Assistant Attorney General for Antitrust Thomas Barnett and the SEC's Associate General Counsel Richard M. Humes. Both agency officials signed on to Clement's brief filed last week, requesting the top court hear and rule on the heavily nuanced case.

At issue is a September 2005 ruling by the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which overturned a district court's initial ruling to dismiss the Billing case. The appeals court agreed with DOJ's argument that nefarious behavior should not be shielded by a regulatory scheme that doesn't adequately prevent harms that could be addressed by antitrust laws and ordered the case to proceed.

The SEC has argued that it regulates the securities industry, and antitrust law doesn't always apply, and that the court should find "implied immunity" from antitrust laws when a pervasive regulatory scheme is in place.

Because the case was dismissed at the district court level, the merits of Billing's accusations have not been addressed. But even allowing the case to proceed would pose a threat to Wall Street, because a new avenue would be opened for plaintiffs lawyers pursuing class actions, according to Paul Atkins, a member of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Atkins' op-ed warnings about the case were filed to the Supreme Court by banks asking the top court to toss out the 2nd Circuit opinion. He said a new category of plaintiff suits could cost billions of dollars, create upheaval in the market and effectively end Wall Street's reign as the center of the world's capital markets.

Clement suggested that both agencies have some authority to regulate Wall Street, but he urges the Supreme Court to grant certiorari and write a decision that will provide much-needed guidance to courts without upending IPO practices. Clement wrote that overlapping SEC regulation and antitrust enforcement would snarl public securities offerings and "could undercut critical national regulatory policies and interfere with the capital formation process," if the 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals decision is allowed to stand.

But, Clement added, the initial district court's decision, which said the antitrust laws need not apply in light of the extensive SEC regulation, is also wrong. That approach, he wrote, "would oust not only private treble damages actions but government antitrust enforcement from the securities industry, despite the absence of any evidence that Congress intended such a drastic result." That could allow DOJ to investigate some practices for antitrust violations.

The investment bank defendants asked the Supreme Court to hear the case after the appeals court ruling, and the justices, in turn, asked for the views of the United States. That left it to Clement to sort out a room full of about two dozen lawyers and years of history that pitted the SEC's regulatory schemes against antitrust enforcement.

"It looks like they worked out a compromise," said Ali Stoepplewirth, a partner at Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale and Dorr LLP, which represents Citigroup Global Markets Holdings Inc. in this case.

According to Roy Englert, a partner with Robbins, Russell, Englert, Orseck & Untereiner LLP who is representing an amicus in the case, the fact that Clement could craft a brief that is supported by both agencies means it is very likely that the justices will hear the case.

A DOJ spokeswoman was unwilling to comment on the antitrust division's perspective, other than to say that Barnett had signed on.

The case was filed by lawyers with Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP originally as a securities law case, but after it was rejected by the district court, it was refiled as an antitrust case, alleging conspiracy and collaboration against Credit Suisse and Citigroup Global Markets Holdings Inc., Robertson Stephens Inc., Deutsche Bank Securities Inc., Merrill Lynch & Co., Morgan Stanley, Janus Capital Management LLC, Goldman, Sachs & Co., Bear, Stearns & Co., Lehman Brothers Inc., Van Wagoner Capital Management Inc., Fidelity Distributors Corp. and Comerica Inc.

Because the case now alleges antitrust violations, any remedy would automatically be tripled.

The justices will consider taking the case in early December and "could hear the case as early as March," Englert said.

Microsoft: EU Ruling Could Come Soon (CNET)

By Ina Fried

CNET News, November 15, 2006

Microsoft chief lawyer Brad Smith said Tuesday that the company expects to hear back from a European court as early as December on its appeal of the landmark antitrust ruling there.

"We expect to get that decision really in the next several months," Smith said during a question-and-answer session at the company's shareholder meeting in Bellevue, Wash. "Most people think it will probably come some time between December and March or April."

The European Union's antitrust regulators slapped Microsoft with a $600 million fine in March 2004, but the software maker has been pursuing an appeal of the case with Europe's Court of First Instance.

Smith said whatever the decision is, it should give Microsoft and the industry more "clarity."

"We'll all have to see where we go from there," he said during the meeting, which was also broadcast over the Internet. "Certainly, we and increasingly a lot of other people in Europe would like to see us get to some clear resolution so we can all focus on some other things."

Regulators tacked on an additional $357 million fine in July, saying Microsoft was not fully complying with the 2004 ruling. Microsoft is appealing that as well.

Smith's comments came after a shareholder asked Microsoft executives: "In Europe, how long are they going to keep stringing you along. Do you think they have any intention of ever letting you off the hook?"

It has gone on for a long time, Smith agreed. "It's been going for about eight years," he said.

Also at the meeting, Microsoft shareholders elected the company's proposed slate of directors and rejected three shareholder proposals. CEO Steve Ballmer and Chairman Bill Gates addressed the shareholders, who also got a demo of the Zune music player that went on sale earlier in the day.

Voters Back Limits On Eminent Domain (NYT)

By Terry Pristin

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

Voters showed last week that the furor over a 2005 Supreme Court decision in a Connecticut eminent domain case has not abated, even in states that have already enacted legislation to restrict the use of condemnation for economic development.

Ballot measures to limit eminent domain powers to public uses were approved by large margins in eight states. Louisiana passed an eminent domain measure in September.

In all, 34 states have adopted laws or passed ballot measures in response to the Connecticut case, Kelo v. New London, which upheld the right of local officials to require the forced sale of homes and businesses for private development intended to increase the tax base of one of the state's poorest cities.

"A message has been sent that state and local governments have to do a better job of justifying a need for eminent domain," said Larry Morandi, a land-use specialist at the National Conference of State Legislatures. "There needs to be more negotiation and more transparency."

Donald J. Borut, the executive director of the National League of Cities, acknowledged that condemnation powers are sometimes abused. But he said that property-rights groups have played to public fears in a way that discourages thoughtful discussion about how individual rights should be balanced against projects that benefit the community as a whole. He described anti-Kelo sentiment as "a huge emotional tsunami that's been rushing through the country."

Of the measures approved by voters, "about half of them are purely procedural or largely symbolic," said John D. Echeverria, the executive director of the Georgetown Environmental Law and Policy Institute. In Florida, for example, the State Legislature, by a three-fifths vote of each house, can make an exception to a ban on transferring condemned property from one private entity to another.

Strict constitutional amendments have been added in South Carolina and Georgia — states where eminent domain is not used for economic development, said Timothy Sandefur, a staff lawyer for the Pacific Legal Foundation, a libertarian group that represents property owners in condemnation cases.

But in Michigan, where officials are trying to cope with decades of disinvestment in cities like Detroit and Flint, a new constitutional amendment is likely to have a "chilling effect on the willingness of investors to undertake new development," said John E. Mogk, a law professor at Wayne State University.

Though property-rights groups cheered last week's election results, their victory was tempered by the failure — except in Arizona — of initiatives aimed at discouraging government officials from making zoning and other land-use decisions. California, Idaho and Washington State defeated initiatives to require compensation for owners of property that lost value as a result of a government action to restrict its use.

That the measure was rejected by three-fourths of the voters in Idaho, considered a strong property-rights state, suggests that the movement against so-called regulatory takings is doomed, said David Barron, a Harvard Law School professor. "It shows that the people recognize that the property-rights movement is potentially just divesting them of their ability to decide their own future as a community," he said. "People don't want that to happen."

In Oregon, which passed a similar measure in 2004, local officials have waived zoning rules to avoid paying nearly $6 billion to compensate property owners who claimed economic losses.

But California's eminent domain and antizoning initiative lost by only four percentage points after opponents put together a huge coalition that included antitax groups concerned about the potential cost of compensating property owners for land-use changes.

The California measure was one of eight propositions on ballots throughout the country backed by groups linked to Howard S. Rich, a New York real estate investor. In Arizona, where the measure was one of 19 on the ballot, the proponents outspent the opponents 4 to 1, according to The Arizona Republic. The situation was reversed in California, where proponents were outspent 3 to 1, said John F. Shirey, the executive director of the California Redevelopment Association, a trade group.

California has already tinkered with its eminent domain powers, but Mr. Shirey said the state should take further steps — like passing legislation to prevent the condemnation of single-family homes — to head off future property-rights initiatives. "We need to do something substantive to give people better assurances than they have now that something like what occurred in Connecticut couldn't happen in California," he said.

Eminent domain specialists on both sides of the issue say many of the statutes enacted by state legislatures have few teeth, either because the language is vague or the measures impose only minor restrictions on public officials.

"A lot of state legislators don't really believe in property rights," Mr. Sandefur said. He praised Pennsylvania as one of a handful of states that have enacted a "well-crafted, careful, thought-out measure," but noted that officials could continue condemning property for redevelopment in Philadelphia and Pittsburgh until 2012.

Mr. Barron, the Harvard Law professor, said much of the legislation was "more hype than not," often riddled with exceptions inserted during the legislative process. Indiana — another state praised by Mr. Sandefur — includes technology parks as a "public use" for which eminent domain powers can be used.

The initiatives approved Nov. 7 tend to be shorter and more restrictive than the bills, "but there will be a lot of interpretative questions about what they mean," Mr. Barron said.

Amy S. Doppelt, a managing director at Fitch Ratings, said the initiatives were often unclear. "Frequently, the language is quite broad," she said. "It creates a lot of uncertainty." Communities that can no longer use condemnation could find themselves at a competitive disadvantage, which could ultimately lower their credit rating, she said.

In many communities, eminent domain powers are used only sparingly. That is not the case in Detroit, where officials have worked to bring industrial parks and middle-income housing developments to tracts of land that are largely, but not entirely, vacant.

"Any project requiring an assembly of land of 50 acres or more since 1960 has required eminent domain at some point in order to complete the project," said Mr. Mogk, the Wayne State professor.

But the use of condemnation powers to replace one set of property owners with another has often proved contentious. One such project on the city's east side, now known as Jefferson Village, gave rise to years of lawsuits. But it has proved so successful that the city expects to recoup its $38 million investment in 12 years, said Robbin G. Millard, a project manager for the Detroit Economic Growth Corporation, the nonprofit organization that helped create Jefferson Village. Though 160 homes were taken, most owners were able to reach a settlement with the city, he said.

In 2004, the Michigan Supreme Court ruled that eminent domain could no longer be used for private projects to create jobs and generate tax revenue. That decision is now enshrined in a constitutional amendment approved last week by Michigan voters. If condemnation is used to eliminate blight, each individual property must now be shown to be blighted "by clear and convincing evidence," Mr. Mogk said. This requirement is likely to discourage badly needed development, he said.

Mr. Millard said that while some aspects of the amendment need to be clarified, that does not appear to pose insurmountable barriers. Officials will be able to show that the buildings they seek to condemn are blighted. "We think we can still do eminent domain in this city," he said.

Judge Says Crack Sentencing Goes Too Far (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — A federal judge who served as a top drug policy adviser to the first President Bush and advocated harsher penalties for crack cocaine crimes said Tuesday the policy had gone too far and was undermining faith in the judicial system.

DOJ_NMG_0094503

U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton told the U.S. Sentencing Commission that federal laws requiring dramatically longer sentences for crack cocaine than for cocaine powder were "unconscionable" and contributed to the perception within minority communities that courts are unfair.

"I never thought that the disparity should be as severe as it has become," said Walton, who sits on the bench in Washington, where he previously served as a Superior Court judge, a federal prosecutor and a deputy drug czar.

The current law includes what critics have called the 100-to-1 disparity: Trafficking in 5 grams of cocaine carries a mandatory five-year prison sentence, but it takes 500 grams of cocaine powder to warrant the same sentence.

Advocates for changing the law point to crime statistics that show crack is more of an inner-city drug while cocaine powder is used more often in the suburbs.

The Sentencing Commission, which has thrice recommended that Congress narrow the sentencing gap, is again reviewing the disparity. Previous recommendations, which were not adopted, have included raising the penalties for powder cocaine and lowering them for crack.

The Bush administration, like the Clinton administration, indicated Tuesday that it welcomed a discussion about the sentencing disparity but adamantly opposed lowering the penalties for crack. The Justice Department says crack is more addictive and easier to sell in small doses, leading to increased violence and a greater health impact.

The Justice Department also urged the Sentencing Commission only to make recommendations to Congress and not to take it upon itself to narrow the gap by rewriting sentencing guidelines.

Walton said there may still be a need for tougher sentences for crack because it is more addictive and more closely associated with violence. But he said the disparity is too great.

As an example, he offered two hypothetical cases involving a white college student arrested with a kilogram of powder cocaine and a black high school dropout caught with the same amount of crack. The white man would face a likely sentence of 3 to 4 years in prison, Walton said in exhibits filed with the commission. The black man would face a mandatory 10-year sentence and the possibility of a life sentence.

Walton said the law wasn't intended to target poor people or minorities. But with a disproportionately high number of minorities in prison and potential jurors openly balking at convicting drug offenders because of concerns over the fairness of the system, Walton said the problem must be addressed.

"I hope the powers that be will have the will to do the right thing and rectify the problem," Walton said.

Equal Drug Crimes Need Equal Jail Times (CSM)

By Eric E. Sterling

The Christian Science Monitor, November 15, 2006

For a generation, antidrug policy has been built on mistakes and tough talk.

One of our most infamous contemporary laws is the 100-to-1 difference in sentencing between selling crack cocaine and selling powder cocaine. Under federal drug laws, prison sentences are usually tied to the quantity of drugs the defendant trafficked. For example, selling 5,000 grams of powder cocaine (about a briefcase full) results in a mandatory 10-year prison sentence, but so does selling only 50 grams of crack cocaine (the weight of a candy bar).

Working for the House Judiciary Committee in 1986, I wrote the House bill that was the basis for that law. We made some terrible mistakes.

Those mistakes, aggravated by the Justice Department's misuse of the penalties, have been a disaster. Conventional wisdom is that the 100-to-1 ratio needs to be repealed. But that's an inadequate fix.

On Tuesday, the US Sentencing Commission - the independent agency that gives sentencing guidelines to federal judges and advises Congress - held hearings on this issue. If logic prevails, in the next Congress we may finally see an end to one of the most unjust laws passed in recent memory. And that might correct the biggest mistake of my professional life.

We still cling to 20-year-old ideas that crack is uniquely harmful: It is instantly addictive; it makes you especially violent; it causes women to abandon their babies; the babies of crack users will be basket cases. None of these are true.

Also, because crack is no longer a big news story, people mistakenly believe our anticocaine policy has worked. Not so. There is no scarcity of cocaine. Since 1986, the price of cocaine has fallen and the quality is better. Cocaine deaths have increased. The number of crack users is basically unchanged.

Drug sentences are on the national agenda again because civil rights supporters are justifiably outraged that almost all federal crack prosecutions involve people of color. And indeed, for years no whites were prosecuted for crack offenses in many federal courts, including those in Los Angeles, Chicago, Miami, Denver, Dallas, or Boston.

Because of that, the myth developed that Congress intended to punish blacks - believed to be the crack users - with long sentences and let the white powder cocaine sniffers of Hollywood and Wall Street get away with light sentences. But that's not the case. Congress was trying to remedy a problem it believed afflicted the black community.

A second myth is that Congress chose a 100-to-1 ratio because it determined that crack was 100 times worse than powder cocaine. But the weights chosen (5 and 50 grams, versus 500 and 5,000 grams) weren't based on a comparison of the two drugs. Congress had no clear understanding of drug trafficking - or the metric system - and thought those weights indicated significant trafficking activity. In fact, tons (millions of grams) of cocaine are shipped to the US by the leaders, organizers, and financiers of the international drug trade.

The law was flawed, but the Justice Department still could have used it to target high-level traffickers. But research from the US Sentencing Commission shows that three-quarters of the federal cocaine defendants - both powder and crack - are just neighborhood dealers or couriers.

Congress should do what it tried to do in 1986 - make the Justice Department focus exclusively on high-level cases because state and local law enforcement cannot. There are three elements that would fix the problem: 1) Raise the quantity triggers for all drugs to realistic levels for high-level traffickers, such as 50 or 100 kilos of cocaine, and end the crack/powder imbalance. 2) Require the attorney general to approve prosecution of any case involving less than 50 kilos of cocaine. 3) Analyze federal drug cases district by district to identify agents and prosecutors who waste time and money. If only high-level dealers were being prosecuted by the feds, no one would have cause to complain about the race of the defendants.

A promising sign is that a few months ago, Sen. Jeff Sessions (R) of Alabama, a former US attorney, introduced legislation to address the problem. Action on his bill is unlikely before Congress adjourns, but it had bipartisan support - a good sign that a political fix is viable.

The 20-year-old mistake of tiny quantity triggers has distracted both the Justice Department from the proper cases and reformers from the proper fix.

For a generation, antidrug policy has been built on factual mistakes and tough-sounding rhetoric. The American people simply need an effective policy. Truly, that would be tough enough.

• Eric E. Sterling, president of the nonprofit Criminal Justice Policy Foundation in Silver Spring, Md., was counsel to the House Judiciary Committee, principally responsible for antidrug legislation, from 1979 to 1989.

Man Gets Life Term In Drug Agent's Death (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

Filed at 9:52 a.m. ET

PHOENIX (AP) -- A man accused of masterminding a 1994 robbery plot during which an undercover federal drug agent was killed has been sentenced to life in prison.

Augustin Vasquez-Mendoza, 37, who had been on the FBI's Ten Most Wanted List for four years, was arrested in Mexico in 2000 but not returned to Arizona until 2005. He was alleged to be the leader of a drug ring that produced methamphetamine in Mexico for import to the U.S.

Vasquez-Mendoza was sentenced Monday in Maricopa County Superior Court to life in prison with a possibility of parole after 25 years. The judge added 46 years for kidnapping, assault and armed robbery counts, which must be served after the murder conviction sentence.

As terms of his extradition, U.S. authorities had agreed to waive the death penalty and a life sentence without parole, Drug Enforcement Administration officials said last year.

Federal drug agent Richard Fass, 37, who was posing as a drug dealer, was killed by henchmen of Vasquez-Mendoza in Glendale while trying to buy 22 pounds of methamphetamine from them for $160,000, the government said.

Vasquez-Mendoza wasn't present when Fass was shot, prosecutors said. But he was alleged to have been the mastermind who arranged to have the agent robbed and to have him killed if he resisted.

The other suspects were previously convicted, including Juan Rubio Vasquez, the triggerman and the defendant's half brother, who was sentenced to life in prison with no chance of parole.

Arrests Made In Fentanyl-Laced Heroin Deaths (AP)

AP, November 14, 2006

(AP) PITTSBURGH Ten men have been charged with operating a drug ring in western Pennsylvania that may have been responsible for distributing deadly fentanyl-laced heroin, the U.S. Attorney's Office announced Tuesday.

All face one count of conspiracy to distribute more than one kilogram of heroin, according to criminal complaints filed in U.S. District Court for the Western District of Pennsylvania.

Eight have been arrested and two remain fugitives, U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan said.

Investigators were still collecting evidence to determine whether the men are linked to more than a dozen deaths from fentanyl-laced heroin earlier this year, Buchanan said.

If a federal grand jury determines they are, they could face longer prison sentences, she said.

If convicted, the men face minimum sentences of 10 years in prison.

If connected to any of the deaths, they could be sentenced 20 years to life in prison.

Authorities on Tuesday were investigating the seventh likely heroin overdose in western Pennsylvania in recent days.

Eighteen to 20 people overdosed on fentanyl or fentanyl-laced heroin between late April and mid-August, said Dr. Frederick Fochtman, director and chief toxicologist at the forensic laboratory division of the Allegheny County Medical Examiner's Office.

Hundreds of overdose deaths nationwide have been blamed on heroin laced with fentanyl, an opiate used legally in anesthesia.

Fentanyl is cheaper than heroin and 40 to 100 times more potent than morphine.

Feds Bust 10 In Big Heroin Ring (PPG)

Hazelwood-based group is charged with selling fentanyl-laced drug blamed for 10 deaths

Five months after fentanyl-laced heroin hit the streets of Pittsburgh and racked up at least 10 fatalities and dozens of overdoses, federal officials yesterday announced that they've broken the Hazelwood-based ring believed to be responsible.

Ten people have been charged -- although two are still fugitives -- through criminal complaints by the U.S. attorney's office.

Investigators believe the organization dismantled by "Operation Burnout" is also linked to the spate of heroin overdoses and deaths in the area over the last several days.

U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan said officials do not yet know if the heroin responsible for those deaths was laced with fentanyl, but they have confirmed that it is an especially potent mixture.

She called the Hazelwood group an "elaborate network," though Ms. Buchanan would not reveal the quantity of heroin sold by the organization or the amount of money earned from its sale.

The men were responsible for selling heroin and fentanyl-laced heroin with the names "Get High or Die Trying," "Burnout," "Energizer," "Mayday" and "Chevrolet."

Each defendant is charged with one count of conspiracy to distribute in excess of 1 kilogram of heroin.

Within the next 30 days, the case will be presented to the federal grand jury for indictment.

If convicted, the defendants each could face a mandatory minimum sentence of 10 years in prison. If they are convicted of selling heroin that resulted in a death, the defendants could face mandatory prison terms of 20 years to life, Ms. Buchanan said.

The charges came as a result of monitoring cell phone conversations between three of the drug ring's alleged main players -- Wilford Clark, 26, and Travess Strothers, 27, both of Hazelwood, and Kenneth Johnson, 29, of the North Side -- between June and November.

According to investigators, the men tried to speak in code, referring to quantities of heroin by the names of professional football players. For example, when they spoke about "Emmitt Smith," they were referring to the former Dallas Cowboys player's No. 22. That meant someone wanted to order 22 bricks -- or 1,100 stamp bags -- of heroin.

"As slick as these individuals think they may have been, their criminal activity has come to an end," Ms. Buchanan said.

During the intercepted phone calls, the defendants spoke about the quantity of heroin they needed, as well as its quality.

"They complaining about them Burnouts. ... I'm getting too much lip," Mr. Clark was heard saying on the phone. "As soon as we boost them back up, then these [people] will be scared."

"It was clear that Clark was stating that if the heroin were to be laced or 'boosted' up with fentanyl, the customers who Clark routinely referred to as 'the fiends' would stop complaining," the agent wrote in a court affidavit.

In addition to the cell phone conversations, federal agents used two confidential informants in the case. One, who worked for Wilford Clark, was arrested in June after a search resulted in the seizure of 21 stamp bags of the heroin labeled "Get High or Die Trying."

Several of the defendants were arrested either last week or yesterday morning. Mr. Clark and Mr. Strothers have not yet been taken into custody and are considered fugitives.

Mr. Johnson is believed to be the primary dealer for the organization, while Shakur Muhammad, 35, of Homewood, was responsible for getting the heroin from sources in New Jersey.

Mr. Muhammad was arrested Nov. 3, after visiting his supplier in New Jersey, authorities said. State police, who were cooperating with the Drug Enforcement Administration, stopped Mr. Muhammad, who was speeding, on the Pennsylvania Turnpike near Somerset.

A state trooper requested permission to search his black Jeep Liberty, and Mr. Muhammad consented. Inside, police found a package of diapers, which also included 23,000 stamp bags of heroin, many bearing the label "Chevrolet."

During an interview with a DEA agent, Mr. Muhammad said he had gotten the kilogram of heroin for about $84,000. He also told the agent that he'd been making regular trips to New Jersey and had gotten up to 1,000 bricks of heroin on more than one occasion.

In addition to the arrests in Pittsburgh, the accused supplier of the heroin, Alfurgan Simon, 36, was arrested yesterday morning in Newark, N.J. He will be extradited to the U.S. District Court's Western District of Pennsylvania for prosecution.

As part of the case, officials are asking friends or family members of people who took the fentanyl-laced heroin to contact the Pittsburgh Police Narcotics Squad at 412-323-7761 to help in the investigation.

The "Get High or Die Trying" heroin had addicts clamoring to try it for what they expected to be an intense high. Fentanyl, a painkiller about 80 times stronger than morphine, was added to the heroin to give it an extra kick.

Fentanyl-laced heroin was responsible for hundreds of overdose deaths across the country this year, including here, in Philadelphia, Detroit and Chicago.

Pittsburgh had another problem with fentanyl-laced heroin in 1988. In that "China White" outbreak, 18 people died from injecting heroin laced with 3-methyl fentanyl. That drug was both made and distributed here.

Arrests Shut Deadly Hazelwood Drug Pipeline (PTR)

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, November 15, 2006

Authorities say they have arrested eight members of a Hazelwood drug distribution ring accused of supplying fentanyl-laced heroin that killed at least 18 people in Allegheny County between June and August.

The ring likely supplied heroin that killed seven people across the region in the past week and caused more than a dozen nonfatal overdoses, U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan said Tuesday. Toxicology tests are being conducted to determine if that heroin also was laced with fentanyl, a powerful painkiller.

"This was a very elaborate network that was distributing this deadly drug to desperate drug users," Buchanan said. "But as slick as these individuals think they may have been, their criminal activity has come to an end."

Buchanan announced the arrests of seven men from Hazelwood, Homewood, the Hill District, North Side and East Liberty, and one from New Jersey who is accused of making the deadly mixture in Newark for distribution in Pittsburgh. Two other suspects remained at large yesterday.

The 10 men face charges including possession, distribution and conspiracy to distribute heroin.

Federal agents monitored the drug dealers' cell phone conversations during a five-month investigation dubbed "Operation Burn Out," which included Pittsburgh police and state police, Buchanan said.

If investigators link the suspects to the fatal overdoses and convict them, they could face prison terms of 20 years to life for each death, Buchanan said. The conspiracy and distribution charges carry mandatory minimum prison sentences of 10 years.

"We intend to hold them accountable for the needless deaths that we believe occurred due to their greed," Buchanan said.

Three of the deaths in the past week occurred in Pittsburgh, three in Westmoreland County and one victim was a student at Indiana University of Pennsylvania.

"Drugs, especially heroin, know no geographic or socioeconomic boundaries," said Pittsburgh police Sgt. John Fisher, who heads the federal Weed and Seed unit.

Buchanan said it's too soon to say how much fentanyl-laced heroin the ring distributed locally and how much suppliers profited.

The heroin and fentanyl mixture was distributed in stamp bags marked "Get High or Die Trying," "Burnouts," "Energizer" "Mayday" and "Chevrolet," Buchanan said.

The suspects, during cell phone conversations, often spoke in code when referring to how much of the heroin and fentanyl mix they wanted to distribute, Buchanan said.

They used the names of NFL football players -- such as Emmitt Smith and Donovan McNabb -- whose jersey numbers corresponded to the amount of drugs desired, Buchanan said.

"In the case of Emmitt Smith, his number is 22, so they were referring to the number of bricks they wanted," Buchanan said.

Arrested yesterday were: Eugene Terrell, 18, Kevin Carter, 35, and Wilford Clark, 26, all of Hazelwood; Carlton Williams, 30, of East Liberty; Damon Jackson, 31, of the Hill District; and Alfurgan Simon, 36, of Newark, N.J.

Shakur Muhammad, 35, of Homewood, and Kenneth Johnson, 29, of the North Side, were arrested last week.

Authorities were searching for William Clark, 25, and Travess Strothers, 27, both of Hazelwood.

Muhammad was arrested Nov. 3 while traveling from New Jersey to Pittsburgh, Buchanan said. State police troopers found 460 bricks of heroin stamped "Chevrolet" in his car. A brick contains 50 stamp-sized bags of heroin.

The men will be arraigned Thursday and detention hearings will be held later this week, Buchanan said. Evidence will be presented to a federal grand jury within 30 days, she said.

WTAE-TV, November 14, 2006

PITTSBURGH -- Heroin laced with a powerful painkiller led to 50 overdoses and nine deaths in Pittsburgh and surrounding communities last summer, and now, 10 people face charges for distribution of the drug.

The killer heroin was mixed with Fentanyl, a painkiller about 80 times stronger than morphine.

The deadly drug might have led to several overdoses this past weekend, also, authorities said.

U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan was joined by Pittsburgh Mayor Luke Ravenstahl to talk about the investigation of the huge drug trafficking operation that stretches from New Jersey to Pittsburgh.

If convicted, those arrested could face a maximum sentence of life in prison.

SF Supes: Pot Offenses 'Lowest Law Enforcement Priority' (BCNS)

Bay City News Service, November 14, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- San Francisco supervisors voted Tuesday to make marijuana offenses the Police Department's lowest priority, though prohibitions remain for marijuana sales in public, possession by minors or use by motorists.

"San Francisco should determine its marijuana policy locally, not hand them over to the federal Drug Enforcement Administration," stated the ordinance by Supervisor Tom Ammiano. "Law enforcement resources would be better spent fighting serious and violent crimes."

Ammiano's bill was opposed by supervisors Sean Elsbernd, Michela Alioto-Pier and Fiona Ma.

The law also urges the San Francisco district attorney, Kamala Harris, to make prosecution of marijuana offenses her office's lowest priority. A community oversight committee was also created to monitor implementation of the law.

SF Supes Outlaw Foam Food Containers, Decriminalize Adult Pot Use (SFC)

By Robert Selna, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, November 14, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- The Board of Supervisors voted today to outlaw the use of Styrofoam and other polystyrene products by city restaurants and to effectively decriminalize the use, sale and cultivation of marijuana by adults.

The food container legislation, introduced by Board of Supervisors President Aaron Peskin and approved unanimously on the first of two votes needed for passage, would apply to about 3,400 restaurants in San Francisco as well city facility food service providers and food vendor companies contracting with the city. It is scheduled to be implemented June 1, 2007.

Polystyrene containers are blamed for filling up landfills and breaking down into smaller nonbiodegradable pieces that harm marine and other wildlife when they are ingested.

In passing the ordinance, San Francisco joins number of other cities around the country, including Oakland, Portland, Ore., and Berkeley, which banned Styrofoam and similar products nearly 20 years ago.

The marijuana legislation, which passed on an initial vote 8-3, would set nearly all crimes involving marijuana as the lowest law enforcement priority for city police and urges the district attorney to adopt the same policy when prosecuting criminal defendants.

It passed with the blessing of the police officials, but over the complaints of some residents who say the marijuana trade attracts or occurs along with other criminal activity that undermines the quality of life in their neighborhoods.

Ammiano introduced the legislation in August at the behest of groups pushing for the national decriminalization of marijuana.

KGO-TV, November 14, 2006

San Francisco's Board of Supervisors passed a law that essentially says when it comes to marijuana, the city doesn't much care.

The proposal passed overwhelmingly today and it gets a second reading same time next week, but that's mostly a formality. So for all intesive purposes the city has a new pot policy.

Veronica Gaynor, Fair Oaks Community Coalition: "The police will have to arrest for barking dogs or spitting on the sidewalk before they get to this marijuana."

Members of a mission neighborhood group oppose the new measure which makes marijuana violations by adults on private property the lowest priority for San Francisco police.

The mayor says it simply formalizes what is already city policy.

Gavin Newsom, San Francisco: "I don't see it changing anything what so ever - frankly I think it's just symbolic."

The measure provides some exceptions: allowing crackdowns on those caught driving under the influence, selling pot on public property, if it poses a threat to public safety, and the use and sale involving minors.

Most other marijuana offenses will be a low priority but Police Chief Heather Fong says that doesn't mean her officers will turn a blind eye.

Chief Heather Fong, SFPD: "When there are legitimate criminal behaviors, criminal acts that occur, officers are permitted to enforce the law as they have been."

A public hearing was held yesterday. Some critics believe the measure will undermine San Francisco's medical marijuana clubs.

DOJ_NMG_0094509

Kim Stryker, Fair Oaks Community Coalition: "There's no reason to get a permit for a medical facility, there's no reason to get a medical card - you just go to your neighbor and buy what you want in unlimited amounts according to this legislation."

Supervisor Tom Ammiano calls that an over-reaction. He is the sponsor of the legislation.

Tom Ammiano: "I don't know why the in quotes neighbors, because they aren't my neighbors, keep saying that after we point out that it's not true. Whatever the police are doing now they will continue to do, it's up to them."

San Francisco's new law includes a committee to monitor the implementation. This law is similar to an ordinance passed by Santa Cruz to voters last week.

San Francisco's proposed legislation is similar to a measure passed by Santa Cruz voters this past Election Day. Measure K was approved by more than 60 percent of that city's voters.

It makes marijuana laws the lowest enforcement priority. The new policy pertains to infractions by adults on private property. If the city's police officers don't comply with the new rule, they could find themselves on the receiving end of civil lawsuits.

The Santa Cruz police department is also restricted from cooperating with state and federal authorities when it comes to marijuana investigations or arrests.

Measure K also calls for the creation of a community oversight committee to monitor implementation.

The Santa Cruz ordinance doesn't protect pot use by minors, which is also the case with San Francisco's proposal.

According to the Santa Cruz Sentinel, newspaper, critics worry about a conflict between the state laws officers are sworn to uphold and obeying this ordinance.

California law allows marijuana use only for medical purposes.

Measure K is set to take effect in Santa Cruz by February.

As We See It: Pot Capital? (SCS)

Santa Cruz Sentinel, November 13, 2006

Do the people of Santa Cruz really want marijuana to be what the city is known for?

That question just may be turning into a reality, especially after the passage last week of Measure K.

The ballot measure passed overwhelmingly, although we still believe that a number of voters didn't really understand the full implications of the measure.

It's part of a national effort by a well-funded group that's trying to overturn the nation's marijuana laws. They're going about the effort by picking off far-left towns like Santa Cruz to apparently convince the rest of the country that marijuana ought to be legalized.

We're not convinced that marijuana is really harmless, nor are we convinced that legalizing it is really the smartest move our society could make.

But were it to be legalized, we'd hate to see it done this way, where you end up with "pockets" of marijuana havens like Santa Cruz.

Beyond that, Measure K is setting up some bureaucratic regulations that will be time-consuming and frustrating to follow. How would you like to be a busy city clerk who has to take time to write a letter to federal lawmakers each year, asking them to support legalized marijuana?

Advertisement

Why should the city have to name an "oversight committee" to monitor police reports? Why would any self-respecting police officer work in that kind of atmosphere? It almost guarantees that the best cops will look elsewhere for employment.

The measure also declares that it's city policy to support policies for taxation and regulation of marijuana.

At one time, those who smoked marijuana were considered to be free spirits who flouted the law. But this generation of pot-promoters are more bureaucratic. They seem to be as interested in setting up procedures and policies every bit as much as they are in getting high.

The serious side of this issue is that people shouldn't be encouraged to get high. Marijuana might not be the most dangerous drug in the world, but our society does not need more avenues to self-medication. One more legal way to get high is not something our society needs.

Year in and year out, the local United Way Community Assessment Project report warns that the tolerance of drug use — and abuse — is one of the biggest problems facing this community. Drug and alcohol use by teens is much higher than the state and national averages.

It's no joke. People's lives are made worse because of drug and alcohol use and abuse.

As for Santa Cruz, drug use is a big problem. It's a problem downtown, and don't let anyone tell you otherwise. Marijuana is part of that problem.

We don't think that Santa Cruz ought to be known as a "pot capital" of the world. That's why Measure K is not good for the city, despite the overwhelming vote to approve it.

Ziegler And Company Create A Medical Marijuana Cooperative In Susanville (LN)

Lassen News, November 14, 2006

Nov. 14, 2006 — Once again, the medical marijuana war breaks into an open boil right here in Susanville. Proposition 215, the Compassionate Use Act, was passed by the people of the state of California 10 years ago last week, but the controversial issue still remains unresolved.

To some seriously ill people in our community, the pungent herb is a God-given painkiller that works better than any man-made drug. But to some of our local city leaders and law enforcement officials, it's just plain old dope.

While the battle rages all around him, local medical marijuana farmer Timothy Ziegler, 47, bristles at the suggestion he's a drug dealer.

He always refers to his plants and the big, potent buds he grows in several different rooms of an old commercial building a stone's throw off Main Street as medicine.

He said the drug dealers are out in the bars or in the park hawking their wares to customers who seek a quick buzz. He said that's not him and that's not his purpose.

He said it's easy to see the difference between marijuana the drug and marijuana the medicine once one sees a patient curled up on a couch in a fetal position in excruciating pain take a dose or two of medicine and then be well enough to sit up and eat some food. Maybe even watch a little television.

"You're going to watch this happen and then tell me somebody can't do this?" an incredulous Ziegler asked.

He said most of the medical marijuana users he's encountered use the drug because of chronic pain, but other users include cancer and AIDS patients. Some use the drug to ease their nausea. Others use the drug to help build their appetite and combat wasting.

Ziegler said three local doctors write recommendations for patients to use marijuana as an alternative to stronger, addictive, and to some, more dangerous and damaging pharmaceuticals.

"If I wanted to be a drug dealer, I'd be growing hundreds of plants on federal land," Ziegler said. "I'd be a whole lot richer than I am now. Just look at this place. You can see there's no money in this."

Ziegler, a medical marijuana patient who started using the drug after he was crushed by a wall in a construction accident at a Lake Almanor building site three years ago, said marijuana allows him to have a life without the opiate painkillers he said were stealing his life and reducing him to little more than opiate eyes.

"I've been clean and sober for 22 years," Ziegler said. "I quit doing everything. After 19 years of sobriety, I got crushed, breaking my back and three ribs in nine places, leaving me in constant pain. I have an addictive personality, and taking those pain medications was turning me into a junkie. It just wasn't an option. That's how I got into medical marijuana."

Ziegler said he and 104 other medical marijuana patients have formed the CASA Collective Cooperative — Californians for Safe Access — here in Susanville.

"We're a patient's group," Ziegler said. "We're patients helping patients."

According to Ziegler, the collective has 104 medical marijuana recommendations from Lassen County patients. The recommendations and photocopies of picture ID cards are all gathered in a file folder to show law enforcement officers should the cooperative be raided.

Unfortunately, Ziegler said he couldn't grow enough medicine for so many patients and remain below the federal radar. Federal law does not recognize a medical marijuana defense, and a convicted grower with more than 99 plants faces a mandatory five-year prison sentence. For that reason, Ziegler said he never grows more than about 90 plants. Some counties in California will let a medical marijuana patient have as many as eight mature plants.

"One hundred plants," Ziegler said, "that's the magic number."

Ziegler said he has to travel to the Bay Area to purchase medicine for himself and the other cooperative members. He said that's more expensive for collective members.

"Bob Burns turned me over to the feds," Ziegler said. "I'm prepared for them to come. What I'm doing is federally illegal. When they come, they take everything. It's all gone. It's all confiscated. But in the last five years no one with a legal medical marijuana claim has done more than the booking time in Northeastern California. Jail is an ever-looming threat for me and every patient in the collective. You listen to every sound. Every day you wonder, 'Is today the day.' There's a lot of fear."

Ziegler characterized the issue as a struggle with a group of city leaders who refuse to recognize and follow the laws of the state of California.

"They don't want to acknowledge it," Ziegler said of the medical marijuana law. "They don't want to acknowledge they are subject to the laws and the Constitution of the state of California in this city."

While a city ordinance makes it illegal to operate a medical marijuana dispensary in Susanville, Ziegler said the cooperative gets around that restriction by operating a delivery service.

Ziegler said he's very careful to make sure the medicine he grows remains medicine and doesn't wind up as illegal drugs on the street.

"I'm guilty of doing what I despise — profiling," Ziegler said. "We don't want to be involved with anyone if we're suspicious they're distributing medicine to other people. All it would take is one incident, and they (the authorities) would have everything they needed."

While there might be big money in drug dealing, Ziegler said growing medical marijuana is a not-for-profit venture.

When he can't grow enough medical marijuana for the patients Ziegler makes a trip to another cooperative to purchase medicine.

Trips to the Bay Area to purchase medicine cost about $600 in gas, food and lodging. A pound of medical marijuana from another cooperative costs about $4,000. The patient pays about $250 per ounce.

"There's just no profit in it," Ziegler said. "It's not there. Do the math."

Ziegler said given the overhead and the high cost of electricity there's not much profit in the plants he grows himself. He said each plant grown indoors yields about 2-1/2 ounces of medicine. Keeping under the federal sentencing limit of less than 100 plants limits how much medicine Ziegler can grow for the cooperative's patients.

The cooperative has five employees and is open from noon to 8 p.m. Tuesday through Saturday. Ziegler said the cooperative is a non-profit corporation that keeps regular business records, pays taxes and worker's compensation just like any other business except Ziegler's not entitled to sell, only seek reimbursement for time and materials.

Ziegler said he starts cloned plants hydroponically so they develop a strong root structure.

He said his plants are all grown organically without any pesticides or chemicals, which could be harmful to some patients. For example, mites, a typical pest for marijuana gardners, are controlled with ladybugs.

Once the small plants are strong, they're moved to a second "veg room" where they sit under grow lights nearly 24-hours per day. The plants grow rapidly in this environment.

Finally the plants are moved to a "sleep room" where the number of hours of light per day is gradually diminished. Marijuana plants are light sensitive, so the buds form and grow larger as the number of hours of light the plants receive each day is reduced.

Finally, the buds are trimmed, cured and dried before they are bagged and used as medicine.

The entire process of the indoor grow reduces the plants' life cycle from eight or 10 months to two or three months. A plant grown outside could yield as much as one pound of medicine.

Ziegler staunchly defends his right to do what he's doing under California law.

"If I'm doing something wrong, how come I'm still here doing this two years later?" Ziegler asked.

Nashua Telegraph, November 15, 2006

CONCORD – A Mexican national man who was arrested in June after he delivered nearly 2 kilograms of cocaine to a Nashua residence, was convicted Monday on federal drug trafficking and immigration charges, First Assistant U.S. Attorney Joseph Laplante said.

Francisco David Avalos-Morfin, 38, of Mexico, pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in Concord as part of a plea agreement charging him with conspiracy to distribute more than 500 grams of cocaine and unlawful re-entry into the United States, Laplante said.

Avalos-Morfin has been jailed since June 5 when agents working as part of a federal drug task force arrested him and other man, Aurelio Bonilla, 29,drop off a plastic bag containing two white, powdery bricks at a Nashua residence, Laplante said.

The two bricks encased in shrink wrap were later verified to be cocaine, approximately 1,955 grams, Laplante said, which according to local police has a Nashua street value of about $100 a gram, or $195,500.

Avalos-Morfin, who was living in Fitchburg, Mass., when he was arrested, was the leader of a Mexican drug ring, according to a Drug Enforcement Administration agent's affidavit filed in the case.

Telephone conversations arranging the drug transaction between Avalos-Morfin and an informant working with DEA officials began April 29 and continued through May, leading up to the June 5 delivery, according to the affidavit.

By that time the DEA informant, who received several unannounced visits from Avalos-Morfin during that time, had managed to negotiate a price of $48,000 for the cocaine.

Although that amount of money was never exchanged during the investigation, all of the money that was exchanged was returned, Laplante said.

The investigation was headed by the New England Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force and included members of Nashua, Manchester and state police departments, according to a statement from the U.S. attorney's office.

Officials from the federal Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement assisted Laplante in prosecuting Avalos-Morfin on the immigration charges, the statement said.

Avalos-Morfin faces a 40-year maximum federal prison sentence for the drug charges alone, but will more likely receive a sentence much closer to the five-year minimum he must serve on the charge, Laplante said, who estimated about 10 years for both drug and immigration charges.

"But sentencing is up to the court," he added.

A sentencing hearing has been set for Feb. 22 in U.S. District Court in Concord.

Avalos-Morfin has been deported from the United States on two other occasions, the first in 1996 from Nogales, N.M., and the second time in 2004 from Bakersfield, Calif., Laplante said.

Laplante could not say where in Mexico Avalos-Morfin is from.

Federal court records show that in the summer of 2003 he was sentenced to 18 months in prison for the re-entering the country after having been deported.

Once he has served his time, Avalos-Morfin will again be deported to Mexico, Laplante said.

Bonilla, who is a U.S. citizen, was charged with conspiracy to distribute cocaine, more than 500 grams, according to court records. That charge is still pending.

Colombia President Lobbies US Congress For Free Trade (WSJ/DJ)

BOGOTA (Dow Jones)--Colombian President Alvaro Uribe is lobbying the U.S. Congress on labor issues to build support for an extension of trade preferences granted to his country and for a free trade agreement between both nations that has yet to be signed and ratified.

Uribe, who traveled to Washington for two days, tried to convince U.S. legislators that the labor situation is improving in his country.

The Colombian president told Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., that his government is working hard to protect labor union leaders, forbid child labor and boost the minimum wage.

Colombia's labor laws and environmental standards have been criticized by U.S. Democrats in several trade deals in the past, said Alberto Ramos, a New York-based analyst with Goldman Sachs.

"Legislators want to make sure trade is free and that labor standards aren't too low in the other country so that companies don't get an unfair advantage," Ramos said.

Colombia is considered one of the most dangerous countries on earth for labor unions. About 56 union activists have been killed so far this year, according to the countries' unions. The Colombian government says that 46 union leaders and unionized workers have been killed so far in 2006.

More than 3,800 union leaders and activists have been assassinated since the mid-1980s, according to the John F. Henning Center for International Labor Relations at the University of California Berkley.

Also, about 1.6 million children were working in Colombia in 2001, according to the most recent figures available from the government, while the non-profit organization Save the Children estimates that 2.5 million children are working in the country.

The Colombian government wants the U.S. Congress to extend the trade preferences Colombian producers enjoy at least until a free-trade agreement reached by both countries takes effect. The preferences are scheduled to expire on Dec. 31.

Colombia hopes the extension of the trade preferences will be followed by the ratification of the free-trade agreement by the U.S. Congress.

"It is important to get the preferences, but investors liken preferences to a unilateral decision that is unstable in the future," Uribe said after meeting Rangel. "They don't give certainty so that people make the investments Colombia requires to create enough jobs and to have the means to overcome poverty," he added.

Rangel, who will likely take over the chairmanship of the House Ways and Means Committee next year, said the U.S. Congress will review the free trade agreement but won't "reopen" the negotiations.

Last week, Rangel said he wouldn't support free trade agreements reached with Peru and Colombia unless the labor provisions are renegotiated. Congressional Democrats say the pacts' labor provisions are inadequate.

Congress authorized the Andean Trade Preferences Act, or ATPA, in 1991 to allow Colombia, Peru, Ecuador and Bolivia to export many products to the U.S. duty free, with the goal of creating new economic alternatives to the illegal cocaine trade. Congress renewed and enhanced the program in 2002.

The Bush administration hopes to replace the ATPA with the free-trade agreements.

The free-trade agreement between Colombia and the U.S. is scheduled to be signed by both governments on Nov. 22 but will still need to be ratified by the legislatures of both countries. For Peru, the agreement only needs to be ratified by the U.S. Congress.

Several U.S. official have asked Congress to extend the trade preferences, echoing requests made by Peruvian and Colombian officials.

Peru Still Hopes For US Free-Trade Pact Approval - Envoy (WSJ/DJ)

Wall Street Journal/Dow Jones, November 14, 2006

LIMA (Dow Jones)--Peru hopes that the U.S. Congress will approve an already-negotiated free trade agreement, but opposes reopening the pact to make changes to labor standards, the Peruvian government's trade envoy to the U.S., Hernando de Soto, said.

DOJ_NMG_0094514

Peru's Congress has approved the deal, worked out by the executive branches in both nations, but the deal has yet to be approved in the U.S. Congress, where recent election gains by members of the Democratic party could weaken support for free-trade deals.

"Everyone is in agreement that we have to fight for the deal now, as we have more possibilities to make our points in 2006, since in 2007 it appears that the situation for more free trade deals will deteriorate," de Soto, an economist, said in a radio interview.

The Peruvian government opposes reopening the pact, de Soto added.

"Our strategy is to not accept a change in the free trade deal itself, for some simple reasons. One is that the negotiations have been closed and to reopen them would be to reopen the contract, and possibly to take it past the date that the government of the U.S. has for the authorization for the negotiations with U.S., which is June 2007," he said.

The Peruvian government is open, however, to the idea of including improvements to labor standards, but in a side deal, he said.

Some politicians in the U.S. have been pushing for U.S. trading partners to comply with international labor standards.

De Soto also said that the Peruvian government wants an extension to the current trade deal that allows products from some Andean nations to enter into the U.S. with reduced tariffs. That deal, known as the Andean Pact Trade and Drug Enforcement Agreement, or APTDEA, is set to expire at the end of this year.

Prime Minister Jorge del Castillo said at a press conference Monday that if the overall free trade deal isn't approved, then it is almost "a done deal" that an extension to the APTDEA will be approved. That agreement has allowed for Peruvian textile exports to expand sharply.

Peru started the free trade talks alongside Colombia and Ecuador in 2004.

While Colombia and Peru reached deals with the U.S., talks between Ecuador and the U.S. fell apart, although the pact has become an issue in the current election campaign in Ecuador.

Colombian and Peruvian officials continue to meet with U.S. legislators to gain support for the trade initiatives.

JP Morgan said in a report Tuesday that, "FTA ratification may take the back seat for now, but it is likely to take place sometime in the first half of 2007."

Wall Street Journal/Dow Jones, November 14, 2006

NEW YORK (Dow Jones)--Amid an increasingly uncertain political climate in the U.S. for free trade, Peru and Colombia have sent delegations to Washington this week to lobby for their respective bilateral agreements.

Their efforts come after the House of Representatives failed to pass legislation late Monday granting permanent normal trade status to Vietnam. While lawmakers could approve the measure under a different rule, the Monday vote was a setback for President George W. Bush's administration, which is expected to see its trade policy stymied by a Democrat-controlled legislature.

Given the murky environment for free trade deals, Wall Street investment firms are sounding more sure that the Peru and Colombia FTAs won't be considered in the U.S. Congress until next year.

"We do not discard that the Democratic Congress may decide to support the FTA signings with Peru and Colombia given their friendly and strategic relationship with the US," HSBC said in a Tuesday research note. "However, we are not optimistic that will happen any time soon."

Peru's FTA has already been ratified in the Andean country's legislature. Colombia and the U.S. still need to sign their deal, a step that President Alvaro Uribe said should took place on Nov. 22.

Goldman Sachs said Tuesday the U.S. government has told Peru that "due to the current political juncture," it will not send the FTA to Congress for a vote "for at least a number of weeks." In Goldman Sachs' calculations, this timeline would also push legislative approval of the Peru deal until sometime in 2007. JPMorgan echoed this view in a Tuesday report as well, saying "FTA ratification may take the backseat for now."

Analysts have said it was far more likely that the Bush administration would push for renewal of the Andean Trade Preference Act during the current Congress' lame-duck session. Deputy U.S. Trade Representative John Veroneau confirmed this approach on Tuesday, saying the government is seeking to extend those preferences "in a timely fashion, so as to minimize any business disruptions." The ATPA, which is scheduled to expire at year-end, eliminates duties on many imports from Colombia, Peru, Ecuador and Bolivia in exchange for drug-control measures.

In the case of Ecuador, whose free trade talks with the U.S. ran aground after the country rescinded an operating contract with Occidental Petroleum (OXY) and took over the company's oilfields, a one-year extension of the Andean trade preferences is "the most Ecuador can aspire to," Goldman Sachs said.

Temporary renewal of the preferences for Colombia and Peru, which have enjoyed much better relations with the U.S., is also crucial in the absence of full FTAs.

Speaking about Colombia, Credit Suisse said in a Tuesday report that "failing to secure at least the extension of preferential trade benefits would impact negatively the country's external accounts, investment prospects, and employment capacity."

The fate of Peru and Colombia's FTAs will depend largely on what kinds of additional labor provisions Democrats will seek when the new Congress convenes. Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., who is in line to helm the House Ways and Means Committee, said last week the labor provisions in both countries' deals need to be renegotiated. But Peru, for its part, is resistant to altering the agreement.

"Our strategy is not to accept a change in the free trade deal itself, for some simple reasons," Hernande de Soto, Peru's trade envoy to the U.S., said in a Tuesday radio interview. "One is that the negotiations have been closed and to reopen them would be to reopen the contract, and possibly to take it past" the expiration of the Bush administration's Trade Promotion Authority in June 2007.

Under TPA, lawmakers can vote yes or no on deals but not amend them. This fast-track authority passed by a slim margin when it last came up for renewal, and its extension is not widely expected for next year.

"At this point, it is unclear whether (the Colombia FTA) will be approved next year before President Bush's trade negotiating authority expires in mid-2007," Credit Suisse said.

IMMIGRATION:

Fingerprint Database Lets Police Identify Criminal Immigrants (AP)

By Jeremiah Marquez, The Associated Press

LOS ANGELES - Jesus F. Palacios was arrested last month after sheriff's deputies spotted him trying to jimmy a car door.

Using newly acquired access to federal immigration files, they scanned his fingerprints into a database at the police station and instantly determined the 30-year-old Mexican was a previously deported illegal immigrant with a criminal record.

Deputies alerted federal authorities and got an order to hold Palacios on suspicion of immigration violations. He had been removed from the U.S. at least three times after being convicted of child molestation and grand theft auto.

In the past, suspects like Palacios may have been freed on bail as deputies waited for hours for federal and state officials to do a background check.

But now, as part of a post-Sept. 11 crackdown, the Department of Homeland Security and the Justice Department are working to give local authorities rapid access to fingerprint data that can help determine if suspects under arrest are in this country illegally.

"It has been a tremendous advantage to local law enforcement," said Los Angeles County sheriff's Lt. Larry Bryant, who manages the database. "There would be a very good chance these people would be undetected and be released if we didn't have this capability."

The Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department and nearly 50 other Southern California police and law enforcement agencies have been given rapid access to federal records on criminal immigrants. So have the police in Boston and Dallas.

The U.S. government intends to make information available to all local law enforcement agencies in the nation within two years to help catch criminal immigrants, people with ties to terrorist groups, and others who pose a threat.

"We need more people on the ground with information who can act," said Robert Mocny, acting director of the Home Security visitor-technology program.

Civil rights advocates worry that enlisting local authorities could chill relations in communities where police rely on immigrants to come forward with information about crimes without fearing their own status will be checked.

"The No. 1 tool law enforcement uses to solve crimes is law enforcement-community cooperation," said John Trasvina, president of the Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund.

In Los Angeles County, Bryant said there is no indication officers have arrested people just to check their immigration status. "We've got better things to do," he said.

This year, federal authorities have placed immigration holds on more than 6,700 inmates in jails operated by the Sheriff's Department, according to the government.

Since police in Los Angeles County started using the database in September, they have identified and detained about 130 illegal immigrants with criminal records.

Among them were:

- A 31-year-old Mexican national deported in 1999 after being convicted of attempted extortion. He was arrested in East Los Angeles in September on suspicion of the same crime.

- A 36-year-old Mexican man with convictions for burglary and taking a car without consent. He was twice deported, and caught once attempting to cross the border. In September, he was arrested by the Sheriff's Department on suspicion of carrying a concealed or loaded firearm registered to someone else.

In most cases, local authorities cannot legally hold suspects longer than four hours before releasing them on bail or with a citation, Bryant said. However, it often took the FBI and state agencies longer than that to check a suspect's fingerprints and return results, he said.

The new database - housed in the Sheriff's Department and accessible to other law enforcement agencies in the county - cuts that time to minutes.

If there is a match, the agency contacts a federal law enforcement center in Burlington, Vt., to request an immigration hold. The suspect is turned over to federal authorities only after the local criminal case has been resolved.

Palacios faces charges of failing to register as a sex offender and using fake citizenship papers. He was not charged with trying to break into the car because it belonged to an acquaintance, authorities said.

More Immigrants Seeking Asylum Cite Gang Violence (WP)

By N.C. Aizenman

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

Increasing numbers of Salvadorans, Hondurans and Guatemalans are entering the United States illegally and applying for asylum on the grounds that their lives are imperiled by gang violence in their home countries, according to immigration lawyers and advocacy groups.

Although the number granted asylum barely surpassed 700 last year, asylum applications by people from those three countries have almost doubled, which lawyers attribute primarily to fear of gang violence.

The lawyers hope to persuade judges to more readily grant asylum to those who have risked reprisal by resisting extortion demands by gangs, testifying against gang members, renouncing their own membership in gangs or trying to avoid being forced to join gangs.

Gang violence has grown to epidemic proportions in the three countries since the mid-1990s, when the United States began sending Central American-born members of the rival Los Angeles-based Mara Salvatrucha and Mara 18 gangs back to their home countries. The deportees helped fuel the rise of ferocious sister gangs in Central America, whose estimated 60,000 members are now battling each other, the police and residents in hundreds of communities.

Many of those who say they fled gangs end up in the Washington area, which has one of the nation's largest Central American immigrant populations.

Jose Hernandez, a soft-spoken 19-year-old currently living in a shelter in the District, said he left El Salvador in 2004 after a close friend was gunned down in his home town of Yayantique. Both Hernandez and his friend had been resisting entreaties to join MS-13.

A few days later, Hernandez said, several tattooed gang members grabbed him on the street, held a knife against his stomach and warned him to join "or you'll end up like your friend."

Such accounts are common, said Eric Sigmon, who runs a project for the National Center for Refugee and Immigrant Children that finds pro bono lawyers for unaccompanied minors stopped at the U.S. border. Of the roughly 1,500 Central American children interviewed since the project began 16 months ago, about half cited fear of gang violence as a reason for embarking on the dangerous trek north.

"These are not kids who are leaving just because they feel like it one day," Sigmon said.

Brittney Nystrom of the Capital Area Immigrants' Rights Coalition, which provides a similar service to adult illegal immigrants held in five detention centers in Virginia, said that "literally every week" she comes across an illegal immigrant who left his or her country because of gang violence or fears returning because of it.

Immigration lawyers have responded with a budding effort to win asylum for their clients. And the growing awareness of gang violence may well explain why the number of Salvadorans, Hondurans and Guatemalans filing asylum claims in U.S. immigration courts jumped from about 7,000 in fiscal 2004 to more than 13,000 in fiscal 2006.

Geoff Thale, an expert on Central American gangs at the Washington Office on Latin America, a nonprofit advocacy group, dates the trend to spring 2005, when asylum lawyers first began contacting him for background information on gangs in Central America. Since then, Thale has received about 100 such calls, two or three a week.

But asylum claims are hardly an easy route to legalization: Only 721 Salvadorans, Hondurans and Guatemalans were granted asylum for any reason in fiscal 2005.

U.S. law requires that an applicant prove his fear of violence is credible and that the threat is based on his race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group or political opinion. Immigration judges have frequently ruled against applicants who were victims of gangs because of bad luck or who have faced conscription by a gang simply because they were young and male.

But some judges have been amenable to more nuanced arguments.

Last year, an immigration judge based in Arlington County granted asylum to a 14-year-old Salvadoran boy whose father had a dispute with gang members. After the father died, gang members began harassing the boy -- at one point beating him so badly they broke his arm, according to the boy's attorney, Christina Wilkes of the D.C.-based immigrant assistance center Ayuda.

"The judge found that my client was persecuted based on belonging to his family and that this constituted membership in a 'particular social group' protected under asylum law," Wilkes said. The boy now lives with an uncle in Northern Virginia.

Several lawyers also have argued that someone who faces retaliation for refusing to join a gang for religious reasons or because he opposes the gang's values is being persecuted based on a political view and is therefore eligible for asylum. Wilkes, who also represents Hernandez, said she is hoping to argue that in his case.

Former gang members who worry that they will be killed as punishment for defecting sometimes have been recognized as a protected group by immigration judges. But those judges are often reluctant to grant asylum to former members, opting instead for a less-generous form of relief known as "withdrawal of removal."

Those granted withdrawal of removal cannot receive federal assistance or apply for permanent residency. The decision permits U.S. authorities to deport immigrants to someplace other than their home country. In practice, however, they are allowed to remain in the United States indefinitely.

That was relief enough for attorney Jason Dzubow's client, a 29-year-old construction worker who faced deportation back to El Salvador after he was picked up for driving while intoxicated in Virginia.

During an interview in Dzubow's presence, the construction worker, who said he was fearful of being identified by name, said he grew up in a neighborhood of the city of San Miguel that was so dominated by gangs that the corpses of their victims would remain on the street because no one dared move them. He said he was forced to join MS-13 when he was a teenager but fled to the District when gang members handed him a gun and ordered him to kill a cousin belonging to the rival Mara 18 gang.

The construction worker, who is married to a U.S. citizen and has two U.S.-born children, had since tried to cover a large "1" and "3" tattooed on his right and left shoulders with new tattoos of snarling panthers. But he was terrified that other MS-13 members on his deportation flight would see through the ruse and realize he had tried to renounce the gang -- a virtual death sentence.

When the judge ruled that he could stay in the United States, his wife recalled, "it was almost like he couldn't breathe."

"It was incredible," he agreed. "I felt like I was reborn."

Martinez Hits 'Enforcement Only' (WT)

By Stephen Dinan And Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, November 15, 2006

Sen. Mel Martinez, President Bush's choice to become chairman of the Republican National Committee, said his goal will be to undo the election damage done by the border-enforcement-first message of most Republicans -- which he called "harshness only."

Mr. Martinez's nomination -- which must be approved by the RNC at its January meeting -- is Mr. Bush's first major political step since last week's elections, and it is already creating division among rank-and-file Republicans, who say it puts the party on the wrong side of the immigration issue.

"I would say it's another Harriet Miers moment," said Randy Pullen, an RNC committee member from Arizona, referring to the doomed pick for the Supreme Court.

Mr. Bush announced the nomination in the Oval Office, saying Mr. Martinez would keep his Florida Senate seat and serve as honorary chairman, or the public face of the party. Mr. Bush also nominated Mike Duncan, the RNC's general counsel, as chairman responsible for day-to-day operations, and asked Jo Ann Davidson to remain co-chairman.

Chairman Ken Mehlman is not seeking to remain in office.

Speaking to reporters after the Oval Office announcement, Mr. Martinez said he was "not going to do a post-mortem on the election here today." Moments later, though, he did a post-mortem on immigration, saying he saw a clear message on that issue.

"I think we have to understand that the election did speak to one issue, and that was that -- it's not about bashing people, it's about presenting a hopeful face," said Mr. Martinez, who won his seat in 2004.

He was one of the authors of the Senate compromise that would have allowed most illegal aliens to remain in the United States and pay small fines in return for a path to citizenship.

"Border security only, enforcement only, harshness only is not the message that I believe America wants to convey," Mr. Martinez said.

His proposal passed the Senate, though a majority of Republicans voted against it. The House, however, passed an enforcement-first strategy. Even the RNC voted unanimously in August to adopt a resolution calling for border and interior enforcement, and Mr. Pullen said Mr. Martinez as chairman would run contrary to that message.

Rejecting Mr. Steele raised hackles among some RNC members, who traditionally rubber-stamp a sitting president's choice for chairman. Members wondered whether the choice of Mr. Martinez was a signal of Mr. Bush's desire to focus more on burnishing his presidential legacy, rather than on rebuilding a winning party for 2008.

"I don't know whether this is Harriet Miers and cronyism all over again, since I don't know that much about Martinez and his relationship with Bush and Rove," said Texas RNC member Bill Crocker, referring to the White House adviser.

"But I wish they wouldn't try to control this thing, the way this White House micromanages everything. We'd be better off with an independent voice to support the president and work for the good of the party."

Dr. Buddy Witherspoon, an RNC member from Columbia, S.C., said a black conservative such as Mr. Steele would have been an "excellent choice." But Dr. Witherspoon, who is white, worried just how much Mr. Steele, Mr. Martinez or anyone whom "Karl Rove chooses" will be able to speak for the future of the Republican Party.

As Mr. Bush pushes the RNC in his direction on immigration, House Republicans move the other way, with Rep. Mike Pence of Indiana, a contender for the House minority leader's post, saying yesterday that he will oppose Mr. Bush's bill.

"What is coming at us now is going to be a massive amnesty bill that will likely be propounded not only by Democrats in the House and Senate, but frankly also by the White House," he said in an interview with radio host Laura Ingraham.

Conservatives Wary Of Choice To Lead RNC (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten And Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush's decision to back Sen. Mel Martinez to help lead the Republican Party, a move intended to appeal to disaffected Latino voters, drew sharp criticism Tuesday from some of the party's core conservatives, who disdain the Florida lawmaker's support for liberalized immigration laws.

The decision to name the Cuban-born Martinez as Republican National Committee general chairman served as an acknowledgment that the GOP had lost ground among Latinos; in last week's midterm election, the Republican share of the Latino vote dropped to 30% from more than 40% in 2004. Party leaders have said they need to build more support among Latinos for the GOP to regain its dominance.

Martinez supported legislation to create a guest worker program and a path to citizenship for many immigrants who are in this country illegally; Bush and many Latinos also backed versions of that plan. But the legislation that passed the Senate this year created a firestorm of opposition among conservative Republicans and much of the House GOP leadership, who derided it as amnesty for lawbreakers.

Criticism of Martinez came Tuesday from several conservatives, including Curly Haugland, an RNC member from North Dakota, who said he believed the party was far too focused on pandering to minorities.

"We're losing our base in droves because they don't get campaigned to," he said, referring to GOP-leaning conservatives.

Randy Pullen of Arizona, another RNC member and an activist against illegal immigration, likened Martinez's selection to the episode last year in which Bush named his longtime friend and legal counsel to the Supreme Court, only to reverse himself after a furious conservative backlash.

"I'm hoping that it's not another Harriet Miers moment," Pullen said.

Another leading critic of Bush's stance on immigration, Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), chairman of the Congressional Immigration Reform Caucus, offered tepid support for Martinez.

Tancredo called the senator a "competent spokesman for our party," but added that if he "rejects the will of rank-and-file Republicans and uses the position to advocate for things like the president's amnesty proposal, then I believe the party could be headed for another shellacking at the polls in 2008."

Members of the Republican National Committee will meet in January to replace outgoing Chairman Ken Mehlman, who will leave after a two-year term in which an aggressive minority outreach effort was hampered by the immigration debate and other issues.

Despite the unhappiness among some RNC members over Martinez's selection, he is expected to win election as general chairman, making him the GOP's most visible spokesman leading up to the 2008 presidential election. The party's general counsel, Robert M. "Mike" Duncan, is expected to become RNC chairman and run day-to-day operations.

Bush introduced Martinez in a brief Oval Office ceremony Tuesday as his recommended pick for the party leadership.

The selection, which became public Monday, made it clear that Bush and his chief political strategist, Karl Rove, believed the party's future depended on striking a moderate image on immigration. It also suggested that the White House saw the party's support for get-tough legislation on the issue as contributing to its midterm election losses.

Conservative lawmakers not only stopped Bush's guest worker plan in Congress this year, but they passed a law calling for 700 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border. Bush signed the legislation in the waning days of the campaign in hopes of galvanizing conservative voters.

But the move failed to save several Republican candidates who had called for an illegal-immigration crackdown. And exit polls suggested that many Latinos abandoned the GOP as a reaction to rhetoric that they viewed as negative toward all immigrants, legal and illegal.

Martinez demonstrated Tuesday that he would not shy away from the vision of immigration laws that he and Bush had long supported. Emerging from his White House meeting with the president, he told reporters that his party struck the wrong tone on immigration during the election, a tone he promised to change. "Border security only, enforcement only, harshness only, is not the message that I believe America wants to convey," he said.

Martinez, 60, whose full name is Melquiades Rafael Martinez, fled Cuba at age 15 with assistance from a program that helped children leave the communist country. He lived with foster families until he was reunited with his family four years later.

A trial lawyer, he was the elected chairman of Orange County, Fla., and was later chosen by Bush to be housing secretary. In 2004, he became the first Cuban American to be elected to the Senate.

Latino leaders and Republican strategists said elevating Martinez's profile could rebuild goodwill among minority voters.

"You take a Hispanic senator who happens to be Catholic, and that's a direct response to a community that happens to be disappointed," said Al Cardenas, a former chairman of the Republican Party of Florida who, like Martinez, was born in Cuba but moved to the U.S. to flee Fidel Castro.

The Rev. Luis Cortes Jr., founder of the influential Philadelphia-based ministry Esperanza USA, who has been courted by the White House over the last six years, said Martinez's selection made an important statement to conservatives who had backed strict proposals, such as one that would have made it a felony to help illegal immigrants.

"A lot of the Republican candidates chose immigration as the wedge issue, and polls seem to bear out that it was an error for them to do that," Cortes said. "And I think Mel Martinez, because of his life story, is a perfect person to help them find their way back from that era."

White House political director Sara Taylor said Martinez could "communicate with the fastest-growing population in a way they can relate to."

She added that he would prove crucial in building Latino support in a post-Bush era. "We've seen in the last election that the president's popularity [with Latinos] is not transferable to House and Senate candidates," Taylor said.

Martinez will remain in the Senate. He won his seat there in 2004, after the White House urged him to run.

GOP strategists said Martinez would help build support for the party in Florida, a 2008 battleground state.

Martinez said he would remain neutral in the Republican presidential primaries, though he appeared during this year's campaign with one leading contender, Arizona Sen. John McCain, after they both endorsed Florida Gov.-elect Charlie Crist in his primary.

Even with Republicans soon to be in the minority on Capitol Hill, there is no assurance that an immigration overhaul package will pass. The Democrats preparing to take power in the House and Senate are also struggling with their approach to the issue.

Democratic leaders are trying to balance their desire to woo Latino voters with concerns from some labor leaders that new immigration laws would lead to lower wages.

Moreover, some in the party fear that passing a guest worker program and pathway to citizenship for illegal immigrants would leave Democrats vulnerable to being portrayed as soft on illegal immigration.

Martino: U.S.-Mexico Fence Plan Inhumane (AP)

By Frances D'emilio

AP, November 15, 2006

A top Vatican official on Tuesday denounced a U.S. plan to build more fences along the Mexican border as "inhumane," and compared the project to the Cold War-era Berlin Wall.

DOJ_NMG_0094521

Cardinal Renato Martino, who heads the Holy See's office concerned with migrant and itinerant peoples, urged the United States to allow more foreigners to enter legally.

"I must note, unfortunately, that in a world which greeted with joy the fall of the Berlin Wall, others are being erected between neighborhood and neighborhood, city and city, nation and nation," he said at a news conference to present Pope Benedict XVI's annual message about migrants.

Bishops in the U.S. and Mexico have opposed Washington's plan to build 690 miles of additional fencing along the border and on Tuesday, Martino praised their stance against what he called an "inhumane" project.

The law authorizing the fence was signed on Oct. 26 by President Bush, who called it "an important step in our nation's efforts to secure our borders."

An estimated 11 million Mexicans live in the United States, about half of whom are undocumented.

Martino also denounced trafficking in humans — particularly women forced to become prostitutes and children forced into labor.

"This trafficking in human beings has intensified, persons put into slavery because they depend on certain criminals who take possession of these human beings," he said.

He said human trafficking today is worse than the trade in African slaves of past centuries.

"It's worse than the slavery of those ... taken from Africa and brought to other countries," he said, but did not cite any figures.

A 2005 State Department report on human trafficking estimated that 600,000 to 800,000 men, women and children are trafficked across borders each year — 80 percent of them women.

The cardinal challenged countries to combat modern-day slavery.

"In a world which proclaims human rights left and right, let's see what it does about the rights of so many human beings which are not respected, but trampled," the cardinal said.

'Guest Workers' Sue Companies Over Pay (USAT)

By Laura Parker

USA Today, November 15, 2006

Armenio Pablo-Calmo, a Guatemalan national, spent six winters as a tree planter in the pine forests of the South as part of a "guest worker" program that is required under federal law to pay him the prevailing wage for such jobs.

That ranges from $6.32 an hour in North Carolina to $9.20 an hour in Alabama, according to the U.S. Labor Department. Pablo-Calmo says he and his co-workers were paid less than the federal minimum wage of $5.15 an hour, were not paid overtime and often were required to pay for their own tools, visas and travel costs. Last year, they sued Eller and Sons Trees, their employer, for back wages and reimbursement of out-of-pocket costs.

A federal judge classified the case as a class-action lawsuit on Sept. 28; the case now involves about 6,000 tree planters. It is drawing national attention as one of several legal challenges to the H-2B visa program, which admits 66,000 foreigners into the USA each year to do temporary manual labor. As President Bush has proposed tripling the number of such visas issued each year, the H-2B program has come under criticism from the Southern Poverty Law Center and other groups that say it has been used by employers to exploit guest workers.

The center, which filed the lawsuit involving Pablo-Calmo, also has sued three other forestry companies as well as a hotel chain on behalf of foreigners who have worked at 15 hotels in New Orleans since Hurricane Katrina. One of the forestry suits was settled in September, when Idaho-based Alpha Services agreed to pay a group of Latino workers an undisclosed sum for back pay and travel costs, according to court papers.

"We hope this has a huge impact and other employers see they cannot just choose to hire guest workers and then abuse them with no consequences," says Mary Bauer, an attorney at the law center.

Organized labor has long opposed the H-2B program and other guest-worker initiatives, arguing that they are used to abuse immigrants and undermine wages for U.S. citizens. Eller and Sons and other employers targeted in the lawsuits reject the notion of any abuse and say that such programs help fill jobs most Americans won't do.

Larry Stine, an Atlanta lawyer who represents the four forestry companies, says that the claims in the lawsuits are "overblown" and that the workers are overstating their hours on the job.

"This is not a case about people being exploited," he says.

The Ellers' suit also accuses the firm's recruiters in Guatemala of requiring laborers to hand over deeds to their property to get jobs in the USA. Stine says the company was unaware of the practice until the lawsuit was filed and that it has been stopped. He says workers were asked to leave deeds with recruiters temporarily to try to ensure the workers would return to Guatemala.

Border Vigilantism Alleged In Ariz. Case (WP)

By Tim Gaynor

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

BISBEE, Ariz., Nov. 14 -- A rancher accused of holding a Mexican American family at gunpoint went on trial in this southern Arizona town Tuesday in a case highlighting border vigilantism, rights groups said.

Roger Barnett is being tried at Cochise County Superior Court, 90 miles southeast of Tucson, in a civil suit brought by two local families seeking more than $200,000 in damages over an incident during a hunting jaunt two years ago.

Ronald and Renee Morales say their family was assaulted, battered and falsely imprisoned by Barnett during the deer hunting trip on Oct. 30, 2004. All are U.S. citizens of Mexican heritage.

In court documents, the family said Barnett loaded an assault rifle and leveled it at the group, then harangued and abused the couple, their two daughters and the daughter of another family also named in the suit.

Barnett, who runs a tow-truck company in the rugged corner of southeast Arizona, denies the allegations and says the family was trespassing on his land.

Numerous incidents of vigilante violence have been reported on the U.S.-Mexican border in recent years, including some Hispanic voters being harassed by men in paramilitary combat gear in Tucson during the Nov. 7 midterm elections. Rights activists say the Barnett case is particularly disturbing because the Moraleses are U.S. citizens. Ronald Morales is a veteran who served in the U.S. Navy for six years.

"This lawsuit demonstrates that border vigilante violence has not been limited just to immigrant men, women and children crossing the Arizona border," said Jennifer Allen, director of the Border Action Network.

"In this case, Mexican American girls, their father and grandfather were afraid they were going to be shot and killed by a man who boasts that he's detained more than 10,000 immigrants," she added.

The suit names two other plaintiffs, Edward and Ana English, Their daughter Emma was traveling in the car stopped by Barnett, along with the Morales's two daughters, Venese, then 11, and Angelique, then 9.

Barnett faces another suit brought by the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund last year. It alleges that he held a group of illegal entrants at gunpoint on his property.

That suit asserts that he kicked an immigrant as she lay on the ground and threatened to set his dogs on anyone who tried to leave the area.

Barnett called the plaintiffs in that case "racist liars" and denied that the incident took place. The case has yet to be brought to trial.

Lawyers began jury selection in Bisbee Monday for the current trial, which is scheduled to continue into next week.

Texas Town Cracks Down On Illegal Aliens, Expects Suit (WT)

By Hugh Aynesworth

The Washington Times, November 15, 2006

FARMERS BRANCH, Texas -- City Council members Monday night unanimously passed ordinances they hope will curtail illegal aliens, but said they expected the new laws to be fought in court.

Hundreds were turned away from City Hall, and the council chamber itself was filled to legal occupancy as the city leaders passed the strictest set of ordinances against illegal entry in any Texas city.

Specifically, the 6-0 votes authorized fines for property owners who rent to illegal aliens and designated English as the official language -- a move designed to end printing and the conduct of city business in both English and Spanish.

Also passed was an ordinance authorizing city police to enter into an agreement with federal immigration officials to target criminal aliens. Opponents, including the League of United Latin American Citizens (LULAC) and the Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund (MALDEF), vowed to file a lawsuit.

"We are here not only to say that these ordinances violate federal law, but that these ordinances drive unnecessary tension in the city," said Marisol Perez, a MALDEF staff lawyer.

LULAC member Carlos Quintanilla said: "You can't promote Farmers Branch as a great city when you are denying people to live in apartments, when you are denying children the right to speak their language."

Mr. Perez said that forcing landlords to determine whether a person seeking to rent an apartment is an illegal alien makes the property owner "wear the shoes of an immigration officer. It's a very difficult position."

Council member Tim O'Hare, a trial lawyer who has been pushing hard for approval of the ordinance, said the city expects to be sued.

Mr. O'Hare, who was cheered by the mostly white citizens who agreed with him, said after the vote that the measures adopted would benefit all those who live in the small city just north of Dallas -- those he said, "who are legal citizens."

One originally proposed crackdown didn't make it to the table -- fining business owners who hire illegal aliens.

"Why not make business owners pay if they hire aliens?" read one sign at the council meeting.

"Guess they got some real heat over that one," groused Emmett G. Smith, who said he had lived in Farmers Branch for 61 years.

In the past three decades, Farmers Branch has grown from a sleepy community of a few thousand mostly white citizens to more than 28,000, 37 percent of whom are Hispanic. More than 75 corporate headquarters are located here, many of them minority-owned.

More than four dozen communities nationwide have considered or plan to consider similar legislation. An even more stringent set of ordinances was passed earlier this year in Hazelton, Pa., with restrictions and fines against landlords who rent to illegal aliens and the denial of business permits to those who hire illegal aliens.

A federal court restraining order temporarily has blocked enforcement there after legal filings from the ACLU and the Puerto Rican LegalDefense and Education Fund.

Activists Rap New Test For Citizens (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, November 15, 2006

The federal government intends to replace the current test for U.S. citizenship with one that relies less on knowledge of specific facts and more on an applicant's grasp of democratic principles, but many immigrant-advocacy groups are up in arms about the change, which they worry may discriminate against those who don't speak English and with less education.

"We want to focus more on the building blocks of democracy, rather than the colors of the flag" or questions about the name of the form used to apply for naturalized citizenship, which are on the current test for citizenship, said Chris Bentley, a spokesman for the U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, which is making the change. USCIS is part of the Department of Homeland Security.

Mr. Bentley said USCIS officials want a new test that can ensure that those seeking to become American citizens know about "freedoms guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution and Bill of Rights, such as freedom of speech and freedom of religion."

"Our goal is not to make this test harder or easier for anyone, but to make it much more meaningful," he said.

Mr. Bentley said the proposal to redesign the test for naturalized citizenship came out of a report by a commission headed by former Rep. Barbara Jordan during the Clinton administration that "looked at all kinds of issues related to immigration."

The Jordan commission's report emphasized "effective Americanization of new immigrants, that is the cultivation of a shared commitment to the American values of liberty, democracy and equal opportunity," including policies to "help newcomers learn to speak, read and write English effectively."

The new citizenship test will be administered to all applicants for naturalization nationwide starting in January 2008. However, beginning this winter, at least 5,000 people in 10 cities will take part in a voluntary testing program featuring the new questions.

The number of potential questions will be narrowed from 125 to 100 during the pilot program. To pass, an immigrant must correctly answer six of 10 questions asked.

But more than 220 immigrant organizations, led by the Illinois Coalition of Immigrant and Refugee Rights, have signed a letter to USCIS Director Emilio Gonzalez denouncing the new test, which they worry will make it harder for "poorer legal immigrants with less English and less education" to win U.S. citizenship.

"Already immigrants must pass a citizenship test that many native-born Americans could not pass," say groups that include the National Council of La Raza, National Immigration Forum, Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund, the United Farm Workers of America and the International Brotherhood of Teamsters.

There are some tough questions on the current test and queries that could be described as meaningful. One of the more difficult asks a person to identify amendments to the Constitution guaranteeing voting rights. Others ask what is the "supreme law of the land" -- the U.S. Constitution -- and the Bill of Rights (the first 10 amendments to the Constitution).

Just because the test for American citizenship is being revised "does not mean all the current questions will be done away," said Mr. Bentley. He was unable to provide any sample questions from the new test.

Jack Martin, special-projects director of the Federation for American Immigration Reform (FAIR), a group that is critical of unlimited immigration, said there are both potential improvements and problems with the proposed changes.

"The effort at standardization makes sense ... the concept is good, and there really are some trivial questions on the current test," he said.

"Our only concern is that questions not be dumbed down" so that immigrants could become American citizens "without having a good understanding of U.S. history, culture and social systems, so they can vote intelligently," Mr. Martin said, adding that citizenship tests "should be designed to make sure citizens are prepared to participate in our political process."

As for those worried the new test might be harder or easier, Mr. Bentley said, USCIS intends to avoid those situations "by looking at pass-fail rates of the past."

A New Push To Raise Cap On H-1B Visa (NYT)

By Miguel Helft

SAN FRANCISCO, Nov. 14 — A coalition of business and education groups is making a renewed push to persuade Congress to raise the number of skilled foreign workers allowed into the United States this year.

The coalition, which calls itself Compete America and whose members are drawn heavily from the technology industry, sent a letter to every member of Congress on Monday calling for an increase in both the number of so-called H-1B visas, which are used by skilled immigrants and the number of employment-based green cards given to foreign workers.

“The first part is to ensure that U.S. companies have the ability to hire the best and the brightest,” said Jack Krumholtz, managing director for federal government affairs at Microsoft. “The second part is about making sure that we are able to retain them.”

Microsoft’s chairman, Bill Gates, is one of many technology executives who have advocated increased flexibility to hire educated foreign workers like engineers and scientists. He is expected to return to that theme at an industry conference on Wednesday at Stanford University.

Increasing the number of H-1B visas has long been a top legislative priority of technology companies, which say they cannot find enough skilled workers in the United States. After a temporary increase to 195,000 during the years of the Internet boom, the annual number of visas issued has been capped at 65,000. An additional 20,000 visas have been granted to foreign workers who have an advanced degree from an American university.

But in recent years, all the visas allotted for a given year were claimed on or before the start of the fiscal year on Oct. 1.

"We can't hire people," said Jenifer Verdery, director of work force policy at Intel.

The notion of allowing more skilled foreign workers in the United States generally enjoys bipartisan support in Congress. Earlier this year, the Senate passed a bill that would increase the cap on H-1B visas to 115,000 and would automatically raise the cap by a further 20 percent if all visas for a given year were claimed. The bill also would raise the number of employment-based green cards issued to 290,000, from 140,000.

But the bill stalled as the House and Senate deadlocked on broader immigration reform legislation. And not everyone agrees that raising the cap on visas is a good idea.

"We think that before raising the H-1B cap there should be reform of the H-1B system," said Ronil Hira, vice president for career activities at IEEE-USA, a professional organization representing engineers and computer programmers.

The organization, which includes many immigrants among its ranks, is not opposed to legal immigration. But Mr. Hira said that the H-1B visa program, which requires companies to pay foreign workers wages comparable to those they pay American workers, was riddled with loopholes that allow employers to pay subpar wages to immigrants. That, in turn, depresses the wages of American workers, Mr. Hira said.

Lynn Shotwell, chairwoman of Compete America, said there was virtually no chance that Congress would pass the Senate bill this year. But Ms. Shotwell said the coalition, which includes universities and the Chamber of Commerce, was asking Congress to raise the cap on H-1B visas and green cards for the remainder of the fiscal year.

Members of the coalition are hopeful that legislation modeled after the Senate bill could be enacted next year, when Democrats will control Congress. House Democrats have promoted what they are calling an innovation agenda that includes wide availability of visas for skilled immigrants.

The National Venture Capital Association, which is among those advocating an expansion in visas and green cards for skilled workers, is backing that case with a study, to be released Wednesday, that highlights the role of immigrant entrepreneurs in the American economy.

The study found that one in four publicly traded American companies that were initially financed by venture capitalists in the last 15 years included at least one immigrant among their founders. During the 1980s, immigrants were involved in founding one in five such companies, and prior to 1980 only 7 percent.

"The notion of being able to come here and shape your own destiny is tremendously appealing and, you have to believe, valuable for the economy, job creation and wealth creation," said Axel Bichara, a partner at Atlas Venture in Boston. Mr. Bichara came to the United States from Germany in 1986 to study at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. A year later, he became co-founder of a software company.

Judge Delays KPMG Tax Trial Over Legal Fees Dispute (NYT)

By Lynnley Browning

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

A federal judge has indefinitely postponed the trial of former employees of the accounting firm KPMG in a criminal tax shelter case, citing concerns that the defendants will not be able to pay their lawyers.

The judge also hinted at sanctions against the prosecution for pressuring the firm to stop paying the defendants' legal fees. Any sanctions could have a major impact on the way white-collar criminal cases are handled in the future.

The ruling, made late Monday by Judge Lewis A. Kaplan of the Federal District Court in Manhattan, is the latest twist in the federal case against 16 former KPMG employees and an outside investment adviser and lawyer. Prosecutors say that the defendants made, sold and used questionable tax shelters that cost the Treasury $2.5 billion in unpaid taxes.

Judge Kaplan had previously pushed back the start of the trial from September 2006 to January 2007.

Prosecutors say the case is the largest criminal tax-fraud trial in history. But it has also become something of a referendum on the prosecutorial tactics adopted in the wake of Enron and other corporate scandals. Those tactics include urging firms under investigation to cut off the payment of legal fees of employees caught up in inquiries. KPMG abandoned its longstanding practice and cut off legal fees to the defendants in early 2004, before the employees were indicted and as the firm itself came under investigation for its work with tax shelters.

KPMG, which averted criminal indictment last year by reaching a $456 million deferred-prosecution agreement with the Justice Department, says that it has no intention of paying the fees because it was defrauded by the defendants.

In his ruling, Judge Kaplan again disagreed with KPMG and the government on the issue of legal fees.

"This court found, after a full evidentiary hearing, that the government violated the rights of the KPMG defendants by inducing KPMG — which otherwise would have advanced defense costs — to cut off payments upon indictment," Judge Kaplan wrote. "If KPMG is obliged to pay, payment could greatly mitigate the impact of the government's improper actions. This in turn could diminish the advisability of dismissal or other potentially serious sanctions. If KPMG is not obliged to pay, or if a prompt determination is not feasible, the issue of sanctions could be considered after exhaustion of that possibility."

Judge Kaplan has indicated in several rulings that he wants the fee issue resolved before the trial begins. He wrote in Monday's ruling that some of the defendants would not be able to afford their legal bills, which he said could amount to a million dollars or more a person, without help from KPMG.

The KPMG defendants were indicted last year on charges of conspiring to defraud the government by creating, selling and in some cases using for their own purposes questionable tax shelters. Judge Kaplan wrote that "while it appears that some of the KPMG defendants may be well off, there is a real and growing possibility that some and perhaps all lack funds necessary to their defense."

Both KPMG and the the United States attorney's office in Manhattan have denied coercing the defendants. Representatives for both the firm and prosecutors declined to comment yesterday. Several lawyers for the defendants, who include a former vice chairman of KPMG and a former chief financial officer, also declined to comment.

Judge Kaplan earlier allowed the defendants to file a related civil lawsuit against KPMG, seeking payment of the fees. KPMG is contesting the claim, and an appeals court will hear arguments on the issue this month.

ETJudge Postpones KPMG Tax Shelter Trial (FT)

Financial Times, November 15, 2006

One of the Department of Justice's most high-profile white-collar crime cases has been dealt a blow after a New York federal judge postponed indefinitely the criminal trial of 16 former KPMG executives accused of selling illegal tax shelters.

The ruling represents a setback for prosecutors in the US attorney's office in the southern district of New York, who have been heavily criticised by Judge Lewis Kaplan for their role in pressing KPMG, the accounting firm, to cut off legal fees to its former employees.

Judge Kaplan cited a dispute over whether KPMG would pay the fees in a five-page ruling on Monday.

"Given all of the current uncertainties, it is impossible now to predict with confidence when the charges in the indictment may be tried," he said, adding that there was a "real and growing possibility" that the defendants did not have the funds to pay for their own defence.

The dispute that caused Judge Kaplan to delay the trial centres on KPMG's unwillingness to pay the legal fees.

The firm has said the defendants "breached their fiduciary duties to the partnership and were indicted, thereby putting the future of the firm and its assets at risk".

But the ruling will also put intense pressure on the justice department to rethink its approach to some cases and is likely to spur debate in some quarters of Congress about the prosecution tactics that have been deployed in the Bush administration's effort to stamp out white-collar crime.

The justice department is at odds with the legal and business community over a set of principles known as the Thompson Memorandum, which the department adopted in 2003.

The memo says companies that are under investigation can avoid criminal indictment by agreeing to co-operate fully with prosecutors by cutting off legal fees to employees and waiving attorney-client privilege, which protects the confidentiality of discussions between companies and their legal counsel.

Some of the tactics have come under fire because critics say they force companies and individuals to waive their constitutional rights to avoid indictment.

The US Senate judiciary committee is currently working on bipartisan legislation that would severely constrain the tactics used by the justice department.

That legislation, which has not been finalised, could forbid the DoJ from penalising companies that pay attorneys' fees for employees in cases like KPMG, and prevent the DoJ from pressuring companies to waive attorney-client privilege in exchange for leniency.

The legislation, if passed, is likely to provoke a bitter battle between the Bush administration and the Congress and could be challenged in court as an unconstitutional exercise of congressional power.

Warehouse Owner, Two Other Men Face Tax Charges (MH)

By David Ovalle

The Miami Herald, November 15, 2006

The owner of the Liberty City warehouse where authorities say seven men plotted terror attacks has been arrested and charged with failing to pay taxes and not filing proper tax returns.

George Mobassaleh, 40, and two other men were granted bond Tuesday.

They are charged with failure to remit taxes, filing fraudulent returns, attempting to evade taxes and failure to file six consecutive returns.

The charges are unrelated to the high-profile terror investigation.

In June, seven men were indicted on terrorism conspiracy charges for allegedly plotting to blow up Chicago's Sears Tower and federal facilities.

Authorities say the men rented a Liberty City warehouse, owned by Mobassaleh, for training and to plan their plots. Mobassaleh said he knew nothing about the men.

The Florida Department of Revenue alleges Mobassaleh, Bashir Malouf and Joseph Imbasala failed to pay taxes on more than $100,000.

The men were operating Elegant Beauty Supplies, Joe's Beauty Supplies and two locations of Joe's Foodland Supermarket, all in Miami.

The investigation was spearheaded by the state revenue department, the Miami-Dade state attorney's office, Miami police, the FBI and the state's Division of Alcoholic Beverage Control and Tobacco Enforcement.

Louis J. Terminell, an attorney representing Malouf, said: ``I think most of all this is explainable. If history repeats itself, it's not going to be as nefarious as it seems."

Democrats May Eliminate IRS's Use Of Collection Agencies (WSJ)

By Tom Herman

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

Is the IRS's new private tax-collection program heading for an early death?

After years of congressional debate, the Internal Revenue Service recently began using private debt-collection agencies to help pursue people who owe taxes. The IRS has already turned over the names of more than 13,725 taxpayers who owe the government about $73.5 million.

But the program has run into renewed congressional attacks -- and could well be eliminated -- now that Democrats are poised to take control of the House and Senate. Among the strongest critics are several influential Democrats in line to take over powerful posts next year.

"I think it's a terrible program, and I'm going to let [IRS officials] know in as many political and legislative ways as I can," says Rep. Charles Rangel, the New York Democrat expected to be the next chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee.

Additional criticism has come recently from Sen. Max Baucus, the Montana Democrat who will take over as chairman of the Senate Finance Committee. "Tax collection is an inherent government function and the IRS ought to take care of it in-house," Sen. Baucus says.

The House has already voted to block funding for the debt-collector initiative for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1. The Senate hasn't acted yet. But among those concerned about the IRS program are Sen. Patty Murray of Washington, ranking Democrat on the Senate Appropriations subcommittee that includes Treasury funding.

"I'm deeply concerned that the IRS's plan would not adequately protect taxpayer privacy, would not ensure all taxpayers are treated fairly and respectfully, would not guarantee any cost savings to the U.S. Treasury, and would pre-empt the Senate's debate over outsourcing tax collection," Sen. Murray says. She has co-sponsored legislation with Sen. Byron Dorgan (D., N.D.) to prohibit the IRS from going forward with "this deeply flawed initiative."

IRS Commissioner Mark Everson has defended the program by saying the use of private agencies will help the IRS reduce the "significant and growing amount" of tax liabilities now deemed uncollectible. The private firms will be used to supplement, not replace, IRS personnel, says Mr. Everson, adding that the agency lacks the personnel to go after all outstanding tax bills.

IRS officials say they launched the first phase of the program in mid-September. Three private debt-collection firms are involved. So how is it going so far? "We're cautiously optimistic," says the IRS's Deborah Wolf. "Our experience is these companies are very professional firms" that have "done everything they can to make sure this program is run professionally." She emphasizes there will be a "high level" of oversight by IRS officials.

Here's how the program works: The IRS sends letters to people telling them they will be hearing soon from a private debt-collection company and explains the program. The private firms then follow up with a letter before they call the taxpayers. Ms. Wolf says the debt collectors aren't allowed to ring doorbells or make face-to-face contact with people.

But in the aftermath of the election, "this issue is being looked at differently by the new leadership, and there is momentum building in opposition" to it, says Colleen Kelley, president of the National Treasury Employees Union, which has long opposed hiring private debt collectors. * * *

MORE MUTUAL FUNDS plan unusually large capital-gains distributions in coming weeks.

Fidelity Investments, American Century Investments, T. Rowe Price Associates and several other major fund companies estimate more funds this year will be making year-end capital-gains distributions than a year ago. At some funds, payouts are likely to exceed 5% or 10% of the fund's net asset value -- an issue of concern to many investors in taxable accounts, who could effectively owe on someone else's capital gains. Among the key reasons: the stock market's resurgence, and the fact that more funds have used up capital losses amassed in prior years.

Some distributions are coming soon. The Federated Capital Appreciation fund is paying about 16% of net asset value to shareholders of record today. The pay date will be Friday. The payments are the same for the A, B, C and K shares. The per-share distribution will consist of about 79 cents of short-term gains and around $3.68 of long-term gains, says Meghan McAndrew of Federated Investors.

More Fidelity funds will pay distributions of capital gains this year than in recent years and the amount of the distributions "will generally be higher," a Fidelity spokesman says. Based on estimates through Sept. 30, about 63% of Fidelity's equity funds are expected to pay capital-gains distributions, up from 58% last year, he says. Fidelity says about 60% of its mutual-fund assets are held in tax-deferred accounts, such as 401(k) plans and IRAs.

Some of the biggest payouts come from funds that invest in overseas securities, which have posted especially big gains this year. Among the Fidelity funds planning big payouts that still are open to investors are the Fidelity Europe fund, which plans a payout of about 14% of net asset value, and the Fidelity Worldwide fund, which plans to pay out 12.7% of NAV. The Fidelity Europe Capital Appreciation, Fidelity Overseas and Fidelity Global Balanced funds also plan large payouts.

American Century expects 41 of its funds will make year-end capital-gains distributions this year, up from 35 last year, says the company's Brian Janssen.

Investors in taxable accounts should check carefully before making large investments in funds between now and the end of the year. * * *

IT'S OFFICIAL: The IRS confirms inflation-adjusted tax numbers for 2007.

By law, dozens of tax numbers are adjusted each year for inflation. For example, the IRS says taxable income of more than $349,700 for 2007 will be taxed in most cases at the top federal rate of 35%. That's up from $336,550 for this year. The basic standard deduction will increase to $10,700 for joint returns from $10,300 in 2006.

For most singles, it will increase to $5,350 from $5,150. * * *

IRS Working To Trim A Bit Of Form 1040's Red Tape (USAT)

By Kevin Mccoy

USA Today, November 15, 2006

The federal government document that tens of millions of Americans love to hate is scheduled to get a face lift.

The IRS plans changes to Form 1040, which most taxpayers use to report their federal taxes, the agency said Tuesday. Taxpayers could begin using a revised form as soon as the 2009 tax filing season, said IRS senior spokesman Terry Lemons.

"What we are shooting for is a form that is simpler and easier to use for taxpayers," said Lemons, confirming mentions of the anticipated revision in a recent Government Accountability Office audit and a report by Tax Analysts, a non-profit organization that tracks tax issues.

As envisioned by the IRS, an as-yet-undetermined number of less-frequently used lines dealing with adjustments to income, credits, taxes and payments would be removed from the cover page of Form 1040 and relocated to a new Schedule O. That would simplify the current 77-line form, and free up space for any future tax reporting changes that could conceivably be approved by Congress and the White House.

Lemons said the changes are still evolving, explaining that "it's still really early in the (planning) process."

Although Form 1040 typically undergoes virtually unnoticed revisions from year to year, it hasn't been subjected to a major overhaul since 1977. According to the IRS, that revision scrapped a two-column format at the top of the tax-filing form and moved the signature line from the cover page to the final entry.

Lemons stressed that the changes being planned are expected to be less radical. Taxpayers "are not going to get a surprise when the new form comes in the mailbox," he said.

Although the IRS tentatively plans to introduce the changes for the 2009 tax filing season, the start date could be delayed by agency funding issues and other logistics, Lemons said.

Approximately 135 million federal tax returns are filed on Form 1040 or one of its variants each year, making it the IRS' most frequently-used filing document. However, the filers who submitted more than 73 million federal tax returns electronically in 2006 typically typed data into computer-generated boxes without ever actually seeing the Form 1040 that underlies the software.

That's a development the IRS makes clear it welcomes.

"We're hoping fewer and fewer people see the 1040 because they file electronically," said Lemons.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Political Motives Suspected As Jobs On Bench Go Unfilled (SEATIMES)

By David Bowermaster, Seattle Times staff reporter

The Seattle Times, November 15, 2006

Despite a process designed to keep politics out of judicial selections, some in the local legal community are wondering whether politics is behind a delay by the White House in filling two vacancies on the U.S. District Court in Western Washington.

A seat on the federal bench in Tacoma has been open since March 2005, and a seat on the federal bench in Seattle opened in July.

In both cases, a bipartisan panel of local attorneys screened applicants and sent three recommendations to the White House; since 1997, the president has picked his nominee from among three names chosen by such panels.

But the White House, in an unprecedented move, rejected all three candidates for the Tacoma vacancy. The office of White House Counsel Harriet Miers told the bipartisan panel that none of the candidates was sufficiently qualified and asked for three more nominees.

The decision troubled many local lawyers and judges who know the three spurned finalists. Sources close to the selection process, speaking on condition of anonymity, called the White House decision "appalling," "outrageous" and a "travesty," and suspect the White House already has a replacement in mind who was not on the list.

Republicans and Democrats alike said the candidates rejected by the White House were eminently qualified. One, confirmed by sources as Karen Strombom, is already a federal magistrate judge in Tacoma.

A new set of candidates for the Tacoma vacancy was sent to the White House in August, around the same time that candidates for the Seattle opening were proposed, sources said. A nomination still hasn't been made by the White House.

Finalists for the federal bench

A bipartisan panel of local lawyers has selected three candidates for a judicial vacancy on the U.S. District Court in Seattle. The White House did interviews in September but has yet to name a nominee. The finalists:

Marc Boman: Partner, Perkins Coie. Specialist in commercial litigation. Recipient of Washington State Bar Association's "Award of Merit" for long-term service to the bar. Served on Seattle Ethics and Election Commission from 1995 to 1998.

Richard Jones: King County Superior Court judge since 1994. Named 2004 "Judge of the Year" by King County Bar Association and Washington State Bar Association. Assistant U.S. attorney in Seattle, 1988 to 1994, associate at Bogle & Gates, 1983 to 1987.

Michael Rickert: Skagit County Superior Court judge since 1992. Previously Skagit County prosecutor, 1986 to 1992.

Source: Seattle Times reporting

The finalists for the Seattle opening have heard nothing since they were interviewed by the White House in September. Nor has the selection committee, said co-chairs Jenny Durkan of Seattle and J. Vander Stoep of Chehalis.

According to several sources close to the merit panel, the candidates selected for the Seattle vacancy were King County Superior Court Judge Richard Jones, Skagit County Superior Court Judge Michael Rickert and Marc Boman, a partner at the Perkins Coie law firm.

Rickert confirmed he was interviewed at the White House on Sept. 6. Jones and Boman declined to comment.

"It's an honor to be considered," Rickert said. "To have a dog in the hunt is very nice."

The delay has raised questions in local legal circles about whether the White House might again reject a merit panel's recommendations, or choose its own nominee.

The questions intensified when rumors surfaced that John McKay, the U.S. Attorney for Western Washington, was also interviewed by the White House Counsel's Office. McKay said last summer he applied for the Seattle vacancy, and many local lawyers considered him the front-runner for the job.

The Seattle Times confirmed that McKay traveled to Washington, D.C., to meet with White House officials about the vacancy, but sources said it was not clear if it was a formal job interview.

McKay declined to confirm or deny that the meeting took place.

"I'm not in a position to comment on this midprocess," McKay said. "I'm going to wait for the White House to make a decision along with everybody else."

If President Bush nominates McKay rather than one of the three judges selected by the bipartisan merit panel, it would be the second significant snub of the process by the White House in less than a year, judicial observers said.

The merit-panel process started in 1997 after an agreement initially hammered out by Democratic Sen. Patty Murray, and former Republican Sen. Slade Gorton and the Clinton administration.

A letter from former White House Counsel Alberto Gonzales to Murray in March 2002 made it clear the Bush administration reserved the right to go its own way with judicial nominations.

"All parties have agreed that [bipartisan panels] can be a source for identifying and evaluating candidates," wrote Gonzales, who is now attorney general. "I also propose that neither the president nor you be bound to adhere to the [panels'] evaluations in all instances."

The White House declined to shed light on any of the developments.

"As far as nominations always go, we don't speculate or comment until the process has been completed and the president is ready to make his announcement," said Peter Watkins, a White House spokesman.

Vander Stoep said he does not know when Bush will select his nominees.

"I know the White House wants to move as quickly as possible, and I know the senators want to move as quickly as possible," Vander Stoep said. Durkan said she is hopeful that the White House will abide by the process that has worked to name judges in Washington for the past decade, but she is not making predictions.

"Any of the candidates [for the Seattle vacancy] would serve the president and the country incredibly well," Durkan said. "But that's what I thought about Tacoma."

Congress Unlikely To Wrap Up Budget Work (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - Republicans who are about to lose power in Congress began a long-shot bid Tuesday to finish budgeting nearly half a trillion dollars for domestic agencies. But GOP leaders have no game plan to do nearly a year's work in a lame-duck session likely to last just a few weeks.

The uphill task is made more difficult by GOP conservatives' distaste for pork-laden "omnibus" spending bills that have frequently been the means of wrapping up unfinished congressional business.

With nine of 11 spending bills still unfinished more than six weeks after the Oct. 1 start of the fiscal year, the House is slated to take up a stopgap funding bill funding through Dec. 8 agencies whose budgets have yet to pass. House leaders have promised lawmakers that the postelection lame-duck session will be over by Dec. 15.

The Senate on Tuesday took up a $94 billion bill funding veterans programs and military construction projects, and farm belt lawmakers immediately tried to attach $4.9 billion worth of emergency farm aid to the bill.

The left outgoing Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg, R-N.H., complaining that Democrats were moving to bust the budget before even assuming control of the Senate.

"The first amendment brought to the floor of the United States Senate after the election increases the national debt by $4.9 billion," Gregg said. "This is a daylight robbery of the Treasury."

On the broader budget front, both Republicans and Democrats on the powerful Appropriations Committees would like to wrap up their work before Congress switches hands in January.

Republicans would like the chance to stamp a final imprint on the budget before losing control of Congress. Also at stake is control over thousands of parochial projects that are so important to lawmakers.

Democrats, for their part, want to wrap up the spending bills in order to get a fresh start on next year's business.

House Republicans leaders, including Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio, have yet to decide whether to even try to wrap up the spending bills, which would fund the Education, Interior, Transportation and Agriculture departments, among others.

Boehner is embroiled in a race to become minority leader, replacing Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois as the No. 1 House Republican, and he isn't making any moves yet to endorse the idea of a huge omnibus budget bill.

"Nobody knows for sure until leadership races get out of the way," said Rep. Joe Knollenberg, R-Mich., who chairs a panel responsible for transportation and housing funding.

Meanwhile, House Republicans stumbled in their efforts to give President Bush a victory on a Vietnam free trade bill as Bush headed to Vietnam Tuesday night. The measure failed to win a supermajority House floor vote Monday evening under procedures reserved for noncontroversial bills, and GOP leaders opted against bringing it back under regular rules requiring a bare majority.

The setback for the Vietnam deal could be a hint of the trouble facing the rest of Bush's trade agenda, which includes a string of free trade agreements and global trade liberalization talks.

Also Tuesday, the Senate approved by unanimous voice vote a move by Susan Collins, R-Maine, to keep alive an oversight office in Iraq responsible for exposing waste in U.S. efforts for rebuilding Iraq. The special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction tracks spending in the multibillion-dollar effort to rebuild Iraq, a process moving slowly because of corruption and overcharging as well as wartime violence.

House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., had moved to shut down the agency by October as Congress passed the annual defense policy bill.

Hunter's strong-arm move caught many lawmakers by surprise and prompted immediate calls for its reversal. The inspector general's work has resulted in four criminal convictions and, most recently, evidence that a Halliburton subsidiary exploited federal regulations to hide details on its contract performance.

Spending Bills Stall As Congress Focuses On Leadership Races (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

The House and Senate struggled yesterday to move ahead on major unfinished bills, amid the distractions of leadership elections and a growing impatience to end a long and bitter campaign year.

The Senate last night approved by voice vote a military-construction spending bill, but not before debate stalled for hours over an unrelated provision, disaster funding for farmers. The slow pace did not bode well for completing the nine 2007 spending bills that Congress left pending when it recessed a month before the Nov. 7 elections. The $94 billion military-construction measure, which funds housing and veterans programs, was supposed to be one of the easier votes.

Meanwhile in the House, a Vietnam trade measure that appeared to be cruising toward passage was shelved until next month after it failed Monday night to win the two-thirds support needed to pass under expedited circumstances. Republicans blamed Democrats for the defeat, although 66 GOP members also voted against it.

The bill, which would grant Vietnam permanent normal trade status, won a majority of House votes, 228 to 161, but it will not be revived until after the Thanksgiving break, House GOP leadership aides said. President Bush had hoped to have the completed trade deal in hand when he arrives in Hanoi this weekend for an Asian economic meeting.

Leaders in both chambers remained hopeful that most of the remaining spending bills can be completed soon. House Republicans yesterday set a deadline of Dec. 15 for leaving town, just long enough for Appropriations Committee negotiators to finish their work, if Democrats cooperate and other obstructions are kept to a minimum. Whatever does not pass would have to be bundled into a temporary funding resolution until the 110th Congress convenes in January.

One obstacle to a speedy wrap-up is the series of leadership elections for the next Congress that are taking place this week in the House and the Senate. Yesterday, Senate Democrats chose their slate, naming Harry M. Reid (Nev.) as majority leader and Richard J. Durbin (Ill.) as majority whip. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), who ran the Senate campaign committee that delivered his party the majority, was elevated to a new No. 3 position, in charge of policy and strategy.

Today, it is the Senate Republicans' turn. Mitch McConnell (Ky.) is expected to be named minority leader, while Trent Lott (Miss.) and Lamar Alexander (Tenn.) are vying for the job of minority whip. Lott has extensive institutional and procedural knowledge, but he was forced to step down as Senate minority leader in December 2002 after he made remarks at a birthday party for then-Sen. Strom Thurmond praising Thurmond's 1948 presidential campaign, in which he ran as a segregationist Dixiecrat.

House Democrats will elect leaders Thursday, with the spotlight on the No. 2 job of majority leader. The current Democratic whip in the House, Steny H. Hoyer (Md.), is being challenged by veteran John P. Murtha (Pa.), a leading Democratic spokesman in favor of withdrawing troops from Iraq. Murtha is a close ally of Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), the incoming House speaker, who issued a letter Sunday night endorsing Murtha for the job.

Several senior House Democratic aides reported that key Pelosi allies, including Rep. George Miller (Calif.), were campaigning hard for Murtha yesterday, in particular among more junior members eager for Pelosi's support in securing coveted committee assignments.

And Murtha played up his role as a chief Iraq war critic, with his office releasing a statement that said, "The record is clear: Jack Murtha has been a constant voice for change in Iraq and Steny Hoyer has not."

Hoyer released his own slate of heavyweight supporters, including nine incoming committee chairmen.

"We are convinced that Steny will be a tremendous majority leader," read a letter from the group, which included Reps. John D. Dingell (Mich.), Henry A. Waxman (Calif.), Barney Frank (Mass.), Tom Lantos (Calif.), James L. Oberstar (Minn.), Ike

Skelton (Mo.), Bart Gordon (Tenn.), Bennie Thompson (Miss.) and John M. Spratt Jr. (S.C.). Charles B. Rangel (N.Y.), the next Ways and Means chairman, was not a signatory, but he declared his support for Hoyer.

Murtha dismissed allegations that he has repeatedly skirted ethics boundaries, through his senior position on the House Appropriations Committee. Murtha said the charges stem from his role in the 1980 Abscam scandal, when he was named as an unindicted co-conspirator and testified against two House colleagues.

"I am disconcerted that some are making headlines by resorting to unfounded allegations that occurred 26 years ago," Murtha said in an angry statement released yesterday. "I thought we were above this type of swift-boating attack. This is not how we restore integrity and civility to the United States Congress."

On Friday, House Republicans will choose their leaders. Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (Ill.) is not running for a minority leadership post, and the front-runner for the top job is John A. Boehner (Ohio), the current majority leader.

Final Days Of Majority Control Bittersweet For Republicans (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — Sen. Conrad Burns gave a practiced politician's grin and hearty "How are ya?" but some of his staffers were wiping damp eyes as the Montana Republican shepherded them on a climb of the Capitol dome, a tour only a member of Congress can lead.

Burns, who was defeated in last week's election, has until early January to exercise the privilege. He was less friendly earlier in the day to several reporters who cover him for Montana newspapers. Burns advised them to read Psalm 109, which includes the passage "the mouth of the wicked and the mouth of the deceitful are opened against me."

For Republican members of Congress, these are bittersweet days. An unusual post-election session, called to pass unfinished spending bills, is likely to keep members of the 109th Congress at work well into next month.

It is as if the ghosts of Congress Past returned for one final, but not very convincing, hurrah. "There's sort of a stunned feeling in our caucus right now," said Rep. Shelley Moore Capito, R-W.Va.

Other members were less resigned. Sen. Rick Santorum, a Pennsylvania Republican defeated last week by Democrat Bob Casey, delivered an acrimonious swan song by threatening to block a bipartisan plan for $5 billion for drought-stricken farmers in the Midwest.

Santorum said the plan violates rules on the federal budget. Sen. Kent Conrad, D-N.D., the incoming Budget Committee chairman, threatened to retaliate by holding up Republican legislation. "Things are going to get very tough around here," Conrad warned. The dispute required an unusual intervention by outgoing Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, who promised Conrad a vote today.

The lame-duck session gives Republicans a few more weeks to enjoy the perks of majority control they lost at the ballot box. It also creates the possibility for close encounters of the awkward kind: New members of the next Congress are at the Capitol for freshman orientation as the lawmakers they beat are back to cast their last votes.

Sen. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio, who lost to Democrat Sherrod Brown, said he doesn't mind. "I've always enjoyed the work," DeWine said with a wan smile.

The Republicans who will return next year are also facing some harsh realities. Martin Frost, a former Texas congressman who was in the House when Democrats lost their majority in 1994, said his colleagues were initially so depressed he had a hard time convincing them to begin fundraising for the next election. "Democrats were in a funk for seven months," he said.

Republicans are vowing not to let that happen. Rep. Chris Cannon, R-Utah, says he thinks some bills he's been pushing, on immigration changes and intellectual-property protection, have a better chance of passage in a Democrat-controlled Congress.

Others are seizing an opportunity to climb the rungs of leadership. Sen. Lamar Alexander of Tennessee is using the election as an argument in his race against Sen. Trent Lott of Mississippi for GOP whip, the party's No. 2 leadership post. "We need new faces on our team after the drubbing we took (last) Tuesday," Alexander said.

Lott has not been speaking to reporters about the race. His spokeswoman, Susan Irby, said in a statement earlier this week that Lott, the Senate's former majority leader, is "closing in on victory." Senate Republicans will choose today.

Dennis Hastert of Illinois, the current House speaker, will not run for the party's top leadership post. Current House Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio competes against Mike Pence of Indiana and Joe Barton of Texas on Friday to be GOP leader.

Republicans' lost majorities in Congress mean an end to their committee chairmanships, as well as a loss of many employees who serve them. In the House, Republicans will have to cut their committee staffs in half. Capito says she expects to lose her slot on the House Rules Committee. Rep. Patrick McHenry, R-N.C., is worried about his post on the House Budget Committee. "That's when it will really sink in," he said, "when you're knocked off a committee and see the staff go."

Democrats have said they intend to be generous in victory, but veteran lawmakers are preparing for the worst. Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., joked that GOP parking spaces will be gone.

"Fortunately," said Davis, who represents the Washington suburbs, "I live near a Metro (subway) stop."

Lawmakers Push Politician For UN Post (AP)

By Jim Abrams

AP, November 15, 2006

A House Republican and Democrat, in the new spirit of bipartisanship, are urging President Bush to name defeated Republican Rep. Jim Leach to be the next U.S. ambassador to the United Nations.

"He is the most diplomatic politician I have ever met," Rep. Earl Blumenauer, D-Ore., said of Leach, a moderate from Iowa known for his professorial sweaters, his low-key, nonpolitical approach to issues and his opposition to the war in Iraq.

"I can't think of any American better qualified to represent our interests before the United Nations," said Rep. Jim Walsh, R-N.Y., who on Tuesday joined Blumenauer in circulating a letter in the House seeking support for Leach if the acting U.N. ambassador, John Bolton, is forced to resign.

Bolton has been temporary ambassador since August 2005, but has never been able to win confirmation because of opposition from Democrats, and some Republicans, to his confrontational style.

The White House recently renominated Bolton to the post, but Senate supporters lack the votes and it appears Bolton will have to resign when Democrats take over the Senate in January.

Leach, 64, who refuses to take political action committee money or run negative ads, narrowly lost to college professor Dave Loebsack in last week's election, ending a 30-year career as a House legislator.

Leach, who has announced no plans for the future, does have the resume for the job. He was a foreign service officer at the State Department in the 1960s and served at the U.N. under then Ambassador George H.W. Bush in the 1970s.

He is currently chairman of the House International Relations subcommittee on East Asian and Pacific affairs.

"He clearly is flattered to be considered" as U.N. ambassador, said his chief of staff, Gregory Wierzynski. "As a former foreign service officer, it would be something of intense interest to him."

But Leach may not be helped by his record of being near the top of those Republicans who vote most often with Democrats. In 2002 he was one of six House Republicans to vote against the resolution authorizing the use of force in Iraq, and he was among the first Republicans to call for a military withdrawal from Iraq.

But Blumenauer said, "This is a time of reassessment, re-evaluation" on Iraq, and "I would think Jim's qualifications would actually help."

Bush Calls Meeting With Auto Leaders Constructive (FREEP)

By Justin Hyde

Detroit Free Press, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — President George W. Bush met with the heads of Detroit's automakers in what he called a "constructive and meaningful dialogue " at the White House this afternoon, while automakers said they agreed on many, but not all, issues.

General Motors Corp. Chairman Rick Wagoner said the automakers told the president they could increase their production of vehicles that can run on ethanol or biodiesel to half of their fleet by 2012, if they could be assured that such fuels would be widely available. The Detroit automakers said earlier this year they would double their output of such vehicles by 2010.

Bush said the executives “are making difficult decisions, tough choices to make sure that their companies are competitive in a global economy.

“And I’m confident that they’re making the right decisions, and that’s good news for the American people because the automobile manufacturers play such a significant part of our economy and a vital part of our employment base,” he said.

Bush and the executives said they touched on health care, energy and currency, as expected. While Wagoner, LaSorda and Mulally praised the president for being open to their concerns, Wagoner indicated some areas of disagreement, especially on Detroit’s concerns of Japanese currency manipulation.

“I can honestly say that it appeared the president didn’t 100 percent see it that way,” Wagoner said. “We had a good open dialogue. We agreed to continue that dialogue.”

Bush said the meeting was a starting point for future conversations about the state of the industry. While not committing to discuss currency with Asian leaders next week, Bush said his message “to our trading partners is just treat us the way we treat you. Our markets are open for your products, and we expect your markets to be open for ours, including our automobiles.”

The companies had pursued the long-awaited meeting, originally scheduled for May, after finding few sympathetic ears for their concerns in the administration, a problem exacerbated by the departure of former GM executive Andrew Card as White House chief of staff in March.

Michigan’s Congressional Democrats, who will take over several important committees when the new Congress begins in January, have pressured the automakers to take a harder line with the administration. But the executives said the get-together was meant to improve relations, and succeeded.

“I was very impressed with the president’s knowledge of the situation with competitiveness issues, and the fact we’re taking the actions needed to have viable businesses going forward, and his commitment to partner with us on issues that are really important,” said Mulally.

Bush Says He Wants A 'vibrant' Domestic Auto Industry (DN)

By David Shepardson

Detroit News, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- After months of delays, President Bush met today with the chief executive officers of Detroit's Big Three automakers and told them he wants a domestic auto industry that "is as vibrant and solid as possible."

"These leaders have, are making difficult decisions, tough choices to make sure that their companies are competitive in a global economy," Bush told reporters. "I'm confident that they're making the right decisions, and that's good news for the American people because the automobile manufacturers play such a significant part of our economy and a vital part of our employment base."

Bush met with General Motors Corp. Chairman and CEO Rick Wagoner, Ford Motor Co. CEO Alan Mulally and Tom LaSorda, president and chief executive officer of DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler Group, for about an hour in the Oval Office. Among the topics they discussed were health care, energy and trade.

In a joint statement, the executives said they appreciated having an opportunity to meet with the president on issues that are critical not only to the auto industry but to the ongoing competitiveness of American manufacturing.

"Overall, we were pleased with the exchange we had with the president and came away with a clear impression that he understands how vital these issues are to the American economy and our ability to compete successfully in the global marketplace," the executives said in their statement.

Also attending the meeting were Vice President Dick Cheney, White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, Transportation Secretary Mary Peters and the White House political advisor Karl Rove.

Wagoner, Mulally and LaSorda sat side by side on a couch in the Oval Office, while the president and vice president sat in armchairs.

The three said the companies planned to have further follow-up meetings with the administration.

Bush said the CEOs had a "constructive and meaningful dialogue."

"We talked about our mutual desire to reduce our dependence on foreign oil," he said. "Obviously, as these automobile manufacturers begin to incorporate new technologies that will enable us to power our cars in different ways, it will make it easier for me to be able to tell the American people we're using less foreign oil.

"My message to our trading partners is just treat us the way we treat you. Our markets are open for your products, and we expect your markets to be open for ours, including our automobiles."

The Big Three noted that they had in June agreed to double production of the number of flexible fuel vehicles that run on biofuels by 2010. Wagoner said they might be willing to increase that number to 50 percent of total production if the administration offered certain incentives by 2012.

Currently, automakers get credits they can use to meet corporate average fuel economy standards by building vehicles that can run on E85 -- a fuel that includes 85 percent ethanol -- or other biofuels, even if drivers don't have access to alternative fuels.

On health care, Bush said he assured the executives that "the government is addressing rising health care costs through a variety of initiatives that I think over time are going to make a significant difference in not only their cost, but the cost to the U.S. taxpayer, as well."

While the CEOs all praised the president's comments, Wagoner noted that there were areas -- like currency -- where they didn't agree.

Bush: Automakers Face 'Tough Choices' (AP-Y)

By Ken Thomas

AP, November 15, 2006

President Bush told Detroit's auto industry leaders on Tuesday he knows they are making "tough choices" to shore up their companies in foreign competition and promised continuing dialogue as they seek help on trade and health care issues.

"The president clearly understands the importance of the business to the United States and the global economy," Ford Motor Co. Chief Executive Alan Mulally said later.

Bush said, "We found a lot in common."

Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and other administration officials met in the Oval Office for just over an hour with top executives of Ford, General Motors and DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler Group.

The automakers later told reporters the meeting was productive, hopeful that it would lead to more discussions with the administration.

"That's a door that we've been waiting to open," said Tom LaSorda, president and chief executive officer of DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler Group.

On Capitol Hill, lawmakers representing large numbers of auto workers said they hoped Congress would address reducing the cost of the health care on manufacturers, foster the research and development of alternative fuel vehicles and promote fair trade practices.

"The industry's ability to compete in the global marketplace will determine its future. Rising health care and retirement costs as well as America's dependence on foreign sources of energy are negatively affecting industry strength," said Sen. George Voinovich, R-Ohio.

Sen. Debbie Stabenow, D-Mich., who criticized Bush during her re-election campaign for not meeting with the executives earlier, said she hoped the meeting would be "an important first step toward a comprehensive American manufacturing strategy."

The auto executives said they pressed Bush about their concerns on health care, energy and trade issues, while making clear that the troubled industry does not want a federal bailout. The meeting had been delayed since last spring and had been widely anticipated in the auto industry.

Bush met with the leaders just hours before he was traveling to Asia to meet in Vietnam with Asia-Pacific economic partners. He said he would tell those partners, "Just treat us like we treat you. ... Our markets are open for your products and we expect your markets to be open for ours, including our automobiles."

He said of the U.S. executives, "These leaders are making difficult decisions, tough choices to make sure that their companies are competitive in a global economy. And I'm confident that they're making the right decisions."

General Motors Corp. and Ford are both undergoing significant turnaround plans after posting large losses last year. GM has persuaded about 35,000 hourly workers to leave the company under early retirement or buyout plans while Ford has offered buyouts and early retirement packages to all 75,000 U.S. production workers in hopes of reducing its hourly work force by up to 30,000.

The companies have faced hardships while Japan-based Toyota Motor Corp. is enjoying soaring profits and outlining plans to unseat GM as the world's largest automaker.

GM chairman and CEO Rick Wagoner said the automakers made the case that Japan's weakened yen makes imported goods from Japan cheaper and enhances profits Japanese automakers make in the U.S. He said they discussed the automakers' "strong conviction that the Japanese yen is systematically undervalued, which helps them to maintain significant trade balance surpluses in our industry."

"I can't honestly say it appears the president 100 percent saw it that way, but we had a good dialogue," Wagoner said.

On health care, Wagoner said they discussed the role of information technology in improving quality and reducing costs. He said they would study high-cost, catastrophic cases that often drive up health care costs.

LaSorda said the automakers stressed that "specific issues like health care" aren't limited to the automobile industry.

All three automakers spend more on health care per vehicle than steel, which adds about $1,000 to the cost of a car built by the manufacturers. GM, the nation's largest private provider of health care, spent $5.3 billion on health care last year for 1.1 million people.

David Healy, an auto industry analyst for Burnham Securities, said he expected the meeting would have little impact on trade and health care, two areas where the Bush administration and the auto industry have disagreed.

"I think what you saw was a nice piece of political theater," Healy said.

But David Cole, chairman of the Ann Arbor, Mich.-based Center for Automotive Research, said the meeting could have long-term potential because the executives were able to "convey an impression that what the auto industry is dealing with is much larger than the auto industry."

One area on which Bush and the industry agree is on pursuing alternative energy sources. GM's Wagoner said that by 2012, up to half of their vehicles could run on ethanol blends of up to 85 percent, known as E85.

Wagoner said automakers would need assurances that the alternative fuel would be adequately available. Currently, only about 700 of the 170,000 gasoline stations nationally offer E85; most are in the Midwest. The three automakers said earlier this year they would double their production of flexible-fuel vehicles by 2010.

Bush cited a "mutual desire to reduce our dependence on imported oil."

The executives said they were not interested in a bailout similar to the 1979 measure approved by Congress that helped preserve Chrysler Corp. Asked of any interest in a bailout, Mulally said, "Absolutely not. Because we really believe that the actions start with us, taking the actions that create a more competitive business going forward."

Detroit Automakers Get Bush's Ear, But No Promises (LAT)

By Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — The chief executives of Detroit's troubled Big Three automakers finally got to meet with the nation's chief executive Tuesday, and they emerged from the Oval Office saying they had received an understanding hearing.

"It was a very good dialogue," said General Motors Corp. Chairman and Chief Executive Rick Wagoner.

President Bush promised nothing, particularly in response to the executives' complaint that Asian countries, notably Japan, were holding the value of their currencies artificially low so that their cars would be cheaper.

Bush, who left hours after the meeting for a conference in Vietnam with Asian trading partners, was not about to roil the waters by complaining of Asian currency manipulation.

Instead, he said afterward that he would tell the Asian leaders: "Our markets are open for your products, and we expect your markets to be open for ours, including our automobiles."

DOJ_NMG_0094538

As far back as April, the heads of GM, Ford and DaimlerChrysler's Chrysler Group had sought a White House meeting to air their problems.

Bush said the midterm campaign schedule made that impossible until after election day.

During her successful reelection campaign, Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.) had criticized Bush for not meeting with the automakers.

On Tuesday, she said she hoped the session would be "an important first step toward a comprehensive American manufacturing strategy that will keep us competitive."

In addition to trade and currency values, the automakers and the president discussed fuel efficiency, energy security and the increasing burden of healthcare costs.

Tom LaSorda, Chrysler Group's president and chief executive, said the three executives emphasized that a small share of autoworkers and retirees were responsible for much of the costs.

"I assured these leaders that the government is addressing rising healthcare costs through a variety of initiatives," Bush said, including tax-sheltered accounts used to meet health costs when combined with high-deductible health insurance.

On fuel efficiency, the executives said they told Bush that half their fleets would be able to run on ethanol or biodiesel fuel, instead of gasoline, by 2012.

George Magliano, chief auto industry analyst for the economic forecasting firm Global Insight, said nothing would immediately come of Tuesday's meeting.

"Most of these issues are long-term," he said.

Brian Johnson, an auto analyst for the investment bank Lehman Brothers, said the outcome would depend on the coming tug-of-war between coastal Democrats and interior Democrats in the new, Democratic-controlled Congress.

Coastal Democrats tend to be environmentally oriented, he said, whereas those from the country's center are more sympathetic to the industry's plight.

And its condition is serious: In the third quarter, Ford reported a net loss of $5.8 billion and DaimlerChrysler's U.S. operations lost $1.46 billion. GM lost only $91 million, a sharp upturn after a $10.6-billion loss for all of last year.

Big 3 Auto Heads Get Little From President (WP)

By Sholnn Freeman

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

President Bush promised yesterday to deliver a message to Asian trading partners to "treat us the way we treat you" but offered top U.S. auto executives little help in their battle to turn their companies around.

The president met with the three chief executives of the Detroit-based auto companies for a little more than an hour at the White House after twice postponing the get-together in the past several months. In Michigan, where the economy is reeling from auto industry downsizing, the long wait came to symbolize the Bush administration's indifference to the manufacturing sector.

Alan R. Mulally of Ford Motor Co.; Thomas W. LaSorda of Chrysler, the U.S. division of DaimlerChrysler AG; and G. Richard Wagoner Jr. of General Motors Corp. laid out their concerns about fair trade, health-care costs, rising steel prices and alternative fuel development. After the meeting, Bush said the executives had "tough choices" to make. He said he was confident that they were making the "right decisions."

Bush, who was preparing to attend the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum in Vietnam this week, said he would tell Asian trading partners that "our markets are open for your products, and we expect your markets to be open for ours, including our automobiles."

At a news conference after the meeting, the three auto executives said they found common ground with the president on energy issues. The executives said they asked the administration to help expand the supply and distribution of alternative fuels such as ethanol. In a joint statement, the automakers said they could make half of their annual vehicle production capable of burning ethanol by 2012 to lessen the nation's dependence on foreign oil.

The auto executives said Bush made no pledges to support any specific industry initiatives. Other company officials had said they had limited expectations for the meeting, which was also attended by Vice President Cheney.

The auto executives said they were not able persuade the administration to challenge the Japanese government on its trade imbalance with the United States and the weakness of the yen, which makes Japanese products cheaper overseas. Wagoner and other auto officials have accused the Japanese government of artificially weakening the yen, providing a cost subsidy of $3,000 to $9,000 per vehicle for auto exports to this country for automakers like Toyota Motor Corp. and Honda Motor Co.

"I can't honestly say the president 100 percent saw it that way," Wagoner said after the meeting.

Kate Bronfenbrenner, director of labor education research at Cornell University, said part of the administration's inaction has been because Michigan is a Democratic-leaning state. She said organized labor played a major role in last week's elections and labor union members turned out in large numbers to help mobilize Democratic voters.

"But it's much bigger than that," Bronfenbrenner said. "Bush hasn't cared about health care, retiree benefits or pensions for any workers, and those are some of the issues that drove the Democratic victory in the last election."

The election put key allies of the industry into power, including Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), who is set to lead the House Energy and Commerce Committee, and Rep. Sander M. Levin (D-Mich.), who is to take the chairmanship of the trade subcommittee of the House Ways and Means Committee. In a written statement, Dingell said he was pleased automakers had a chance to present their concerns to the president. "The meeting is a first step," he said, "now we need action."

Democrats are pushing a number of industry-related initiatives on trade and health care. Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) said he would continue to try to build support for a proposal to have the government pick up part of the auto industry's retiree health-care bills, if the carmakers promise to invest in new energy technologies such as hybrids.

"My hope is that the president and his staff are working to examine these approaches," Obama said yesterday in an interview. "I can assure you if the president doesn't take the lead, the Congress will."

Big 3 Automakers Commit To Reducing Oil Dependence (WT)

By Sean Lengell

The Washington Times, November 15, 2006

The nation's largest automakers told President Bush yesterday they are committed to developing vehicles that use renewable fuels to reduce the country's dependence on foreign oil.

But the automakers added that if the U.S. automotive industry is to be competitive with Asian imports, the federal government must take a leading role in helping lower the industry's health care costs, balance the trade deficit with Japan and end tariffs on imported steel.

"It was a very good dialogue -- very open, back and forth," said General Motors Corp. Chairman and Chief Executive Rick Wagoner. "In a number of areas, there was agreement in the things we could continue to work on."

Mr. Bush added he found "a lot in common" with the auto executives.

"These leaders are making difficult decisions, tough choices to make sure that their companies are competitive in a global economy. And I'm confident that they're making the right decisions," Mr. Bush told reporters.

The president, who didn't take questions from reporters, said the meeting was "the beginning of a series of discussions we'll have [with the auto industry] -- not only with me, but with people in our government."

The Oval Office meeting, which the automakers had been seeking for months, lasted more than an hour and was attended by Vice President Dick Cheney and other administration officials.

The automakers said they were committed to producing more cars that run on renewable and alternatives fuels. But they said the government must do its part to provide incentives that encourage the manufacture, distribution and availability of renewable fuels.

Mr. Bush said he shares a "mutual desire to reduce our dependence on imported oil."

Raising the fuel economy of vehicles would help lessen that dependence, but the average fuel economy in the U.S. fleet has been stagnant for years as consumers have opted for more power and luxury rather than fuel economy.

Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat, this summer helped introduce the Fuel Economy Reform Act of 2006, which calls for the fuel-economy standards for passenger cars and light trucks, which include sport utility vehicles, to increase by 4 percent annually, or about one mile per gallon.

But the executives, who included Ford Motor Co. Chief Executive Alan Mulally and Tom LaSorda, president and chief executive officer of DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler Group, said the president didn't agree with them on everything, particularly on how to balance trade with Japan.

"It's our strong conviction that the Japanese yen is systematically undervalued, which helps them to maintain significant trade-balance surpluses in our industry," Mr. Wagoner said. "I can't honestly say it appears the president 100 percent saw it that way ... . But we agreed to continue the dialogue."

Mr. Bush met with the leaders just hours before left on a trip to Asia and the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit in Vietnam.

The president said the message he will give those countries is "just treat us like we treat you ... . Our markets are open for your products, and we expect your markets to be open for ours, including our automobiles."

The auto executives said that upwardly spiraling health care costs are putting them in a serious competitive disadvantage with manufacturers in countries where workers receive government-sponsored health care.

All three automakers spend more on health care per vehicle than on steel, which adds about $1,000 to the cost of a car built by Detroit's Big Three. GM, the nation's largest private provider of health care, spent $5.3 billion on health care last year for 1.1 million employees, retirees and their dependents.

In a joint statement released by the three auto executives after the meeting, they urged the federal government to take a "leading role to improve health care and make it affordable and available."

But the executives insisted they don't want a government bailout similar to the 1979 measure approved by Congress that helped save Chrysler Corp.

"Are we interested in a bailout? Absolutely not, because we really believe that the action starts with us, and we're taking the action to create a more competitive business," Mr. Mulally said.

Instead, the automakers said they advocate health care changes on a national scale, not specific help for the automotive industry.

"Health care is an issue that faces every company, every business, every level of government as well," Mr. LaSorda said. "So the same problems they have at the federal government, we have here in our industry."

The executives said the president agreed to study how to lower costs for those with serious illnesses or chronic diseases, which account for about 30 percent of the nation's health care bill.

Bush, Auto CEOs Agree On Some Issues (USAT)

USA Today, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush met with the heads of Detroit's automakers at the White House Tuesday for what he called a “constructive and meaningful dialogue,” while automakers said they agreed with the administration on many, but not all, issues.

General Motors CEO Rick Wagoner said the automakers told the president they could increase their production of vehicles that can run on ethanol blends or biodiesel to half their fleet by 2012, if they could be assured that such fuels would be widely available. Those fuels are made from plants along with petroleum. Substituting them for straight petroleum-based gasoline or diesel fuel would cut U.S. oil consumption. It also would funnel fuel dollars to U.S. agribusiness instead of to overseas oil producers.

In public remarks after the meeting, Bush made no pledge to push for wider availability of alternative fuels, which are hard to find outside the farm belt. But he said, “As these automobile manufacturers begin to incorporate new technologies that will enable us to power our cars in different ways, it will make it easier for me to be able to tell the American people we're using less foreign oil. And that's in our economic interests, as well as in our national security interests.”

Vice President Cheney, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and other officials joined Wagoner, Chrysler Group CEO Tom LaSorda and Ford Motor CEO Alan Mulally in the 45-minute Oval Office meeting.

Bush said the executives "are making difficult decisions, tough choices to make sure that their companies are competitive in a global economy.

"And I'm confident that they're making the right decisions, and that's good news for the American people, because the automobile manufacturers play such a significant part of our economy," he said.

Bush and the executives said they touched on health care, energy and currency, as expected. While Wagoner, LaSorda and Mulally praised the president for being open to their concerns, Wagoner said there was some disagreement, especially on Detroit's allegations of Japanese currency manipulation.

"I can honestly say that it appeared the president didn't 100% see it that way," Wagoner said. "We had a good open dialogue. We agreed to continue that dialogue."

Bush said the meeting was a starting point for future conversations about the state of the industry. While not promising to discuss currency with Asian leaders in meetings next week, Bush said he will tell them: "Our markets are open for your products, and we expect your markets to be open for ours, including our automobiles."

The companies had pursued the long-awaited meeting, originally scheduled for May, after finding few sympathetic ears for their concerns in the administration.

Mulally, Ford's new CEO, said he "was very impressed with the president's knowledge" of the auto industry's competitive pressures.

GM And Ford, Hungry For Cash, Pledge Assets To Secure Loans (WSJ)

By Jeffrey C. Mccracken, John D. Stoll And John D. Mckinnon

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

Facing a deep financial crisis, Detroit's two top auto makers have had to pledge some of their most essential assets -- such as factories and equipment -- as collateral to win badly needed new loans.

For General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co., once such icons of American industrial prowess that banks and insurance funds stood in line to serve them, the need to provide lenders with collateral underscores the combination of woes now facing the industry: lean, effective competition from international auto makers, rising health-care, pension and steel costs, and unfavorable exchange rates that U.S. executives say give Japanese rivals an advantage.

Yesterday, chief executives of the two companies and of DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler Group -- the third member of Detroit's Big Three -- took their concerns to Washington in search of relief. But while President Bush promised to maintain a "continuing dialogue," the auto makers walked away with scant sign that Mr. Bush is willing to help them on their big worry about soaring health-care costs.

"I assured these leaders that the government is addressing rising health-care costs through a variety of initiatives that I think over time are going to make a significant difference," Mr. Bush said. The executives said the president did agree, however, that he and the auto makers should "study" how high-cost care of "catastrophic" health problems is insured.

For Detroit, the challenges are stark. A chart released by Ford yesterday appeared to show a 2009 profit of a few hundred million dollars -- a fraction of what Japan's Toyota Motor Corp. earns in North America in one quarter. The forecast surfaced as part of a restatement of earnings from 2001 through 2005 to correct the accounting of interest-rate swaps in Ford's credit division and certain other derivative transactions. The restatement narrowed Ford's third-quarter loss to $5.2 billion from the previously reported $5.8 billion.

Such financial conditions provide the backdrop to the shift to collateralized loans by GM and Ford. Their long slide in the global auto industry has now put their balance sheets under pressure. Last year, the companies' declining market share and mounting losses in their core auto operations prompted Standard & Poor's Corp. and other credit-rating agencies to cut their debt ratings to "junk" status. That made it more expensive for the companies to borrow money, especially when they seek unsecured loans.

Now their depressed credit ratings are pushing the two auto makers to new sources of financing.

GM, which posted a $10.6 billion loss last year, in July extended a credit line from a syndicate of banks under new terms that give the company a $4.6 billion revolving loan backed by North American assets including inventory, plants and property.

GM CEO Rick Wagoner,2 Ford CEO Alan Mulally, and Chrysler CEO Tom Lasorda take questions about their White House meeting on what the auto industry can do to support energy and health-care initiatives. 3

WSJ Detroit deputy bureau chief4 Neal Boudette says he isn't sure Congress is going to be moving quickly to help the auto industry.

On Monday, GM used equipment in some of its U.S. plants to secure a $1.5 billion loan to be arranged by J.P. Morgan Securities Inc. and Credit Suisse Securities. Since secured loans are less expensive than unsecured financing, they are now a more attractive option for GM.

Gina Proia, a GM spokeswoman, said the move is intended to "enhance" the company's liquidity. "Given our credit rating, secured loans are the most cost-effective way of funding," she said. "We see it as a prudent move." She said GM has total debt of $32.8 billion, the majority of it unsecured.

Yesterday, Ford said it is moving in the same direction. As part of a conference call on its earnings restatement, Chief Financial Officer Don Leclair said Ford aims to put together a loan deal that is likely to be secured "by a significant portion of the assets of the company." Ford's losses amount to about $7 billion so far this year, and the company is on pace to approach GM's $10.6 billion 2005 loss.

Without specifying a time frame, Mr. Leclair said Ford would have a deal to announce "fairly soon." He added that Ford is pursuing the deal "because it is prudent to do so."

Mr. Leclair declined to specify how much money Ford is looking to borrow and wouldn't specify what assets Ford could pledge in order to secure new lines of credit, or whether that might include assets from the Ford family. The family owns about 3% of the company but has 40% of the voting rights.

He acknowledged that Ford's move to asset-backed loans reflects the company's difficult financial condition. This is the first time in Ford's 103-year history that it has resorted to such financing. "It is a recognition that we have some issues," he said.

The shift to secure asset-backed loans was in part prompted by a change in how large corporations must account for company-funded pension plans on their balance sheets. Starting Jan. 1, companies must recognize all future pension obligations as liabilities. Since GM has a large number of retirees, its liabilities will increase sharply and will outweigh the value of the company's assets. That will leave it with negative shareholder equity -- the difference between total assets and liabilities and a measure of net worth -- which will make it harder for GM to borrow money because terms with the company's bondholders could prohibit it from pledging certain assets to back loans.

Ms. Proia, the GM spokeswoman, said having negative equity is a balance-sheet issue and would have no impact on GM's operations such as cash flow.

Ford also expects the accounting change to leave it with negative shareholder equity, although it isn't bound by the same kind of bond terms as GM, Mr. Leclair said.

Ford has roughly $23 billion in cash and expects to end the year with about $20 billion -- a figure supplemented by $3.4 billion taken out of a fund employers set up to pay retiree health-care costs. For all of 2006, Ford will burn through $8.4 billion.

GM's cash will be fattened significantly when the company closes the sale of a controlling stake in its General Motors Acceptance Corp. unit to a group of investors led by Cerberus Capital Management. GM plans to close the sale by Nov. 30. GM will receive $10 billion upon closing, and also will hold on to $20 billion of GMAC automotive leases, which it plans to sell at a discount to raise some $4 billion in cash over three years.

For GM, Ford and Chrysler, an increasing amount of their cash flow gets eaten up by the cost of providing health care to their active and retired workers, along with their spouses and dependents.

After meeting with Mr. Bush, the car makers soon will take their health-care case to Capitol Hill, where newly empowered Democrats already are talking about a reinsurance plan that would help offset catastrophic-coverage costs. Democrats, who are more focused than Republicans on shoring up employer-based health care, also are talking about new tax breaks for employers. GM Chairman and Chief Executive Rick Wagoner suggested yesterday that he is hopeful the new majority would come up with a plan to help employers. He said he will know more about Democrats' receptivity "in about six months."

The fact that Mr. Bush left the door slightly open to a reinsurance proposal suggests he is reluctant to reject auto makers and their Democratic allies out of hand, after suffering the loss of both the House and Senate in this month's midterm elections.

On other matters, the president and the car makers appeared to agree that U.S. manufacturers continue to be unfairly shut out of some Asian markets. Mr. Bush, who travels to Vietnam this week for a meeting with Asian leaders, promised to raise the auto executives' concerns. "My message to our trading partners is, just treat us the way we treat you," Mr. Bush said in his post-meeting summary. "Our markets are open for your products, and we expect your markets to be open for ours, including our automobiles."

But there seemed to be a continuing difference of opinion on the auto makers' concerns that Japan is manipulating its currency, the yen, to undercut U.S. manufacturers. Bush administration officials say there is little evidence that valuation of the yen is a major factor for the auto makers. And Japanese companies point out that many of their cars are made in the U.S.

While the president and the executives found some grounds for agreement, there was clearly distance between them on a few matters high on the companies' list. Mr. Bush apparently agreed only to study their ideas on health care -- particularly a suggestion that an assigned-risk pool be created for catastrophic cases -- presumably to be funded by the government.

On energy, the White House and the manufacturers agreed on the need to continue expanding availability of gasoline alternatives such as ethanol and biodiesel. The executives even promised to make 50% of their new vehicles capable of running on either conventional gasoline or alternative fuels by 2012 if the pipes and pumps needed to sell the new fuels are available. That is likely to require continued government help and perhaps even new initiatives.

Senate Democrats Elect Leaders (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — Senate Democrats, meeting in the historic chambers where Daniel Webster and Henry Clay once orated, today elected a team of leaders for next year's session.

The team looks a lot like last year's lineup. Harry Reid of Nevada was elected majority leader and Richard Durbin of Illinois was chosen for the No. 2 slot of majority whip.

Charles Schumer of New York, who headed the cash-raising campaign committee that was triumphant in last week's elections, will continue in that role as well as taking on the No. 3 position — vice chair of the Democratic Conference. Patty Murray of Washington was elected conference secretary and Byron Dorgan of North Dakota continued as head of the policy committee.

What has changed in the lineup is that next year Democrats will be in charge of running the committees and setting the agenda for floor debate. Reid lost no time in emphasizing why that has already changed the dynamic of power in Washington — especially on Iraq.

"Three Americans were killed yesterday and 150 Iraqis in one incident [today] were kidnapped. That means they're going to be killed," Reid told reporters at the Capitol. The war is "costing us $3 billion a week. It's not going to go away."

Insisting that Democrats "are not making any threats toward the president," Reid called on the White House to "work with us" because "the American people want it and they deserve it."

Reflecting on their treatment at the hands of Republicans during the years out of power, Reid said pointedly, "We're going to treat the minority, the Republicans, as they did not treat us."

Noting that "a 51-vote majority is as thin as they come," Durbin said, "We not only want to move the right agenda, we want to do it in the right way."

Referring to a "steady deterioration" of civility in Congress, Durban said, "Now Democrats have the chance, even the challenge, to restore the dignity of this great American institution."

On policy issues, Murray said the new leadership will address rising college tuition, healthcare costs and what Reid described as "relieving the tax burden on the middle class."

Murray said Democrats hope to convey to American families that "we are at your back."

Senate Democrats Choose Leaders For Next Congress (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0094544

By David Stout

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 14 — Senate Democratic leaders were chosen today for the next Congress, and they allowed themselves a few gibes at Republicans before pledging to work for a new spirit of bipartisan cooperation on Capitol Hill.

"We're going to treat the minority, the Republicans, as they did not treat us," Senator Harry Reid of Nevada said at a news conference after being picked as majority leader by the Democratic caucus. "They'll be involved in decisions when we have legislation that passes this body."

Mr. Reid repeated his pledge to work with President Bush, and he said he supported a vote in the current lame-duck Congress on Robert M. Gates's nomination to succeed Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. "The sooner we can move it forward, the sooner we can get rid of Rumsfeld," he told The Associated Press.

Mr. Reid recalled that Mr. Bush said after the election that he wanted to work with Democrats. "He said that two years ago, and it didn't work," Mr. Reid said.

Mr. Reid has been minority leader, and he was not opposed for elevation to majority leader in the 110th Congress, which convenes in January. He called his new post "the opportunity of a lifetime for me" and said his goal is to re-establish the power of the legislative branch "as deemed to be so important in checks and balances by our Founding Fathers."

Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois will continue as Democratic whip, and Senator Charles E. Schumer will remain as the Senate campaign chairman, while also taking on the title of vice chairman of the Democratic caucus, a post that Mr. Reid said makes the New Yorker No. 3 in the party leadership ranks.

Mr. Durbin, too, said he hoped for bipartisan progress on Capitol Hill, and a lot more good will. "We have watched the steady deterioration of comity and cooperation in the United States Congress," he said. "Now the Democrats have a chance — even a challenge — to restore the dignity of this great American institution."

Amid the talk of bipartisanship, there was an unmistakable eagerness to advance a Democratic agenda in the next Congress, and assertions that Republicans did not do enough for middle-class Americans while they controlled the House and the Senate.

"The middle class is being squeezed," Mr. Reid said. "Squeezed. The rich are getting richer; the poor are getting poorer. We must do something about education. We must do something to relieve the tax burden on the middle class."

Senator Patty Murray of Washington, chosen as caucus secretary, said the new Democratic majority would try to "make sure that our country is once again strong, and our country once again says to American families, 'We are at your back.' That's the country I was raised in. That's the country I look forward to building once again."

Senator Debbie Stabenow, who won re-election in Michigan last week, will lead the party's steering and outreach committee, and Senator Byron Dorgan of North Dakota will be chairman of the policy committee. Senators Jeff Bingaman of New Mexico, Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Blanche Lincoln of Arkansas will also serve in "outreach" leadership posts.

Senate Republicans are to pick their leaders on Wednesday, House Democrats on Thursday and House Republicans on Friday.

Mr. Reid said Senator Barbara Boxer of California would become chief deputy whip, and Senators Thomas R. Carper of Delaware, Bill Nelson of Florida and Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin deputy whips.

And Senator Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia will be the Senate's president pro tem and will provide "leadership and experience gained from a lifetime of public service," Mr. Reid said. Mr. Byrd, who won another term last week, was first elected to the Senate in 1958.

Mr. Byrd, who will turn 89 on Monday, will be third in line for the presidency, after Vice President Dick Cheney and the incoming House speaker, Nancy J. Pelosi. The outgoing president pro tem is Senator Ted Stevens, Republican of Alaska, who will turn 83 on Saturday.

Mr. Reid described Mr. Schumer's function as vice chairman of the caucus as "a utility man — he'll be called upon to do lots of different things." Asked if the title amounted to "a tipping of the hat" because of his work in the campaign, Mr. Reid replied simply, "Yes."

Mr. Schumer said he liked the sound of "Majority Leader Harry Reid," and predicted that "over the next two years, it's going to sound great to the American people when Harry and his team show what we can do."

In the 2008 elections, Mr. Schumer will try to hold on to the Democrats' majority in the Senate, a fact that Mr. Durbin acknowledged. "We know that a 51-vote majority is as thin as they come," he said.

Schumer, The Victor, Wins New Leadership Position (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, November 15, 2006

Senate Democrats rewarded Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) yesterday for his success as chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) by giving him a specially created leadership position.

In return for the new title of vice chairman of the caucus, which ranks third among Democratic leaders, Schumer has agreed to serve another two years as chairman of the Senate Democratic fundraising committee.

Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) announced after a closed-door meeting of the Democratic caucus yesterday that Democrats had created the new position, which puts Schumer below only Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.), the incoming majority whip, and Reid, but means he outranks the Democratic conference secretary.

Though Reid will not formally take over as Senate majority leader until January, he has already reshaped the leadership. In addition to Schumer's new job, Reid created two other posts to foster better relations between elected leaders and committee chairmen.

"Sen. Schumer has many talents, one of which is helping to set the direction of the Democratic Caucus," said Reid when asked about Schumer's new responsibilities. Schumer would work as a "utility man," addressing challenges as they arise.

Schumer responded: "I want to thank my colleagues for electing me vice chair of the caucus, number three in the leadership. I want to thank Harry Reid in particular for the great job he has done for us. 'Majority Leader Harry Reid' sounds really good to us and over the next two years will sound great to the American people."

Senate Democrats yesterday also elected Sen. Patty Murray (Wash.) to replace Sen. Debbie Stabenow (Mich.) as the Democratic conference secretary, previously the third-ranking post in the Democratic leadership. It will now rank fourth.

Reid appointed Stabenow chairwoman of the Democratic Steering and Outreach Committee, a post that consults on decisions over committee assignments and heads outreach to allied coalitions such as labor unions and environmental groups.

Stabenow will replace Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who will assume a new minor position as vice chair of committee outreach. There, she will assist Sen. Jeff Bingaman (D-N.M.), chairman of committee outreach, in providing "a voice in the Democratic leadership for committee chairs. Clinton's appointment is curious because she, unlike Bingaman, will not chair a committee in the next Congress.

Bingaman's post as a liaison between the committees and the leadership is also new.

Schumer was still negotiating with other leaders over his new job Monday. This is the second time Schumer has used his prospective chairmanship of the DSCC as negotiating leverage with Democratic leaders. Two years ago, he nabbed a seat on the Senate Finance Committee after agreeing to forego a run for governor and instead head the DSCC. In that role, Schumer has been highly successful.

Schumer raised nearly $25 million more during the 2006 cycle than his Republican counterpart, Sen. Elizabeth Dole (N.C.). He also recruited talented candidates who defeated GOP incumbents in "red" states such as Montana, Virginia, and Ohio.

Reid reappointed several colleagues to lower-ranking leadership slots. Sen. Byron Dorgan (D-N.D.) will serve another Congress as chairman of the Democratic Policy Committee. Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) will serve again as chief deputy whip. Sen. Blanche Lincoln (D-Ark.) will again chair the Senate Democrats' rural outreach effort.

Sens. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.), Bill Nelson (D-Fla.), and Tom Carper (D-Del.) will assist Durbin next year as deputy whips. Feingold, one of the most liberal members of the Senate, will help corral the votes of liberal lawmakers, while Carper, a centrist, will work to persuade conservative-leaning Democrats.

Carper's appointment to serve as deputy whip is a small consolation for being passed over for a seat on the Senate Finance Committee. Carper had jockeyed hard for the assignment, but he lost out to Sen. Ken Salazar (D-Colo.), who has four fewer years of Senate seniority. Senate insiders said Salazar leapfrogged Carper because the panel's incoming chairman, Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), wanted more Western lawmakers on the committee.

Carper's fellow members of the freshman class of 2000, Stabenow and Sen. Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.), won the other two open seats on Finance.

Reid Pledges To Press Bush On Iraq Policy (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), who was elected Senate majority leader yesterday, said last night that President Bush still has not grasped the urgent need to change course in Iraq. Reid vowed to press quickly for phased troop withdrawals, a more international approach to Iraq's problems and a rebuilding of the depleted U.S. military.

In his first extensive interview since the Senate Democrats' leadership election, Reid also said members of his party will have to think big on the nation's domestic issues. That includes tackling the budget deficit with strict new rules on spending, exploring an eventual expansion of Medicare to address the uninsured, and examining an increase in tax rates on upper-income Americans.

But it was on the issue of Iraq that he was most passionate. Voter anger over the war swept his party to power with the unlikely defeat of six Republican senators, he said. Democrats must respond to that anger, he added, with hearings to keep the heat on the Bush administration, and with calls for a regional Middle Eastern conference and a revitalized Iraqi reconstruction effort.

To that end, he said, one of the first acts of the new Democratic Congress will be a $75 billion boost to the military budget to try to get the Army's diminished units back into combat shape.

Democrats will not try, Reid pledged, to play the strongest hand they have -- using Congress's power of the purse to starve the war effort of money and force the president to move. Such an effort would only elicit a veto from Bush. But he said Democrats will marshal their newly acquired power -- in hearing rooms and on the Senate floor -- to stoke public opinion and drive the debate.

"Three Americans killed yesterday, four British; 150 Iraqis taken out of that building and kidnapped; 1,800-plus went through that one Baghdad morgue but that doesn't count all the dead," Reid recounted. "My displeasure with the president, he doesn't understand the urgency of this. It's all victory for him, but I don't know what that means anymore in Iraq. I do know what we are doing now doesn't work."

Reid said he will be able to work well with Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), the incoming House speaker, whom he described as resilient and "a very astute politician." But he said the Senate will work differently from the House, given the Senate Democrats' very narrow 51 to 49 majority, which will necessitate close cooperation with Republicans.

"The speaker of the House has to be aggressive," Reid said. "It's like the British Parliament. If you've got the votes, you ram it through. But the Senate works differently."

Democrats also elected Sen. Richard J. Durbin (Ill.) yesterday as assistant Senate majority leader. Durbin has been assistant minority leader since January 2005. Senate Republicans will elect their leaders for the 110th Congress today.

In January, after two years as a Senate minority leader who bedeviled the Republican legislative agenda and sharply criticized Bush, Reid will take the helm of a body that has been notoriously difficult to control.

To the casual observer, Reid comes across as a reserved, soft-spoken, deferential politician who appears more comfortable in the backrooms of the Capitol than in the spotlight. But to those who have watched him close up, Reid's reputation is quite different -- that of a brawler who moves with the alacrity he acquired in his days as an amateur boxer.

The consummate pessimist in a political world full of sunny optimism, Reid is fond of saying that he would rather expect the worst and accept the occasional pleasant surprise than forever live with disappointment.

Reid, 66, came by his dour outlook honestly. He grew up in a tin-roofed shack in the gold-mining hamlet of Searchlight, Nev. His father was a hard-rock miner and a hard drinker whose battles with alcoholism and depression ended in suicide at age 58. His mother was a laundrywoman. Reid hitchhiked to high school 40 miles from home.

Upon graduation, local merchants raised money for his college tuition. He helped put himself through George Washington University Law School, working nights as a U.S. Capitol police officer.

But most of Reid's adult life has been in politics, becoming city attorney in Henderson, Nev., in 1964; a member of the Nevada State Assembly in 1968; and lieutenant governor in 1970. He clashed with the mob as head of the state's Gaming Commission, then went to the House in 1982. He reached the Senate in 1986.

In that time, he has been beset by controversies that continue to pose political problems for him. A $400,000 land purchase in Clark County, Nev., that Reid made in 1998 with a friend and business partner grabbed headlines in October when the senator had to amend four years of ethics reports to Congress to more fully explain the transaction. The sale brought in $1.1 million, netting a $700,000 profit in six years.

"Windfall?" he bristled yesterday. "I shouldn't have sold it. That was my big mistake. You know what that property is worth now? Thirteen million dollars."

This week, the Los Angeles Times published a report suggesting that the $18 million that Reid secured for a bridge connecting Laughlin, Nev., to Bullhead City, Ariz., may have boosted the value of land Reid owns nearby. Again, Reid scoffed at any hint of wrongdoing. The bridge, he said, is needed because heavy truck traffic has been limited on the Hoover Dam since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. The land in Arizona has been in his family since the 1960s, he added, noting that he has never seen it, much less thought of boosting its value. He said that it could take until 2013 to build that bridge.

Last month, the National Republican Senatorial Committee cited the controversies around Reid as it goaded Democratic candidates to return the party leader's campaign donations.

Reid's loyalty to the mining industry, which plays an important role in his state's economy, has created run-ins with fellow Democrats who seek to raise royalty fees on federal land and impose stronger environmental standards. He also opposes abortion rights, a position derived from his Mormon religion, which has put him at odds with many other Democrats.

Yet, Senate Democrats have strong faith in their leader.

"We went through combat together; and when you go through combat together, you learn everything," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), who heads the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, which helped Democrats take control of the Senate.

In the run-up to the Nov. 7 midterm elections, Democrats kept their legislative agenda carefully circumscribed to a set of initiatives that conservatives, moderates and liberals could all agree on. But in yesterday's interview, Reid hinted that Democrats will have to go further to address what he sees as the widening gap between rich and poor, and a middle class squeezed by health care costs and rising tuition.

Budget rules will be passed to require that any new spending or tax cuts will have to be offset by equal spending cuts or tax increases, he said.

"We can do this," he added. "People might not like what we do," but Democrats will stick to the rules.

He pledged an "unalterable commitment" not to touch the middle-class tax cuts Bush secured in his first term. But he said Democrats "would be crazy" to rule out rolling back tax breaks that benefited the top 1 percent of earners. He also spoke volubly about federal health-care programs for the elderly and for veterans that he said should be a model as Congress looks to address the growing problem of the uninsured.

"We have to look at the uninsured because it's bankrupting our country," he said.

Asked about a proposal floated by former president Bill Clinton to expand Medicare for those who could buy into it, Reid said, "we're not there yet," but he added that it should be studied.

"Someday, someday," he said, "what we have to do is cinch up our belts and take on the insurance industry."

Exultant Chuck Says He'll Veto The Next Alito (NYO)

By Jason Horowitz

New Yourk Observer, November 15, 2006

More than the inability to influence Iraq policy or the President's tax cuts, Chuck Schumer says that the single greatest failure of the Democrats as an opposition party was allowing Samuel Alito to join the Supreme Court.

"Judges are the most important," said Mr. Schumer, who orchestrated the implausible Democratic takeover of the Senate last week. "One more justice would have made it a 5-4 conservative, hard-right majority for a long time. That won't happen."

From now on, all the President's judicial appointments will need to meet the requirements of Mr. Schumer, the Park Slope power broker who has happily accepted the mantle of chief architect for the Democrats' effort to build a majority for the 2008 elections and beyond.

The Senator also intends, in the coming months, to rework the federal government's funding priorities in New York's favor, to steer the Democrats toward a radically new position on Iraq and, while he's at it, to cement his position as the unofficially declared tactical guru for the national party.

And in case anyone's wondering, yes, Mr. Schumer is entirely comfortable with this sort of power.

With his Gold Toe–stockinged feet dangling, the 55-year-old slumped in his armchair on Friday morning as if it were a leather throne. On his apartment's front door, a neighbor taped up a front page of The New York Times heralding the Democrats' success and scrawled "Congratulations Schumers!" across the cover.

The candidates that Mr. Schumer recruited, groomed and bankrolled had won a comprehensive victory over the incumbent Republicans, giving the Democrats a narrow majority in the Senate to complement a rout in the House. Since the election, Mr. Schumer has been awash in attention from the media, his Democratic colleagues and even from the President, who called, quite sportingly, soon after the results were finalized.

For Mr. Schumer, who was installed on Tuesday as Vice Chairman of the Democratic caucus and officially reinstated as head of the DSCC, the attention couldn't be coming at a better time.

Advertisement

"I am writing a book, about how to build a permanent—a long-term majority," Mr. Schumer said during an early-morning interview in the pink den of his apartment near Grand Army Plaza. He sat between a view of lower Manhattan and portraits of Democratic icons Franklin Delano Roosevelt and Al Smith. "I generally have an eye toward longer-term strategy and politics, and I think my colleagues rely on me for that."

His book, Positively American: Winning Back the Middle Class Majority One Family at a Time, will be released right around the President's State of the Union address, and will fit neatly into the role that Mr. Schumer now envisions for himself as tactician in chief for the newly ascendant Democrats.

"I've always had some influence, and I guess now, because of what we've been able to accomplish, I have some more influence," Mr. Schumer said. "So when I say we shouldn't do this or we should do that, I guess people will pay a little more attention. Or go along with it, even if they don't agree."

Certainly, the party wasn't united behind Mr. Schumer's election strategy this year. He championed a traditional approach: directing the bulk of the party's financial and logistical resources toward handpicked candidates in a few competitive races. Howard Dean, who heads the Democratic National Committee, advocated a "50-state strategy," spreading money around toward the longer-term goal of making the party viable even in areas that have been Republican strongholds.

After the victory—the Democrats picked up six Republican-held seats and defended every Democratic one—Mr. Schumer hardly seemed ready to concede the point.

"Fifty-state is a good thing to do, but it didn't help us in this election," said Mr. Schumer. "My only disagreement with Howard is that he should help us fund taking back the majority, because it would make a difference with things like the Supreme Court. And he came through—he ended up giving us $7.5 million. We tried the honey approach rather than the vinegar approach, and it worked."

Pelosi Pulls Out The Stops For Murtha (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, November 15, 2006

Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) is imploring her colleagues to support Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) for majority leader, multiple House Democrats said yesterday, dealing an unexpected but not necessarily fatal blow to Murtha's opponent, Rep. Steny Hoyer (D-Md.).

It had been unclear until yesterday whether Pelosi would use her clout to turn votes to Murtha. She endorsed him in a letter Sunday, but some dismissed it as a nod to personal loyalty rather than a statement of her intentions.

But by yesterday, her intent was clear, several lawmakers said; she hopes to oust her onetime rival Hoyer from the leadership.

"She's committed. If they thought she was just going to endorse his candidacy, they were mistaken," said Rep. Bill Pascrell (D-N.J.), a Murtha ally. "She didn't have to do this. It's called courage."

By throwing her full weight behind Murtha, Pelosi risks suffering an early setback with her colleagues if Hoyer wins; however, a Murtha victory would cement her total control.

Pelosi called incoming Ways and Means Committee chairman Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) yesterday morning just hours after he had told the New York Sun, "I think Steny has done his job. I cannot think of any reason why this is happening," prompting the paper to run the headline "Rangel Backs Hoyer for Leader."

"I don't know what article she had seen, but she had thought it was an endorsement of Steny," Rangel said.

Rangel told her it was not an endorsement but reiterated his earlier statement that "nobody had given me any reason not to support Steny."

Rangel would not discuss the details of his conversation with Pelosi, but he said that that statement remained true even after their conversation. "I'm not supporting anyone right now," he said.

Yet nine other incoming full committee chairmen are supporting Hoyer. Reps. John Dingell (D-Mich.), Barney Frank (D-Mass.), Bart Gordon (D-Tenn.), Jim Oberstar (D-Minn.), Tom Lantos (D-Calif.), John Spratt (D-S.C.), Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.) and Henry Waxman (D-Calif.) signed a letter yesterday backing Hoyer.

"There simply is no question: Nancy and Steny have been a terrific team … we believe that Nancy and Steny not only deserve great credit for bringing us to this point, but also will be the best team to lead our caucus as we move forward in the majority," they wrote.

Murtha and Pelosi were working the crowd together Monday night at Murtha's reception at the Library of Congress.

The two of them spoke to Rep.-elect Tim Walz (D-Minn.), who said afterward that he was "still undecided" but appeared to be leaning toward Murtha.

"To be honest, I was waiting for the Speaker," Walz said. "When the Speaker speaks, you listen. I take that into heavy consideration."

Still other freshmen remained steadfast in their support of Hoyer despite intense lobbying by Murtha's allies. Reps.-elect Ron Klein (D-Fla.), Kathy Castor (D-Fla.) and Phil Hare (D-Ill.) were vigorously supporting Hoyer yesterday.

Klein said the new members were ready to have the issue decided.

"I think most of the freshman class [supports bringing] this forward. Get this done and let's get on to business," he said.

Rep. Paul Kanjorski (D-Pa.) said he hoped Pelosi's endorsement would have an effect, "especially on freshmen."

The intense lobbying has put some freshmen in uncomfortable situations. The Murtha camp was infuriated Friday when Rep.-elect Paul Hodes (D-N.H.) signed a letter with other freshmen supporting Hoyer, charging that Hodes had told them he would remain uncommitted.

"I really can't comment on what anybody else thought," Hodes said yesterday. "I consider my word as my bond and I am continuing to support Congressman Hoyer."

Rep. Jim Moran (D-Va.), a Murtha supporter, said Monday night that Pelosi is playing for keeps.

"She will ensure that they [the Murtha camp] wins. This is hardball politics … We are entering an era where when the Speaker instructs you what to do, you do it," he said. "Yes, she's making calls to people. She is contacting people and letting them know that it's an unequivocal letter."

Hoyer's camp was aware of the calls, said one lawmaker supporting the Democratic whip.

"She's making calls, so don't be shocked," the lawmaker said.

Another House Democrat supporting Hoyer was incensed that Pelosi was exerting her influence in the caucus, asserting that it will further divide House Democrats.

"It's an incredible display of hubris," the member said, using a phrase Pelosi herself sometimes employs. "It's incredibly egotistical. We all got us here. We all got us to the promised land and Steny's not going to the promised land?"

The member said regardless of who ultimately wins the Thursday election, the effect of Pelosi actively getting involved in the race would reverberate for some time.

"Either way, it's damaging," the member said. "She will have a tremendous road to hoe to repair the damage she's done."

Leader Race Heats Up (RC)

By John Bresnahan And Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, November 15, 2006

The race for House Majority Leader between Democratic Reps. Steny Hoyer (Md.) and John Murtha (Pa.) got nasty on Tuesday, as Murtha accused Hoyer's allies of spreading allegations that he was corrupt while Murtha tried to tie Hoyer to President Bush's policy on Iraq.

The back-and-forth between the two senior Democrats came as Hoyer released the names of another 35 supporters, bringing the total number of Members who have backed him for the second-highest position in the House to roughly 80. Murtha has released the names of 22 of his his supporters, meaning approximately 130 Democrats have not openly stated their preference at this point. Murtha would have to capture the vast majority of those undeclared Members to claim victory in the leadership campaign.

Murtha avowed Tuesday that he was a victim of "swift-boating" by Hoyer and his allies via news stories linking him to the Abscam scandal of the early 1980s, as well as more recent reports that he did legislative favors for clients of his brother's lobbying firm and another firm where a former top aide worked.

In the Abscam case, Murtha was caught on videotape being offered a $50,000 bribe by an undercover FBI agent, and although he was a member of the House ethics committee, he failed to report the bribe offer to authorities. Murtha was never charged in the case but was named an unindicted co-conspirator. Six Members and one Senator went to prison in the Abscam probe.

While not accusing Hoyer of spreading the corruption stories himself, Murtha and his advisers suggested that Hoyer had done "oppo research" on the veteran lawmaker and was now feeding negative information on Murtha to the press to damage the Pennsylvania Democrat's campaign for Majority Leader.

"I am disconcerted that some are making headlines by resorting to unfounded allegations that occurred 26 years ago," Murtha said in a statement released by his office. "I thought we were above this type of swift-boating attack. This is not how we restore integrity and civility to the United States Congress."

Murtha then attempted to shift the focus of the leadership battle from ethics to Iraq. Murtha asserted that Hoyer refused to back a November 2005 proposal from Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and other anti-war Democrats, including Murtha, to pull all U.S. troops out of Iraq.

"Of the critical issues we are faced with today, the war in Iraq is the most crucial," Murtha said. "The Pelosi-Murtha position on the war is the reason the Democrats are in the majority today. Congressman Hoyer's position has been to stay the course with President Bush from the very beginning and, like Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), he advocates sending in more troops."

Hoyer refused to personally address Murtha's comments at a press conference on Tuesday, but his office later released a statement pointing out that the Maryland Democrat had co-signed three letters in recent months along with Murtha calling for American forces to be redeployed from Iraq to other countries.

When asked about Murtha's remarks on his Iraq stance, Hoyer said, "That's not accurate."

"Congressman Hoyer and Congressman Murtha have joined other Democratic leaders from both the House and Senate in signing three letters to the president that outline the consensus among Democrats regarding Iraq," added Stacey Farnen Bernards, Hoyer's press secretary.

"Any representation that Congressman Hoyer endorses a 'stay-the-course' strategy or advocates sending more troops to Iraq is wrong."

However, on Nov. 30, 2005, Hoyer released a statement saying that "a precipitous withdrawal of American forces in Iraq could lead to disaster, spawning a civil war, fostering a haven for terrorists and damaging our nation's security and credibility." Hoyer even suggested that additional U.S. troops may have to be sent to the troubled country last year, according to documents still posted on his Web site.

By July 30, 2006, when the first Democratic leadership letter went to Bush, Hoyer had joined with other party leaders in rejecting the "stay-the-course" approach for Iraq. Similar letters were sent to Bush in September and October, and both Murtha and Hoyer co-signed them.

While Tuesday was dominated by the skirmishing over Iraq and corruption, Hoyer continued to publicly demonstrate a broad base of support throughout the Democratic Caucus, releasing a letter from 33 moderates endorsing his candidacy for Majority Leader.

Hoyer also received an important endorsement from Rep. Charlie Rangel (N.Y.), incoming chairman of the powerful House Ways and Means Committee.

But Murtha's supporters continue to claim their man will win in the end, and they caution against reading too much into Whip counts with two days still left in the race.

"He is going to shock everybody," said Rep. Mike Capuano (Mass.). "Don't count Jack out of anything."

One unanswered question is how far Pelosi will go in campaigning on Murtha's behalf following her endorsement of him on Sunday. She is speaking to incoming Democrats about Murtha's candidacy for Majority Leader, according to several Democratic sources, but it does not appear that she is lobbying veteran Democrats at this point. Those in Hoyer's camp continue to claim that Pelosi's statement had relatively little impact on the race so far, and they predict that Murtha cannot win unless Pelosi engages in a full-scale campaign to push him into the post.

Members "greatly respect Nancy Pelosi's leadership, but most of them have made commitments to Hoyer," said Rep. John Dingell (Mich.), who already has publicly endorsed Hoyer.

"I think Hoyer is the best," Dingell added, but declined to discuss whether he was actively lobbying Members on his behalf, stating only: "I am not being shy in saying so."

Another Democratic lawmaker who is backing Hoyer, but spoke on the condition of anonymity citing the sensitive nature of House leadership elections, said lobbying efforts were evident on the House floor earlier this week.

"No one knows the impact of the Speaker-to-be's intervention in the race," the lawmaker added.

But a second Democratic lawmaker, who is also supporting Hoyer in the leadership battle suggested that aggressive "bullying tactics" — involving the loss or award of valuable committee assignments — employed Tuesday have roiled some lawmakers.

"The anger is based on the fact that we should have never been in this position," the Member said. "If [Pelosi] doesn't get this under control soon, it will be her fault."

Rep. Bill Pascrell (N.J.), who issued a "Dear Colleague" letter in support of Murtha on Tuesday, asserted that the questions over Murtha's personal ethics are unfair, although he acknowledged the charges have drawn unwanted media attention to Murtha's past.

"It is an obvious distraction," Pascrell said, holding a folder bearing Murtha's image against a patriotic background, embossed with the words: "John Murtha: Leadership That Makes a Difference."

"To me, he's a man of integrity," Pascrell added.

Another Democratic lawmaker who has endorsed Murtha asserted that the allegations have failed to tarnish the Pennsylvania lawmaker in his own elections, and are unlikely to do so now.

"I think it ought to be instructive to people that none of that has stuck," the lawmaker said.

But one of the Democrats backing Hoyer suggested that highlighting those issues still could be effective.

"The fear among a number of Members is there could be revelations after the [leadership] election," the Democrat said.

Despite mulling the possibility for several days, Rep. Diana DeGette (Colo.) announced Tuesday that she will not campaign for the Majority Whip's office.

DOJ_NMG_0094552

With the Colorado lawmaker's decision, it is expected that Caucus Chairman James Clyburn (S.C.), the only declared candidate for the post, will easily win the in the Thursday leadership elections.

"She felt it was in the best interest of the Caucus," said a DeGette spokesman. "Another divisive race was not needed." DeGette is currently the one of seven Chief Deputy Minority Whips.

Although Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) had been expected to seek the Majority Whip office, at the urging of Pelosi, he agreed to instead seek the Caucus chairmanship.

G.O.P. In House Gears Up For New Leadership Fight (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 14 — House Republicans may be divided and dispirited as they prepare to choose new leadership this week, but they seem to agree on the chief qualification they seek in the leader of the new minority party.

"We need the person who can get us back in the majority the fastest," Representative Jeb Hensarling of Texas said.

Still in shock over losing their 12-year-old majority to Democrats, House Republicans are engaged in their second leadership fight in a year, this one part of a soul-searching over how they lost the election and what they can do about it.

The current majority leader, Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the top candidate for minority leader, said Republicans focused too much on simply retaining power.

Arival, Representative Mike Pence of Indiana, said Republicans needed to return to their small-government ideology.

Another rival, Representative Joe L. Barton of Texas, said House Republicans had to restore a more open leadership style with increased involvement from the rank and file.

All want the reversal in fortune to be temporary and say they can be the strongest foil for Democrats who will have to deliver legislative results and in two years defend seats gained this year in Republican territory.

"What is the job of Republican leader in the minority?" Mr. Boehner asked colleagues in a letter that boiled it down succinctly. "It's to hold the job for as short a time as possible."

While Republicans struggled to select their leaders, House Democrats focused on their own fight for majority leader as Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland released the names of new supporters. They brought his publicly disclosed total to more than 70 out of the 118 or so required, depending on whether Democratic candidates awaiting recounts are allowed to vote.

His rival, John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, on Tuesday accused critics of his ethics record of "Swift-boat style" attacks and questioned the depth of Mr. Hoyer's opposition to the Iraq war.

Mr. Murtha has far fewer public endorsements than Mr. Hoyer. But he has one very significant one, that of incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California. Ms. Pelosi appeared at a reception that Mr. Murtha held on Monday night for new Democrats and pressed colleagues to support her candidate on Tuesday.

After a watchdog group criticized Mr. Murtha on Monday for past ethics lapses and new attention focused on his involvement in the Abscam scandal in 1980, he said that he was "disconcerted that some are making headlines by resorting to unfounded allegations that occurred 26 years ago."

Mr. Murtha was never charged.

Mr. Hoyer told reporters, "The majority of the members are for me."

He disputed Mr. Murtha's portrayal of his stand on the war, saying he had a central role in developing the Democratic leadership's consensus position that questions the war.

In the Senate, Republicans faced a new contest as a former Republican leader, Trent Lott of Mississippi, sought a comeback by seeking the No. 2 position, minority whip, in an election on Wednesday. Mr. Lott will be challenging Senator Lamar Alexander of Tennessee.

Mr. Alexander said he had sufficient commitments to win, but Senate Republicans may be newly attracted to the tactical expertise of Mr. Lott, who was forced out in 2002 after a racially insensitive comment.

Senate Democrats formalized their new leadership structure, naming Harry Reid of Nevada as majority leader and retaining Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois in the No. 2 slot.

DOJ_NMG_0094553

In a reward for his work in capturing the Senate, a new No. 3 post, vice chairman of the party conference, was created for Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York. Mr. Schumer will again head the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

The House Republican fight was initiated by Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's decision to leave the leadership when control shifts to the Democrats in January. But considering the losses for House Republicans, it was inevitable that some lawmakers would call for a shakeup.

"Given the beating we took, there has to be a reckoning," said Representative Steve King, Republican of Iowa, who is supporting Mr. Pence and his fellow conservative, John Shadegg of Arizona, for the No. 2 slot.

Mr. Boehner, the affable veteran chosen at the beginning of the year to succeed Tom DeLay, is widely considered the favorite for his managing the House for the last year and for his work to limit Republican losses in Ohio, his home state.

Mr. Boehner has urged his colleagues to confront the reasons behind their losses, regroup and try to offer a "compelling alternative" to the Democrats. Mr. Pence, who has led the House conservative wing, argues that Republicans need to attack the spending increases under the Republican majority and work harder to differentiate themselves from the opposition. In a conference call with Internet bloggers on Tuesday, Mr. Pence said he would aggressively push back against the White House if he believed that the administration was wrong.

"As Moses said famously, I've been burned by a Bush before," said Mr. Pence, who is viewed by his supporters as being a strong communicator who could carry the party message.

Mr. Barton, a surprise entry in the race, will try to build on his support from fellow Texans and members of the Energy and Commerce Committee, which he has led. He promised to have an "open door policy" that guarantees every Republican the chance to meet directly with the leader each week, and he wants to be more aggressive in policing suspected misconduct, an issue that dogged Republicans in this election.

In the race for the second spot, Mr. Shadegg is challenging Representative Roy Blunt of Missouri, the current whip, who lost the contest for majority leader to Mr. Boehner this year.

Many House Republicans say that Mr. Blunt can hold his post, but that the wild card will be whether the party sees the need for a major change in leadership if Mr. Boehner holds on to the top spot.

House Democrats Trade Iraq Charges (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey And Richard Simon

WASHINGTON — Injecting the Iraq war into the escalating fight for the No. 2 spot among House Democrats, Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania on Tuesday attacked his opponent for not backing a push last year for withdrawal of U.S. troops.

Rep. Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland disputed the criticism of his position on the war. Murtha's charge was an effort to turn an antiwar message central to Democratic gains at the polls last week into a wedge issue in determining the party's leadership as it prepares to take control of the House in January.

Murtha's broadside also raised the prospect that the showdown with Hoyer for the majority leader's post would have a larger ideological element than often is the case. Usually, the leadership contests turn more on matters of personality and style than issues.

House Democrats are scheduled to select their leaders for the next Congress on Thursday.

The Murtha-Hoyer contest already was an acrimonious note amid the joy among House Democrats after they picked up more than two dozen seats in the midterm election.

Rep. Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco, who as the head of House Democrats is in line to become the chamber's speaker, surprised some of her colleagues by publicly endorsing Murtha over the weekend.

Hoyer has served as Pelosi's chief lieutenant in the Republican-controlled House and has enjoyed broad support in his bid to continue in that role as majority leader. But Pelosi and Hoyer have never been close, though Murtha is a longtime Pelosi ally.

Murtha, a former Marine and staunch supporter of the military, gained national attention a year ago when, at a Capitol Hill news conference, he excoriated the Bush administration's policies in Iraq and called for troop withdrawal to begin.

Hoyer was not among the Democrats who rallied to his side, and that formed the basis of Murtha's criticism Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0094554

A statement issued by Murtha's office said, "The record is clear: Jack Murtha has been a constant voice for change in Iraq and Steny Hoyer has not."

A Murtha spokesman added that the lawmaker's position on the war, backed by Pelosi, "is the reason the Democrats are in the majority today" in Congress. "Hoyer's position has been to 'stay the course' with President Bush from the very beginning."

A Hoyer spokeswoman dismissed Murtha's accusation, saying, "Any representation that Congressman Hoyer endorses a 'stay-the-course' strategy or advocates sending more troops to Iraq is wrong."

Later on Tuesday, Hoyer's office released a letter of support for him in the leadership race from nine senior Democratic House members who are expected to become powerful committee chairmen in January. They included Ike Skelton of Missouri, who is expected to lead the House Armed Services Committee, and Tom Lantos of Burlingame, the likely head of the House International Relations Committee.

The House GOP also face an ideological choice when they select leaders Friday.

Rep. John A. Boehner of Ohio, who took over as majority leader after Rep. Tom DeLay of Texas resigned, is battling to retain his leadership post. But the party's election losses are helping fuel a challenge by Rep. Mike Pence of Indiana, seen by many as a more doctrinaire conservative than Boehner.

Senate Democrats, facing none of the jockeying that is dividing House members, on Tuesday quickly selected Nevada's Harry Reid to be the new majority leader and Illinois' Richard J. Durbin to serve as his deputy.

The two men — with New York Sen. Charles E. Schumer, who will assume the leadership's No. 3 position — played key roles in engineering the party's election-day gains that surprised most experts and gave it the majority in the next Senate.

Democrats also designated their new committee chairs, with California's two senators among them. Barbara Boxer will head the Environment and Public Works panel; Dianne Feinstein will head the Rules Committee.

On the other side of the aisle, Republicans will choose their new Senate leader today. Kentucky Sen. Mitch McConnell, who served as majority whip under outgoing Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, faces no competition in his bid to become minority leader. Sen. Trent Lott of Mississippi is challenging Sen. Lamar Alexander of Tennessee for the No. 2 post.

Choosing Murtha Is No Way To Start The Most Ethical Congress (RC)

By Norman Ornstein

Roll Call, November 15, 2006

Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has done nearly everything picture-perfectly right since the elections swept her into imminent power. From her statements the night of the elections to those the day after, to her approach to the new House to her adroit handling of possible leadership turmoil over the Majority Whip, Democratic Caucus chairmanship and vice chairmanship, she has said and done the right things and acted with finesse to prepare for her Speakership.

I know she means it when she says that she will change the way the House operates, making it more transparent, more honest, more deliberative and more productive. She has spine, drive, intelligence and the passion to be a historic figure in more ways than one.

I winced only a little when she said in a burst of election-eve exuberance that under her leadership, the 110th Congress would be the most honest and ethical in history; that is a rather high bar to set and then successfully leap. But having set that standard, it is fair to bring it up as the House Democrats consider the one intraparty contest Pelosi did not avert — the race for Majority Leader. Now that the contest between Reps. John Murtha (Pa.) and Steny Hoyer (Md.) is on full-bore, I want to elaborate on some comments I made in a column in mid-October, when most Members were not around and the incoming freshmen were just candidates.

There is one thing every House Democrat must do before going into the Caucus to cast that vote for Majority Leader: Go to video.google.com, search for “American Spectator John Murtha,” and then take 53 minutes and 40 seconds to watch the video that comes up.

It is a Jan. 7, 1980, video taken by the FBI during the Abscam sting, and it shows Murtha meeting with agents disguised as Middle Eastern businessmen running an outfit they called Abdul Enterprises and offering cash for political favors, including asylum for one posing as an Arab sheik. They offered $50,000 in cash to Members of Congress for helping them, and a number of Members took the money eagerly. One Senator and six House Members ultimately were convicted of charges including bribery and conspiracy.

Murtha was one of the lawmakers targeted by the FBI. He ultimately was not charged after he cooperated with the FBI and helped implicate some of the other Members. The ethics committee voted along party lines not to bring ethics charges against him — causing the panel's special counsel, E. Barrett Prettyman Jr., to resign in protest. Murtha since has talked proudly about how he resisted the offers of cash for favors, portraying himself as a hero.

Watch the video, read the transcript and you will see a different story. The Murtha talking to the FBI did refuse to take the money — but here is what he said: "I want to deal with you guys a while before I make any transactions at all, period. ... After we've done some business, well, then I might change my mind."

Murtha spent some time trashing the legislative abilities of his colleagues to whom the "sheik" had already talked, boasting of his own skills.

"I'm going to tell you this. If anybody can do it — I'm not B.S.-ing you fellows — I can get it done my way," he bragged. "There's no question about it."

Why not take the money? "All at once," he said, "some dumb bastard would go start talking eight years from now about this whole thing and say, 'Jesus Christ, this happened.' Then in order to get immunity so he doesn't go to jail, he starts talking and fingering people. So the [S.O.B.] falls apart."

After some back-and-forth about how much money might be involved, Anthony Amoroso, one of the disguised FBI agents, offers $50,000. Murtha responded: "I'm not interested."

Amoroso: "OK."

But Murtha did not stop there. He added: "At this point, you know, we do business together for a while. Maybe I'll be interested and maybe I won't. ... Right now, I'm not interested in those other things. Now, I won't say that some day, you know, I, if you made an offer, it may be I would change my mind some day."

I must confess I had forgotten about Murtha's role in Abscam, vaguely remembering that he had been one of those involved but not charged. The full transcript of his video, and the video itself, had not been available in the past. They now are — courtesy of The American Spectator and some right-wing blogs. It doesn't matter where the video comes from, of course — only that it is legitimate. It is not a pretty picture, in any way.

OK, this was more than 25 years ago; people change. So let's fast-forward to May 2006. The House Republicans brought up a lobbying and ethics reform package that was a bad joke — one that appalled and embarrassed even many of their own Members. The rule on the package was the typical one from the Rules Committee — no meaningful amendments allowed. But before the vote on final passage, there was a vote on a motion to recommit with instructions, which became a vote on a much more robust and meaningful Democratic alternative. To newcomers to the House: The motion to recommit with instructions usually is a joke itself — framed by the majority leadership not as a real alternative but as a procedural vote that demanded party unity in opposition.

The ethics package was the only occasion in which more than a tiny handful of Republicans bucked their leaders and voted for the Democratic alternative — 20 of them did so in this case, providing an opening for a real reform to pass the House. Except that four Democrats voted against their own party, killing ethics and lobbying reform all by themselves. Among them: John Murtha. Why? We recently learned from The New York Times that Murtha traded away lobbying and ethics reform in return for earmarks from the Republican leaders.

Murtha is a skilled and experienced legislator, a war hero and an articulate and passionate opponent of the Bush administration policy toward Iraq. He also is deeply ethically challenged. Electing him as Majority Leader is no way to start out the most ethical Congress in history.

Some Defense Lobbyists See Win In A Murtha Loss (HILL)

Some defense lobbyists who have worked with Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) are hoping that Murtha loses his high-profile majority leader race against Rep. Steny Hoyer (D-Md.).

Murtha, the ranking member of the defense appropriations subcommittee, is a longtime favorite of the defense industry, which has contributed significantly to Murtha's campaign war chest.

While Murtha would stay a strong ally to the defense industry as majority leader, several lobbyists said in recent days — as the competition for the No. 2 House position has intensified — that they would much rather see Murtha hold the gavel of the defense appropriations subcommittee. As such, he would have direct influence on the industry's interests.

Rep. Norm Dicks (D-Wash.), a Boeing proponent who would replace Murtha as chairman of the defense appropriations subcommittee, is also considered a friend of the industry. However, Murtha shells out far more earmarks.

As majority leader, Murtha would be under the spotlight with every move the Democrats make to reform ethics and lobbying practices. Murtha voted against the House Democratic substitute on lobbying reform and has strongly defended the use of earmarks.

In a Sept. 29 C-SPAN "Newsmakers" interview, Murtha said, "… just because a member wants something that is beneficial to their district or to the country in many cases, I don't define that as earmarked."

Murtha has also been known to trade earmarks for votes on the floor, which has become a regular practice in Congress.

In the wake of the former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) scandal – which centered on defense earmarks – some believe that earmark use will drop significantly in the new Congress.

"There is going to be some reduction in the number of earmarks, there is going to be greater scrutiny, which is going to yield a much better product," said Steve Ellis of Taxpayers for Common Sense. "We would much rather see a system, which is a meritorious system."

The Democratic leadership is expected early next year to introduce much of the Honest Leadership and Open Government Act, which it unveiled last January.

Several lobbyists said that they feel they are taking the hit for a few bad apples. Some are balking at the proposed public disclosure of lobbying activities, which under the Democrats' proposal requires lobbyists to file quarterly reports with more information than is required now, including campaign contributions, fundraisers and other events and the name of each member contacted.

"If lobbyists are required to put on their lobbying reports their fundraising activity and the offices that we go to, it would be impossible for any of these members to solicit money from any of these lobbyists that lobby their office," said one defense lobbyist.

"It hurts us as well as it hurts them and it hurts the process. Lobbyists are an essential part of the process. We serve a very important function and that should not be overlooked," the lobbyist added.

Some have said that it may be harder to meet new members, and if they hold fundraisers for them at the beginning of the year, when the budget comes out, that fundraising could be interpreted as a quid pro quo.

The American League of Lobbyists (ALL) yesterday called on Congress to proceed cautiously with lobbying legislation. Watchdog groups, meanwhile, are pushing hard for far-reaching reform bills.

"We're concerned that the message being sent by members of the new Congress about the lobbying profession is unfairly negative," said Paul Miller, ALL president. "Lobbyists should not once again become the target of overreaching reforms that won't achieve a goal of openness and transparency."

Miller also said that new legislation is not necessary and that rules changes in the House and Senate would be sufficient.

Under the Democratic plan, lobbyists would also be barred from arranging, sponsoring and participating in trips for lawmakers. But one defense lobbyist said that could backfire as legislators may resort to military flights if they want to visit a site, thereby charging the taxpayer.

Unfit For Majority Leader (WP)

The videotape is grainy, dark and devastating. The congressman and the FBI undercover agents -- the congressman thinks they represent an Arab sheik willing to pay $50,000 to get immigration papers -- are talking business in the living room of a secretly wired Washington townhouse.

Two other congressmen in on the deal "do expect to be taken care of," the lawmaker says. But for the time being -- and he says repeatedly that he might change his mind and take money down the road -- he'd rather trade his help for investment in his district, maybe a hefty deposit in the bank of a political supporter who's done him favors.

"I'm not interested -- at this point," he says of the dangled bribe. "You know, we do business for a while, maybe I'll be interested, maybe I won't, you know." Indeed, he acknowledges, even though he needs to be careful -- "I expect to be in the [expletive] leadership of the House," he notes -- the money's awfully tempting. "It's hard for me to say, just the hell with it."

This is John Murtha, incoming House speaker Nancy Pelosi's choice to be her majority leader, snared but not charged in the Abscam probe in 1980. "The Democrats intend to lead the most honest, most open and most ethical Congress in history," Pelosi pledged on election night. Five days later she wrote Murtha a letter endorsing his bid to become her No. 2.

Not the most promising start.

For years Murtha has relied on the Abscam bottom line to argue that the case is not a problem for him: He wasn't indicted. But he was named a co-conspirator in the bribery scheme. The feckless House ethics committee didn't take action against him, though the outside investigator it hired quit in disgust after the panel rejected his recommendation to file misconduct charges.

"I am the guy that didn't take the money," Murtha said this summer when his opponent raised the issue.

Yes, but: He's the guy who, brought into the deal by two other House members -- Frank Thompson (D-N.J.) and John Murphy (D-N.Y.) -- agreed to meet with men offering money in return for official action. He's the guy who knew these two colleagues expected a payoff and even vouched for them with the would-be bribers ("Both of them are solid.").

He's the guy who, when offered a bribe, still wanted to do a deal. "I'm delighted to do business with him and do every goddamn thing I can within bounds, you know, so I don't get myself in jail, in order to get him into the country and whatever needs to be done," he says on the video, unearthed by the conservative American Spectator. (You can watch at http://www.spectator.org/.) He's the guy who -- as a member of the House ethics committee-- did nothing to stop the scheme.

Sorry, but I'm not buying Murtha's argument that he's the victim of a "Swift-boating attack" over "unfounded allegations that occurred 26 years ago." On its own, Murtha's Abscam conduct is disqualifying.

Even if it weren't, though, everything in Murtha's post-Abscam life is of a piece with the back-scratching, dealmaking style on display in the video. In a story last month, the New York Times described how Murtha has operated "a political trading post" in a back corner -- the Murtha corner, it's called -- of the House floor, where Democrats and Republicans alike come to get Murtha's blessing for earmarks or his help on close votes. As Pennsylvania Democrat Paul Kanjorski told the Times, "nobody ever leaves completely disappointed."

Murtha is one of 12 Democrats who voted against the McCain-Feingold campaign finance reform bill. He's one of four who killed a strong Democratic ethics package earlier this year. He is a one-man earmarking factory whose beneficiaries have included a lobbying firm that employed his brother and another founded by a former top aide.

The biggest puzzle, and biggest disappointment, in all this is Pelosi, who was pitch-perfect in her first several days as speaker-elect. Now comes this lose-lose move.

If she gets her way and helps Murtha win a come-from-behind victory against Maryland's Steny Hoyer in tomorrow's leadership election, she's buying herself -- and the Democratic caucus -- endless news stories about Murtha's ethics. If, as he says, Hoyer has the votes, Pelosi has made herself look weak within the caucus -- not a smart move for any new leader, and certainly not for the first woman in the job. Perhaps the late timing and measured phrasing of Pelosi's endorsement were meant to ensure that it would have little impact. If so, Pelosi failed to recognize that once she weighed in, the vote for majority leader would inevitably be seen as a gauge of her clout.

I wrote a few weeks back that Pelosi's first test as speaker would be whether she picks Florida's Alcee Hastings -- who was removed from his federal judgeship for agreeing to take a bribe -- to head the intelligence committee. As it turns out, I was wrong. Pelosi's first test was how to handle Murtha. Whatever happens tomorrow, she flunked. Whether she'll get another failing grade on Hastings remains to be seen.

Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi's endorsement of Rep. John Murtha for majority leader, the No. 2 position in the Democratic leaderhsip, has roiled her caucus. "She will ensure that they [Mr. Murtha and his allies] win. This is hardball politics," Rep. Jim Moran, a top Murtha ally, told the Hill, a congressional newspaper. "We are entering an era where when the speaker instructs you what to do, you do it."

But several members are privately aghast that Mr. Murtha, a pork-barreling opponent of most House ethics reforms, could become the second most visible symbol of the new Democratic rule. "We are supposed to change business as usual, not put the fox in charge of the henhouse," one Democratic member told me. "It's not just the Abscam scandal of the 1980s that he barely dodged, he's a disaster waiting to happen because of his current behavior," another told me.

As for Abscam, a recent book by George Crile, a producer for CBS's "60 Minutes," provides damning evidence that Mr. Murtha escaped severe punishment for his role in the scandal only because then-Speaker Tip O'Neill arranged for the House Ethics Committee to drop the charges, over the objections of the committee's outside prosecutor. The prosecutor quickly resigned in protest.

Outside observers are equally aghast that Mr. Murtha could win tomorrow's election. Thomas Mann, a Brookings Institution scholar who is co-author of "The Broken Branch: How Congress Is Failing America and How to Get It Back on Track," told the Los Angeles Times that "John Murtha is not the right poster child" for a Democratic House that says it wants to sweep away corruption.

Melanie Sloan, the liberal head of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, was cheered on by Democrats six weeks ago when she helped reveal the Mark Foley scandal. Now she says that "Ms. Pelosi"s endorsement of Rep. Murtha, one of the most unethical members of Congress, show that she may have prioritized ethics reform merely to win votes with no real commitment to changing the culture of corruption."

Former members are also speaking out. Chris Bell, a former Democratic House member from Texas who was his party's unsuccessful nominee for governor this year, told the Washington Post that Mr. Murtha was instrumental in making Rep. Alan Mollohan of West Virginia the top Democrat on the House Ethics Committee. Mr. Bell says Reps. Mollohan and Murtha both helped to slow ethics reform to a crawl for much of the last two years. This spring, Mr. Mollohan was forced to step down from his Ethics Committee position after The Wall Street Journal reported that he had underreported personal assets and steered earmarks to various West Virginia entities founded or controlled by his close political allies.

Mr. Murtha has also been front and center in the controversy over earmarks, the individual portions of pork members of Congress often secretly secure for their districts or favored constituents. Mr. Murtha is the ranking Democratic member of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee and for the past three years has been the House's top recipient of defense industry cash. Few in Washington are surprised that his lobbyist brother, Robert "Kit" Murtha, was until his retirement this summer an enormously successful "earmark specialist" for the Beltway firm KSA Consulting. In recent years, Kit Murtha brought in a mother lode of earmarks for at least 16 defense manufacturers with business before the Appropriations Committee.

Last year, the Los Angeles Times reported that "most of KSA's defense contractor clients hired the firm in hopes of securing funding from Rep. Murtha's subcommittee, according to lobbying records and interviews. And most retained the firm after Kit Murtha became a senior partner in 2002." Kit Murtha told the Times that he saw Rep. Murtha only infrequently, but said the congressman knew he was a KSA lobbyist. "I don't think that influences him," Kit said of his brother. "I certainly would hope not."

Mr. Murtha isn't talking much about all of these controversies, no doubt hoping that the clock will run out on questions about them when Democrats vote for majority leader tomorrow. For now his surrogates are brushing aside all inquiries. "There is no substance to it," says Rep. Linda Sanchez of California, a key Murtha ally. Ms. Pelosi's office will only say that Mr. Murtha "has addressed these issues." But he really hasn't, and Ms. Pelosi should know better.

Take the Abscam probe, in which Mr. Murtha was named an unindicted co-conspirator in the late-1970s FBI sting operation in which agents posed as Saudi sheiks and offered members of Congress bribes for help in securing asylum in the U.S. and getting money out of Saudi Arabia. In the end, a U.S. senator and six representatives accepted the cash and were convicted of bribery or lesser charges.

I spoke with Mr. Murtha's press secretary last Friday and emailed her Abscam-related questions. I followed up with a phone call yesterday. She never responded. Yesterday Mr. Murtha did issue a statement attempting to deflect questions: "I am disconcerted that some are making headlines by resorting to unfounded allegations that occurred 26 years ago. I thought we were above this type of swift-boating attack. This is not how we restore integrity and civility to the United States Congress"

Mr. Murtha was among those who were offered the Abscam bribe money. He declined it, but the late columnist Jack Anderson said the Pennsylvania congressman's conduct was "perhaps the saddest scene on the secret Abscam videotapes. He refused to take the money, but his reason was hardly noble."

The 54-minute Abscam tape shows Mr. Murtha functioning as a cynical backroom operator, telling the FBI undercover agents: "You know, you made an offer. It might be that I might change my mind someday." Later, he explained how that might happen: "I want to deal with you guys awhile before I make any transactions at all, period," he told the fake sheiks. "After we've done some business, well, then I might change my mind. I'm going to tell you this. If anybody can do it--I am not BSing you fellows--I can get it done my way. There's no question about it."

Mr. Murtha has said his only interest in the purported Saudi sheiks' money was that he hoped it would be invested in businesses in his district. But the full tape makes clear that Mr. Murtha was primarily interested in talking about such investments as a possible cover should he later decide to have the money transferred.

"And what I'm sayin' is, a few investments in my district, a few you know, is big to me, to this guy apparently is not too big, to a couple of banks which would get their attention. And investment in a business where you could legitimately say to me--when I say legitimately, I'm talking about so these bastards up here can't say to me, well, why, in eight years from now, that's possible, we'd never hear a thing for eight years, but all at once, ah, some dumb bastard would go start talking eight years from now, ah, about the whole thing and say, '[expletive], ah, this happened,' then he, then he, in order to get immunity so he doesn't go to jail, he starts talking and fingering people and then the [expletive] all falls apart."

The undercover FBI agent in the meeting then spoke up and said "You give us the banks where you want the money deposited."

"All right" Mr. Murtha responded. "How much money we talking about?"

"Well, you tell me" replied the FBI agent.

A few moments later in the tape, Mr. Murtha continues his discussion of how "a business commitment" in his district would be structured: "A business commitment that makes it imperative for me to help him. Just, let me tell you something. I'm sure if--and there's a lot of things I've done up here, with environmental regulations, with all kinds of waivers of laws and regulations. If it weren't for being in the district, people would say, 'Well that [expletive], I'm gonna tell you something this guy is, uh, you know, on the take.' Well once they say that, what happens? Then they start going around looking for the [expletive] money. So I want to avoid that by having some tie to the district. That's all. That's the secret to the whole thing."

It appears that what Mr. Murtha was referring to was a form of investment not for the sake of investment, but because "that's the secret" to how you can take a bribe and get away with it. Mr. Murtha was never indicted for his role in Abscam, even though he testified in federal court that he had called his "immigration guy" to determine what could be done to help the fake sheik with his immigration problems.

But in 1981, the House Ethics Committee became concerned that Mr. Murtha had, at a minimum, violated House rules that required he report any attempt at bribery, which he had not. A special prosecutor, Barry Prettyman, was appointed to oversee the committee's investigation. He soon expanded his probe beyond the six House members who were directly involved and began moving against Rep. Murtha. He was also rumored to be offering deals in exchange for testimony that would take the scandal inside the office of Speaker O'Neill.

That was the final straw from the irascible O'Neill. He determined to shut the investigation down, and the story of how he did it makes up a fascinating part of Mr. Crile's book, "Charlie Wilson's War" (Atlantic Monthly Press, 2003). Crile died earlier this year of cancer, but his story of how the larger-than-life Rep. Charlie Wilson of Texas single-handedly steered money from the defense subcommittee that Rep. Murtha chaired to the anti-Soviet mujahadeen in Afghanistan is so riveting that it is being made into a major motion picture produced by Mike Nichols and starring Tom Hanks and Julia Roberts.

Crile reported that in early 1981 Speaker O'Neill called Rep. Wilson into his office and told him he wanted him to join the Ethics Committee right away. The Texas congressman had been pestering him for years to get a lifetime seat on the board the Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts. "It's the best perk in town," Mr. Wilson told Crile. "It means that I get the box right next to the president's box for the ballet when I want it. I get to go to all the cast parties, meet all the movie stars, and I get an extra invitation to the White House every season."

O'Neill made it clear he would appoint Mr. Wilson to the board he coveted, but that he would have to joni the Ethics Committee to take care of the Murtha matter. "It's a package deal, Chally," O'Neill is said to have told Mr. Wilson.

"The word on Charlie was that he didn't talk," ex-Rep. Tony Coelho, who became majority whip after O'Neill's retirement, told Crile. "From time to time the speaker needed to mount irregular operations, and Wilson was one of those irregulars Tip could count on." Mr. Wilson didn't need any prodding for his task: "He was a happy warrior as he raced to the rescue of his imperiled friend John Murtha," Crile wrote.

Crile reported that prior to Mr. Wilson's arrival on the Ethics Committee, it had largely given Mr. Prettyman, the special counsel, a free hand in his probe. That quickly changed: "Before Prettyman could fully deploy his investigators to move on the Murtha case, he was informed that the committee had concluded there was no justification for an investigation." The Ethics Committee chairman, Rep. Louis Stokes of Ohio, suddenly declared "This matter is closed."

Mr. Prettyman, who had already likened the Ethics Committee to "a misdemeanor court faced with a multiple murder," was furious at the dramatic change of course. He abruptly resigned his post the same afternoon the committee voted to clear Mr. Murtha. While Mr. Prettyman continues to refuse to discuss the case, he told Roll Call newspaper in 1990 that it would be "a logical conclusion" that he resigned over the committee's exoneration of Mr. Murtha. Crile's book notes that "a teary Murtha had confided to a colleague that Wilson's effort had saved his life." Crile concludes that the Murtha "rescue operation" had far-reaching consequences. "For O'Neill the intervention ended the threat to his hold on the House and unleashed him to become Ronald Reagan's liberal tormentor."

Two decades later, In 2002, ex-Rep. Don Bailey, a Democrat who had sat on the Ethics Committee (and who lost to Mr. Murtha in a Democratic primary in 1982, after decennial redistricting put them in the same district) released a public letter to Mr. Murtha: "I was, to be honest, critical about how you misled me about Abscam where you convinced me you had voluntarily told federal agents about the offer of money to you." Mr. Bailey continued: "I learned later, after I had successfully defeated the ethics charges against you, that you had merely manipulated the system to cooperate with federal agents to avoid prosecution."

For his part, Mr. Wilson was quite pleased by his role in burying the Murtha probe. Crile reported that Mr. Wilson told him he "laughed off the incident as if it had been an entertainment." Mr. Wilson said, "It was the best deal I ever made. I only had to be on Ethics for a year, and I get to stay on the Kennedy Center for life."

When I spoke with Crile last year, he confirmed that he stood by his account of the spiking of the Murtha ethics probe. Last night Mr. Wilson assured me that the Crile book was "completely accurate." (The only complaint about any facts in it, he said, had come from the heirs to a Texas oilman who was briefly mentioned in it.) Mr. Wilson told me he and George Crile were 50-50 partners in the movie deal.

When I asked Mr. Wilson about the portions of the book that dealt with his efforts to squelch the Ethics Committee probe of Mr. Murtha, he tersely said, "I have no comment." He reiterated that Mr. Murtha remains his good friend--they appeared together at a Pennsylvania fund-raising event for Democratic candidates--and said that Mr. Murtha has been unfairly attacked for his record in promoting earmarks.

In contrast to Sen. John McCain, whose experience in the 1990 Keating Five scandal turned him into a good-government reformer, Mr. Murtha's brush with infamy stirred in him a conviction that members of Congress deserve more protection from ethics probes. In 1997 Mr. Murtha joined with Rep. Billy Tauzin, a Louisiana Republican, in blocking outside groups and private citizens from filing complaints directly with the House Ethics Committee.

Mr. Murtha also pushed for a law that would require the Justice Department to reimburse the legal bills of any member of Congress it investigated if it was shown the probe was not "substantially justified"--a privilege no other American enjoyed. Only after Henry Hyde, then chairman of the Judiciary Committee, objected was the bill amended to allow reimbursement for anyone--member of Congress or not--acquitted in a "bad faith" prosecution.

Gary Ruskin, director of the liberal Congressional Accountability Project, told Roll Call that "when it comes to institutional policing of corruption in Congress, John Murtha is a one-man wrecking crew." Now with the support of Ms. Pelosi, that "wrecking crew" stands just one ballot away from becoming House majority leader. Should he win the sealed-ballot election of his peers tomorrow, Democrats may have a hard time explaining just what has changed regarding the Congress's "culture of corruption."

Ultra-liberals Rise On Moderate Wings (HILL)

By Dick Morris

The results of the '06 election are in. The left wing of the Democratic Party has taken over Congress. Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) is the Speaker. Rep. Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) is the new chairman of the Ways and Means panel. Sen. Harry Reid (D-Nev.) is majority leader, and Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) runs the Environment Committee. The left is empowered.

But how did it achieve these majorities? It did so lifted by the wings of moderate, centrist Democrats who mastered their GOP opponents throughout the country. It was not liberals who defeated Republican incumbents in the House and Senate. It was moderates, future members of the Democratic Leadership Council (DLC).

The only reason Pelosi is Speaker is that a fresh crop of moderate Democrats ousted Republican incumbents in the House. A majority of these new congressmen and -women have announced their intention to join the DLC.

Moveon.org, party chairman Howard Dean, and the blogger left had nothing to do with the '06 victory. Democrats who study the election results carefully will reaffirm the lessons learned by the defeat of Walter Mondale and Michael Dukakis — the American people will not elect liberal Democrats, but will turn to moderates.

The irony is that the expressed will of the American people has been so radically ignored in the shaping of the 110th Congress. The fact is that the elevation of Nancy Pelosi to the speakership is no more a legitimate expression of the voters' will than would be the retention of Dennis Hastert. The seniority system, rigidly applied by Pelosi in violation of the spirit of the Gingrich reforms of 1994, has ordained that a liberal establishment will run Congress, whatever the voters say.

Is there anyone who will sanely maintain that Rangel represents the broad middle of American views on tax reform, or that Levin speaks for most Americans on national security? All that has happened is that the ranking members have become the chairmen, regardless of their views or qualifications. It is a gesture of homage to seniority that would have the approval of the segregationists that used to run Congress by applying the same ground rules. Back then, no matter how loudly voters demanded integration and an end to racism, the Democratic majority kept apartheid firmly in place. The distortion of the electorate's will taking place now on Capitol Hill is no more extreme.

Will the Democrats pay for their imperial overreach? Not if, despite taking the majority, they stay in opposition, use their power to oppose the Bush administration, investigate it endlessly, and continue the negative criticism that embodied their '06 campaign.

But such is not the nature of the Democratic Party. Power will likely go to their heads. Their constituencies will not be appeased by mere partisan criticism of Bush. Had the Democrats been fortunate enough to win only the House, they could have hidden behind the wall of Senate obstructionism and pleaded their inability to pass legislation. But having won both, they have no excuse but to pass legislation that will reflect the will of their issue-group masters and expose the differences between the views of their party and those of the voters.

Bush will still be president, so their output will face a daunting succession of presidential vetoes. So will there be a backlash? No. There will only be the beginning of a backlash. Bush's likely intransigence on Iraq, global warming, and a host of other issues will shield the Democrats from the political consequences of their own legislative initiatives.

Rather, we have to see 2007 and 2008 as the beginnings of a massive Republican revival. Only when the likes of Hillary Clinton take the White House in 2008 — still my bet — will the resurgence be fully evident. Just as she saved the GOP in 1994, she'll repeat the favor in 2010 and 2012.

House GOP Scrambles For Leader (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, November 15, 2006

House Republicans in search of someone to lead them out of the minority wilderness are growing increasingly frustrated with their choices in the leadership elections as Senate Democrats yesterday swiftly approved a slate of top leaders.

Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada was picked to be majority leader and much of the rest the Democratic leadership also remained in place -- a clear sign of gratitude for orchestrating last week's six-seat pickup that just last year Mr. Reid predicted would require a "miracle."

"Two years ago, we had an opportunity for new leadership on the Democratic side of the Senate, and we chose as our leader Harry Reid," said Sen. Richard J. Durbin, Illinois Democrat, elected yesterday to be majority whip. "We could not have made a better choice to unify this caucus, to make certain that we came to the floor every day with a purpose, and most importantly, that we took a message to the American people, a message of hope."

Today, Senate Republicans are expected to approve Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky to be the minority leader. Sen. Trent Lott of Mississippi, a former Senate Republican leader, and Sen. Lamar Alexander of Tennessee, are locked in a tight but very quiet race for the No. 2 slot.

In the House, things aren't as quiet, as the Democratic race for majority leader grows bitter and the Republicans remain divided over who should lead their party.

Rep. John P. Murtha, the Pennsylvania Democrat who has become the face of his party's anti-war stance and is running for majority leader, harshly criticized Rep. Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the current No. 2 Democrat. Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California will almost assuredly become House speaker in January.

"The Pelosi-Murtha position on the war is the reason the Democrats are in the majority today," Mr. Murtha said. "Congressman Hoyer's position has been to stay the course with President Bush from the very beginning."

Mr. Hoyer's office noted that he and Mr. Murtha both signed three letters urging Mr. Bush to withdraw troops from Iraq. Mr. Hoyer yesterday declined to respond to questions about whether Mr. Murtha's past ethical and legal troubles might undermine the party's declared aim of cleaning up what Democrats called "the culture of corruption" in Congress.

"I am not looking back," Mr. Hoyer said. "My role is to look forward."

Among House Republicans, members remain divided over their top post, and one of the most frequently floated names for the No. 2 position isn't even running.

Most insiders say Rep. John A. Boehner, the Ohio Republican and current majority leader, is favored to win the top spot, but Rep. Mike Pence, Indiana Republican, has been widely praised by conservatives off the Hill as a fresh face.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois has declined to run for the leader position.

Some Republicans have expressed reluctance to return Mr. Boehner to leadership after last week's disastrous elections, and some are opposed to Mr. Pence for forging a compromise on immigration that critics dismissed as "amnesty." Yesterday, Mr. Pence renounced those efforts.

"All those debates about compromise are a thing of the past," he said in an interview with talk-radio host Laura Ingraham.

"I reject any form of amnesty, even if we've got border security," he said. "I really reject the idea that people whose first act in this country was a violation of the law ought to be able to get right with the law without leaving the country."

In the race for Republican whip, many members say they are far less enthusiastic.

The current whip -- Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri, who hopes to retain the position -- has talked about the need for "cultural change in Washington," but is an old ally of ousted leader Tom DeLay. It didn't help that he attended a fundraising golf tournament last weekend, just days after his party lost 30 seats amid charges of corruption.

"Mr. Blunt is proud of the significant financial assistance he has given to hundreds of Republican members and candidates and believes that fundraising is a necessary part of recapturing our majority in 2008," his spokeswoman said.

DOJ_NMG_0094563

Challenging Mr. Blunt is Rep. John Shadegg of Arizona, a conservative who lost his bid earlier this year for majority leader.

"He was one of the guys who got here in the '94 Republican revolution and didn't go native," said Rep. Paul D. Ryan, Wisconsin Republican, who supports Mr. Shadegg.

But others say Mr. Shadegg is uninspiring and aloof. Many have settled on Rep. Eric Cantor of Virginia, Mr. Blunt's chief deputy whip, who actively supports Mr. Blunt's re-election.

"Everybody is asking why Cantor is not running," said one Republican staffer who requested anonymity to speak freely about the leadership race.

Mr. Ryan, who is friends with Mr. Cantor, said, "Most people would say Eric would win, but he doesn't want to win that way. He's Roy's deputy, and he's being loyal. That's who Eric is."

Indeed, Mr. Cantor declined to comment on the growing "draft Cantor" movement, except to say he's not running and supports Mr. Blunt.

"The fact that Cantor won't go back on his word to Blunt is exactly why he should be in leadership," said a frustrated Republican aide. "For the future of this party, Blunt should step aside."

House GOP May Go Back To The Future (HILL)

By Patrick O'connor

The Hill, November 15, 2006

Former Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) is gone, Democrats will soon control the floor and House speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) will be just another member of the minority — if a member at all.

As much as last week's momentous loss ushered in a new era for Republicans in the House, the GOP is on the brink of returning some familiar faces to the leadership.

With Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) all but assured of retaining the title of leader when Republicans assume the minority next year, suspense hangs on the race for whip between Reps. Roy Blunt (R-Mo.), the current occupant, and John Shadegg (R-Ariz.), a darling of the conservative media.

Blunt has told supporters in private that he has the votes to preserve his leadership post when members cast their secret ballots this Friday, members and an aide said yesterday, but some of those same supporters question the strength of his backing. Blunt made a similar prediction before losing to Boehner in their majority leader race earlier this year.

Some of Blunt's allies are desperate for him to step aside in order to clear the way for his chief deputy, Rep. Eric Cantor (R-Va.), a prolific fundraiser and established vote-counter who has been making phone calls in support of the Missouri Republican since last Wednesday.

These supporters are concerned that Blunt's tally is soft heading into the election and that some of his confirmed votes will buck him on the secret ballot. Whips rank their votes on a number scale to account for the level of support, and many of the whip's supporters are not hard commitments, one ally said yesterday.

"If you're the incumbent and you don't have the support locked down to hold your job, you're screwed," the same backer said yesterday. "You have to understand you're screwed and get out of the race."

Concerned that Shadegg would fumble some of the procedural responsibilities required of a whip, these Blunt supporters are weighing their options to elevate Cantor to the No. 2 slot in the Republican hierarchy.

"A sizable percentage of Blunt supporters are supporting Blunt because of Cantor," the same lawmaker said.

Blunt's staff is dismissive of these suggestions to step aside.

"Congressman Blunt is extremely responsive to the members of his conference, and he is staying in the race to win it because he believes he has the support from the majority of his colleagues," his spokeswoman, Jessica Boulanger, said.

Internal rules governing the election process allow members to nominate limitless candidates on the day of the election. Cantor has pledged not to challenge Blunt, but members could nominate him even though he has not campaigned.

The Virginia Republican has not had any role in this movement to elect him, his spokesman and a number of outside members said, but he could stem the speculation with a public statement of support for Blunt.

There is some concern on a staff level that a loose group of senior staff and established outside lobbyists are feeding much of the buzz about Cantor and Rep. Adam Putnam (R-Fla.), who is vying for the conference chairmanship against Reps. Marsha Blackburn (R-Tenn.), Jack Kingston (R-Ga.) and Dan Lungren (R-Calif.).

While evidence is scant that such a group is coordinating votes behind-the-scenes, the perception concerns those members and staff with limited input on leadership decisions and could foment discontent over the next two years.

Members and staff from all ends of the conference believe Boehner has the race for leader wrapped up, but his two opponents, Reps. Mike Pence (R-Ind.) and Joe Barton (R-Texas), continue to work for support in anticipation of the Friday ballot.

"Personally, I am not willing to wait for the Democrats to make their own mistakes to take back the majority," Rep. Joe Pitts (R-Pa.), a prominent social conservative, wrote to members of the Values Action Team yesterday. "We need a leader who can, as Newt Gingrich did and as President Reagan did, communicate ably and earnestly with the American people about what we believe. I believe Mike Pence is that man."

Most of the candidates running from outside the leadership were expecting stronger discontent from Republicans following last week's rout on Election Day.

Pence, the chairman of the conservative Republican Study Committee who characterizes his confrontations with leadership as "cheerful pugilism," said Republicans have not yet grasped the enormity of last week's loss and what that means when Congress resumes next year.

"One thing our colleagues have yet to completely absorb is that the environment is completely different," Pence told a small group of reporters yesterday.

Given that shift, Pence said the conference, and particularly its leaders, should stake their own position on issues and battle the administration publicly whenever necessary, something past leaders have been reluctant to do.

Conservatives throughout the party have seized on last week's results to argue that Republicans have strayed from their principles in recent years, and many of these members hint that the conference should make some bold steps during its reorganization.

Rep. Tom Feeney (R-Fla.), an outspoken conservative who is not publicly backing either candidate in the whip race, is concerned that Republicans will send a bad message to angry GOP voters who either didn't show up or voted against them on Election Day for ethical transgressions and failing to reduce federal spending.

"We got in trouble with voters outside the Beltway for things we did inside the Beltway," Feeney said. "We have to show them Republicans inside the Beltway understand that."

Centrist Republicans are concerned that this conservative shift will alienate them even further from the decision-making process.

During a dinner of the centrist Republican Main Street Partnership on Monday, which was attended by numerous centrists who lost, such as Rep. Nancy Johnson (R-Conn.), members lamented their diminished influence in the conference. Most members present were backing Boehner in the race for leader, according to one attendee, but few were enthused about their choices in many of the top races. Only members who won their Election Day races can vote in the leadership races.

In general, centrists are concerned that leaders have ignored their priorities in the past, and a conservative resurgence would continue to endanger their seats.

"I don't think a rightward shift is the way to go," Rep. Mike Castle (R-Del.), who often negotiates with leaders on centrist concerns, said last week on the brink of Election Day.

As members fight for the upper hand in races for whip and conference chair, Rep. Thaddeus McCotter (R-Mich.) is expected to release the names of 105 supporters tomorrow that would lock up his bid for chairman of the Republican Policy Committee, the seat Putnam abandoned in his bid for conference chair, spokesman Bob Jackson said. Rep. Darrell Issa (R-Calif.), McCotter's opponent, released his own list of 60 public supporters yesterday.

As Friday approaches, Blunt's supporters are encouraging members to stand with him because he has proven himself in the role during such a difficult stretch for Republicans.

Rep. Kevin Brady (R-Texas), a loyal Blunt supporter, thinks it would be foolish for members to replace their current whip because he is proven at corralling tough votes, particularly among conservatives, and because Republicans will need to unite against Democrats in the minority.

"Democrats took a page from our playbook by unifying, and that's when it was difficult to govern," Brady said. "We would be foolish to miss our own lesson."

GOP Term Limits Rule Challenged (RC)

By Ben Pershing

Roll Call, November 15, 2006

Former President Bill Clinton once famously questioned "what the meaning of the word 'is' is." For a pair of House Republican chairmen, their fate in the 110th Congress may rest on the definition of another tricky two-letter word — "or."

With the GOP majority gone, most current chairmen are preparing to move into their panels' ranking member slots. But two committee heads — Judiciary Chairman Jim Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.) and Transportation and Infrastructure Chairman Don Young (R-Alaska) — are prevented by Republican Conference rules on term limits from keeping their party's top panel posts next year.

Or maybe not.

Republican sources said Sensenbrenner and Young have told the GOP leadership that they would like to keep their jobs even though both have served a full six years as chairmen, the maximum under the current rules. Their argument: The rules don't really say what they seem to say.

"It's a sticky issue," said a Republican leadership aide, who nonetheless expressed confidence that "it's all being sorted out."

The "term limitation" section of Conference Rule 14 — which was implemented at the start of the 104th Congress and has not been changed since — reads, "No individual shall serve more than three consecutive terms as chairman or ranking member of a standing, select, joint or ad hoc committee or subcommittee."

The standard interpretation of that rule has been that there is a six-year limit on serving in the top GOP slot on a committee, period. But Sensenbrenner and Young have made the case that the phrase "chairman or ranking member" suggests that a Member should be able to put in up to three terms in one job, and then another three in the other.

"The rules are ambiguous," said a Republican aide who has been involved in discussions of the term-limit issue.

Allies of Sensenbrenner and Young argue that the "or" was inserted to allow the Conference some flexibility on the matter. They also point out that senior lawmakers might hesitate to serve as ranking members in the minority if that means they will be eating into their potential service time as future chairmen. Theoretically, a Republican could put in six loyal years as a stalwart ranking member and then — if the GOP takes back the House — would not be able to reap the reward of a gavel.

The potential controversy applies only to Young and Sensenbrenner, as the other term-limited panel heads are all leaving Congress. Both men have made their cases to leadership, though neither's office wanted to comment for this story.

One Member who does not share their interpretation of the rules is Rep. Lamar Smith (R-Texas), who is in line to take over the Judiciary ranking membership in the 110th Congress.

"The rule seems clear and unambiguous," said Smith spokeswoman Beth Frigola. "Congressman Smith is looking forward to making his case to the Steering Committee why he should be the ranking member of the Judiciary Committee."

Sensenbrenner generally has gotten good marks from panel members and from leaders for his stewardship of the panel, though his stubbornness on certain issues has sometimes rubbed leaders the wrong way.

Young, meanwhile, has made more enemies in his stint as Transportation chairman and may not retain enough goodwill to win the ranking membership even if the rules say what he thinks they do. In September 2005, Young made a pitch for the Homeland Security Committee gavel that was not well-received by the Steering panel, and Rep. Peter King (R-N.Y.) ended up winning that post.

No decisions on ranking memberships will be made until at least early December, after this week's leadership elections are done, Conference rules for the 110th are written and the Steering Committee is constituted.

When the new rules are written, leaders are expected to revise Rule 14 to make the term-limit guidelines a bit clearer.

"The party definitely has something to think about," said a GOP committee aide.

Alexander, Lott Count Whip Votes (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, November 15, 2006

The Senate's marquee GOP leadership bout will be decided this morning, as Republicans choose a new whip amid heightened campaigning by Trent Lott (R-Miss.), Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) and their core supporters in the conference.

While few Republicans would discuss their votes as their lame-duck session officially opened, Lott and Alexander appeared alternately confident and cautious, both aware that today's secret ballot would put their head counts and promises to the test.

"I want to be helpful," Lott said yesterday, calling his unusually covert comeback effort "a family thing" and giving a nod to his close relations with past Democratic leaders, which his supporters believe would be crucial in next year's majority-Democratic Senate: "We've got to try to keep a check on them and find a way to work with them … I could do that."

Alexander has billed himself as a more natural No. 2 than Lott, known for his comfort in the media spotlight since his House leadership rise in the 1980s. But Lott avowed his commitment to the agenda of current Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), a lock to become minority leader.

"I know the leader needs loyalty," he said. "I'm trying to convey the message that I can do this job without always running to the press."

McConnell continues to stay neutral in the contest, reiterating yesterday that he was playing no role in the whip race. While he and Alexander are close allies, appearing together yesterday to welcome Sen.-elect Bob Corker (R-Tenn.), McConnell came to Lott's defense during the racial controversy that forced the Mississippian out as GOP leader in 2002.

Alexander and Lott both acknowledged McConnell's desire to remain above the whip fray. Lott recalled that he stayed out of the 2002 whip race, fought just weeks before his departure as majority leader, in which McConnell overcame Lott friend Sen. Larry Craig (R-Idaho).

Alexander even reached deeper into the past yesterday, pointing out that he and Lott were roommates during the 1960s, when both were starting out as Hill aides.

"We know each other well, and we will be good friends after [today] ," Alexander said yesterday, adding that Republicans were in need of "fresh faces … after the drubbing we took [in the midterms]." Corker was at his side, subtly underscoring Alexander's hands-on role in orchestrating the Republicans' sole victory in a closely fought Senate race this year.

The whip rivals are both relying on core backers within the conference for momentum and help securing votes. The Alexander camp cited as supporters Sens. Richard Lugar (Ind.), Mike Enzi (Wyo.), Jim Bunning (Ky.), George Voinovich (Ohio), Michael Crapo (Idaho), Pete Domenici (N.M.), Bob Bennett (Utah), Saxby Chambliss (Ga.), Johnny Isakson (Ga.) and Mel Martinez (Fla.), whom President Bush officially tapped as head of the Republican National Committee yesterday.

Lott's office did not return a request for comment by press time on his public supporters, although Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) said he would be voting for Lott, his former House colleague. Sen. Richard Burr (R-N.C.) is also backing Lott.

Sens. Richard Shelby (R-Ala.) and Kit Bond (R-Mo.) both declined to tip their hands yesterday, and outgoing Senate president pro tem Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) couched his silence in advice for both candidates.

"When I ran for leader and thought I had the votes [against former Sen. Bob Dole (Kan.) in 1984] … I learned that you don't talk about votes before the election," Stevens said.

The whip race has captured the attention of staffers, lobbyists and pundits since last fall, when Lott began openly flirting with a return to leadership and Alexander began his bid as the underdog to Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), who lost reelection to Democrat Bob Casey Jr. last week. Lott's reputation as a savvy vote counter since his days as a House whip sparked some debate yesterday over whether he would bow out in the waning minutes, should victory appear out of reach.

"I would not be totally surprised if he pulls back at the last minute if he doesn't feel he's got the votes," said a source supportive of Alexander. The source also expressed disappointment among some Alexander backers about reports that Lott had privately bashed his opponent during the campaign.

One former Senate GOP leadership aide during Lott's previous stint pointed out that Lott is the only sitting senator who has served as a Republican minority whip during a Republican administration. The aide said Lott is likely to revive the whip line up he brought from the House to the Senate, with a chief deputy whip and eight others keeping tabs on members' personal issues to ensure good morale.

"The idea that he wouldn't be supportive of: one, the leader; two, unity in the conference; and three, the president's agenda," is false, the aide said.

Lott, Alexander Battle To The End (RC)

By Erin P. Billings And Emily Pierce

Roll Call, November 15, 2006

With this morning's vote on the next Senate Minority Whip still nip-and-tuck, Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) said Tuesday that he was using the last hours of campaigning to make sure Senators who already had committed to him were not switching to the insurgent campaign of Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.).

"I'm spending almost all of my time on that," Alexander said of his efforts to reinforce support Senators lent him before Republicans lost control of the chamber last week.

Alexander is set to square off against Lott this morning for the No. 2 GOP leadership slot, a position for which both Senators have been furiously campaigning in recent days. Republican Senators will convene in the Old Senate chambers to decide the outcome, along with cementing the rest of their leadership lineup for the 110th Congress.

Lott's late entry into the Whip race, while not unexpected, has left the outcome in doubt, despite Alexander's claim that he has a solid majority of his colleagues behind him. As of Monday night, the Tennessee Republican and his allies reasserted that those numbers had held, and then some, while Lott's backers predicted an extremely close secret-ballot vote that ultimately would turn for the former Majority Leader.

"As of today we are definitely tied," said one source close to the Lott operation. "It is an even match."

But one of Alexander's top supporters, Sen. Bob Bennett (R-Utah), said Alexander has a solid advantage, counting 27 firm commitments in the Tennessean's camp. Bennett said that unless there is a seismic shift in support in the waning hours, Alexander should emerge as the next Republican vote counter.

"He's been working at it a good long time," Bennett said. "He has the commitments of Senators who made commitments to him at a time when Lott wasn't sure he was running for re-election, let alone running for Whip."

Bennett is just one of several Republican lawmakers helping count backers for Alexander. Sens. Johnny Isakson (Ga.), Dick Lugar (Ind.), Pete Domenici (N.M.), Saxby Chambliss (Ga.), Mel Martinez (Fla.) Mike Crapo (Idaho), Mike Enzi (Wyo.), Jim Bunning (Ky.) and George Voinovich (Ohio) also are among those mentioned as part of his campaign team.

"I had a majority of votes on Thursday, and I have more votes today than I did then," Alexander said Tuesday.

Alexander entered the race more than a year ago when the only other candidate was Sen. Rick Santorum (Pa.), the current Republican Conference chairman who lost his bid for a third term. Lott had hinted he might be interested in the Whip job months ago, but he said he would not challenge Santorum, his longtime friend and ally.

Lott didn't formally enter the race until Monday night, but he quietly has been reaching out to his colleagues for some time. That outreach became more aggressive in the wake of Santorum's electoral loss last Tuesday.

The Mississippi Senator so far has kept his supporters private, but those close to him have laid out the names of a team of close to a dozen Members helping him make phone calls and corral commitments for the Whip job. Lott's allies insisted Tuesday that the one-time Majority Leader is within striking distance of winning and said he continued to meet with undecided Senators on Tuesday.

One source close to Lott said that “Lamar started at a decided advantage,” but the race is now “a dead heat.” This source suggested that there are fewer than five Senators who remain uncommitted and predicted the final result would be determined by one or two ballots.

“It is a very close race,” the source said. “But I think he’s going to have the votes to win.”

Both publicly and privately, Senators agreed that Alexander walks into today’s secret ballot with an edge. But they also insisted that Lott, a former House and Senate Whip with long-standing relationships, cannot be discounted. And, they note repeatedly, the balloting is secret.

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas), who is publicly neutral because of his own bid to become Conference vice chairman during today’s voting, said, “My sense is that Alexander has the advantage.”

One Alexander ally echoed that, saying, “We’ve double checked, triple checked and quadruple checked” our votes.

While all eyes remain on the vote for the Conference’s No. 2 spot, Republicans also will elect the rest of their leadership for the 110th Congress at this morning’s meeting. Atop the list is an all-but-certain climb for Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), who is expected become Minority Leader without opposition.

McConnell likely will be the first elected this morning, and will be nominated by Sens. Judd Gregg (N.H.) and Gordon Smith (Ore.). McConnell, the current Whip, will succeed retiring Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.) if elected.

Santorum will chair the meeting, as he remains the Conference chairman through the end of the year. Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (Texas), vice chairwoman of the Conference, is charged with announcing the winner of each ballot.

Following the vote for Minority Leader, Senators will then proceed to the casting of ballots for Whip, followed by Conference chairman, Policy Committee chairman, Conference vice chairman and National Republican Senatorial Committee chairman. Those seats are expected to go to Sen. Jon Kyl (Ariz.), Hutchison, Cornyn and Sen. John Ensign (Nev.), respectively.

Lame-Duck Texas Rep. Gets Down To Work Without DeLay (WP)

By Peter Carlson

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

Shelley Sekula-Gibbs was sworn in as a congresswoman on Monday night and already she's a lame duck. Because of a weird electoral quirk, her brief term in office expires next month.

But you couldn't tell that by listening to her.

"I'm working hard to accomplish the things I'm working for," she said yesterday. "For tax cuts. For immigration reform. To make sure we have a good solution for the war in Iraq."

All that? In a few weeks?

"If there's a way to do it, I'll do it," she said, smiling beneath her bright blond hair. "I'll deal with the leadership to get as much done as possible."

Sekula-Gibbs (R-Tex.) won a race for Congress on Nov. 7. She also lost a race for Congress on Nov. 7. It's a long story:

Tom "The Hammer" DeLay, the former House majority leader who was indicted on money-laundering charges, resigned from Congress last spring after winning the Republican primary. Last week, voters in DeLay's old district, the 22nd, got to cast two votes for Congress. The Texas voters elected Sekula-Gibbs to fill the remaining portion of DeLay's term -- but they elected Democrat Nick Lampson to succeed DeLay in the Congress that takes office in January, a race that Sekula-Gibbs had to run as a write-in candidate.

That makes for a very short congressional career for Sekula-Gibbs, 53, who is a member of the Houston City Council and a dermatologist -- probably two or three weeks, if you don't count recesses. But she'll retain all the perks that any other ex-member gets, such as use of the House gym and access to the House floor.

On Monday evening, just before she took the oath of office, Sekula-Gibbs held her first congressional news conference in her new office, which is DeLay's old office. Wearing a blue pantsuit with a fuchsia blouse and a string of pearls, she quickly proved that she has mastered the art of the well-worn political bromide.

She said: "I'm proud that the people of the 22nd Congressional District honored me with their votes."

She said: "I'm blessed by God. This really is a gift from God."

DOJ_NMG_0094569

She said: "I'm looking forward to rolling up my sleeves and getting as much done as I can accomplish."

What does she think of her accommodations?

She looked around. The dull beige walls were nearly bare. The only pictures were stored on the floor of a closet.

"These are splendid accommodations," she said, smiling. "All we need are the bare essentials to get things done."

She won't be doing any redecorating, she added. And she'll scrape by with a small staff -- a few DeLay holdovers, plus a couple of ex-campaign workers. Meanwhile, she'll spend her tenure living in a hotel. "I have no plans to have a permanent residence here," she said.

But this was no time for idle chitchat. Sekula-Gibbs had to hustle over to the Capitol.

There, after being sworn in, she addressed her distinguished colleagues: "I look forward to getting to know each of you and working on the initiatives that will help strengthen our country."

Getting to know all 434 of them? That's a lot to do in a few weeks.

In the next hour, Sekula-Gibbs cast three votes. The first was on a bill to "suspend the rules and agree to the Senate amendment" to something called the Trail of Tears Study Act. She stuck her brand-new voting card into a machine and voted yes. Then she looked up at the big screen behind the House speaker's desk and saw a little green light appear next to her name.

It was a courageous vote for Sekula-Gibbbs. If she ever runs for office again, that vote could inspire a vicious attack ad. It's not hard to imagine it: The worst photo ever taken of Sekula-Gibbs appears on the TV screen and an ominous voice says, " She voted to suspend the rules of Congress . . . "

When the voting ended, Sekula-Gibbs rose to make the first official motion of her congressional career: "Mr. Speaker," she said, "I move that the House now adjourn."

The motion carried, and she stepped out into the Speaker's Lobby, where reporters were poised to ask her how it felt.

"It was very exciting," she said.

How did she feel, asked a reporter from the Houston Chronicle, when Democrats came over to greet her?

"I welcome that," she said. "I welcome bipartisan support."

Amazing! In one short night in Congress, Sekula-Gibbs had already done most of the things that our elected representatives do. She'd held a news conference, she'd voted, she'd endorsed bipartisanship, and she'd pledged to "work with my colleagues." To experience the full gamut of congressional life, about all she needed now was a committee meeting and a breakfast meeting.

Alas, she hadn't been assigned to any committees yet. But yesterday she did hold a breakfast meeting in her office for constituents. Her staff provided Danish pastries and a Dunkin' Donuts Box o' Joe.

Houston attorney Robert Gibbs was there. He is Sekula-Gibbs's third husband. "The first husband died," he said. "And the second husband died. And I'm still here."

Jon and Lillian Keeney were there, too. They are constituents and friends of Sekula-Gibbs. They are also the proud possessors of Tom DeLay's first dinette set. They got it from DeLay's daughter, they said, when they helped her clean out DeLay's Texas office.

"It'll be on our ranch in Dime Box, Texas," said Jon.

Is it the kind of thing, a reporter asked, that might someday appear in a Tom DeLay museum?

"Absolutely!" Jon said.

Texas's senators, John Cornyn and Kay Bailey Hutchison, both Republicans, dropped by to welcome Sekula-Gibbs to Congress. So did Rep. Ted Poe (R-Tex.) , a former judge who once sentenced a burglar to stand on a sidewalk wearing a sign that read, "I stole from this store." Poe is a big fan of Sekula-Gibbs.

"I think she can get down in the pits, so to speak, and start working immediately," he said. "She has the energy to do it."

"And this is an energy state," Sekula-Gibbs added, smiling.

By then, she'd been in office for 15 hours. A reporter asked, "Have you been corrupted by power yet?"

"No, I haven't," she said. And she burst out laughing.

But only for a moment. A second later, she was serious again. "It's been a rewarding experience," she said , "and I'm looking forward to making a difference and providing a solid voice for conservative values."

Uprising By Ex-DeLay Staff (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers, Roll Call Staff

Roll Call, November 15, 2006

The woman who was sworn in this week as the interim Republican successor to ex-Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) was, shall we say, not a hit with holdover DeLay aides.

In fact, they showed their feelings about their new boss Tuesday by walking out of the office en masse and resigning, effective immediately. The DeLay refugees, who included

DeLay's personal chief of staff, David James, walked out of the office, Von Trapp family-style (though without the singing) and huddled at Starbucks to get their wits about them.

The interim Member, Shelley Sekula-Gibbs (R), who won the special election to replace DeLay but lost a write-in campaign for a full two-year term, only will be serving in Congress until Jan. 3, when Democrat Nick Lampson, who won the general election, takes over. But even just for these few weeks, it appears, Sekula-Gibbs wants things just so.

She showed up to take over DeLay's old office on Thursday and, according to sources familiar the office dynamics, was "mean" to the staff. On Tuesday, at her new Member's open-house reception in the office, sources charged that she was less than pleased that neither President Bush nor Vice President Cheney showed up with the rest of the welcome wagon, despite the fact that others who stopped by included Texas GOP Sens. Kay Bailey Hutchison and John Cornyn and Texas GOP Reps. Kevin Brady and Michael Burgess. (Apparently, according to sources, she was under the impression that the president of the United States would be there to greet the seven-week Congresswoman.)

One source said, "This is a highly professional and well-seasoned staff who has worked with the best, and worst, of Members, but you'll need to promise a Congressional Medal to anyone willing to take this one on."

Carl Thorsen, who is now a lobbyist, hired most of the DeLay aides who stormed out of the new Congresswoman's office when he was DeLay's general counsel and in charge of staffing the Hammer's personal office. He said he couldn't imagine what it must have taken to provoke the staff to quit all at once.

"I know them. They're exceptional and talented," he said. "They've been loyal to that district and they've worked really hard. They're just not a group of loose cannons.

Sekula-Gibbs' chief of staff, Lisa Diamond, told HOH that the DeLay aides were only there "for transitional purposes," not for the mini-Congresswoman's full seven-week tenure, which surely will be hectic given the number of days the lame duck is scheduled to be in session.

Asked about the aides storming out of the office she said, "Ooh, oh ... I don't know what we can say about that." Diamond said she would not comment on personnel issues.

But she said she has worked for Sekula-Gibbs for many years and said, "I think she is wonderful to work for."

Corker, Top Class. Too soon to say whether he's at the top of his class, but Sen.-elect Bob Corker (R-Tenn.) is certainly top-class. He's wasting no time getting used to living the high life of a Senator, considering how he arrived in Washington, D.C., on Monday for freshman orientation.

Corker, a millionaire who poured $2 million of his own money into his race against Rep. Harold Ford Jr. (D-Tenn.), and his wife, Elizabeth, traveled first-class on a U.S. Airways flight to Washington Reagan National Airport, a regular HOH informant reports.

Our informant said Corker and his wife sat in seats 4C and 4A. "I didn't get to see if he was partying at all," the informant said.

But the informant did notice that Corker was the last passenger to get on the plane, as he was busy "working the phones to the bitter end" before the gate closed.

Our informant said it sounded as if the Senator-elect was calling supporters and thanking them. At one point he heard him say, "I'm on my way to orientation."

Well, it turns out, Corker and his wife lucked out getting those first-class tickets, according to Corker spokesman Todd Womack.

He told HOH that the Senator bought coach tickets, but that his connecting flight in Charlotte, N.C., was "very delayed" and when he went to rebook seats, "the only seats available were in the other class."

Much Ado About Nothing. There is much buzz inside and outside the Beltway about Stephen Colbert of Comedy Central's "The Colbert Report" being a kingmaker. After all, it has been said, every House Member who appeared on his "Better Know a District"segment won re-election last Tuesday. The Los Angeles Times even called him the "biggest election season winner."

Wa wa wee, as another fake journalist might say.

What's more, Democrat John Hall appeared on the show after his opponent, Rep. Sue Kelly (R-N.Y.), refused to, and ended up unseating her.

Could it be that Colbert is truly the magic man? The answer, of course, is no. Of all the many House Members who actually appeared on the show, only two of them won their race by less than 63 percent — and many of them were unopposed entirely or not even running for re-election.

Who can forget Rep. Robert Wexler's (D-Fla.) appearance on Colbert where he said doing cocaine and picking up prostitutes are fun things to do? But when you don't have any challengers in the upcoming election, it makes it a whole lot easier to say such things and still get re-elected. He could have partied it up with Rep. Harold Ford, Jr. (D-Tenn.) at a Playboy party and still won.

As for the case of Rep.-elect Hall, it turns out that he is the only House challenger who appeared on Colbert's show and actually won. The other four challengers who appeared went down in fiery flames. Yet, somehow, Colbert exerts a loyalty that is unmatched since the era of Stalin.

Despite losing decidedly to Rep. Jim Saxton (R-N.J.) after appearing on Colbert's show, challenger Rich Sexton's (D) campaign still praises the fake TV pundit.

"We were very pleased with what happened with Colbert," a spokeswoman for Sexton's campaign said. "It certainly was a help ... I don't know that he was the magic man."

No he was not. Sexton lost by 17 points. Good job, Colbert.

And what about the Senate? Ned Lamont appeared on Colbert's show after Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.) declined to. We all know how that turned out for him.

What's On The Agenda For Student Aid (WSJ)

By Anne Marie Chaker

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

College affordability is high on the agenda for the newly elected Democratic leadership in Congress, and that could mean good news for families worried about the rising cost of college.

Among the measures Democrats have proposed is halving the interest rate on some federal student loans, which could save students thousands of dollars over the term of their loans. Parents could benefit from a proposal to allow tax deductions for tuition paid by families earning up to $160,000 a year. And lower-income families could get added help from a possible expansion of the federal Pell Grant program.

Rep. Nancy Pelosi, the likely new House speaker, has set college affordability as one of a handful of priorities in the Democrats' New Direction for America program. To build momentum, Democrats are including the proposed student-loan rate cut among a number of measures they plan to introduce on the first day of the new Congress and to pass within the first 100 hours Congress is in session. (Other measures on the "100 hours" list include raising the minimum wage and rolling back subsidies for big oil companies.)

The Democrats' college-affordability proposals are expected to gain backing from outside the party. "Pelosi has picked apple-pie issues in higher ed that both sides of the aisle can come around," says Sarah Flanagan, vice president for government relations at the National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities. "But the debate will be whether it's the best use of scarce federal resources," she says. Indeed, the Republican-led Congress this year lopped nearly $12 billion from student-lending programs as part of a deficit-reduction act, infuriating Democrats.

Some of the proposals may draw opposition from banks and other for-profit lenders if the interest rate reductions eat into their profits. While Democrats haven't yet said so, "we are nervous that they will attempt to...reduce lender returns," says John Dean, special counsel for the Arlington, Va.-based Consumer Bankers Association, a group of student-loan providers.

Some experts also say the Democrats' proposals could encourage colleges to raise tuition further. "Anytime you make it easier, cheaper for kids to borrow money...that tends to push prices up," says Richard Vedder, director of the Center for College Affordability and Productivity in Washington.

Despite the efforts to make higher education more affordable, paying for college likely will continue to become increasingly difficult for many students. Average total tuition and fees at four-year private colleges increased 5.9% to $22,218 in the current academic year. The average undergraduate leaves school more than $20,000 in debt, compared with about $16,000 in 1999-2000, according to an analysis of the Education Department's National Postsecondary Student Aid study.

What's more, caps on how much federal assistance is available per student means that students could continue to rely more heavily on private student loans, which typically carry higher interest rates. In the last academic year, private student lending, which is separate from federal loans distributed through banks, amounted to about $17 billion in new loans, up more than three times since 2001-02. Federal student loans originated in the 2005-2006 academic year totaled $69 billion.

The federal government's student-lending programs include the popular Stafford loans, which allow students to borrow as much as $23,000 for an undergraduate education and $65,500 for undergraduate and graduate school combined. Other programs include the Parent Loan for Undergraduate Students and the Pell Grant, which gives needy students money that doesn't have to be repaid. Loans are either issued directly to students or are distributed through private lenders.

Democratic leaders may scale back some of their ambitions in a bid to help move measures through Congress. The New Direction document calls for cutting interest rates in half for student and parent loans. But now Democratic aides say lawmakers might seek to cut rates only for certain student loans. Rep. George Miller (D., Calif.), expected to be named leader of the House education committee, said in a postelection statement last week that among the "first three priorities" for the committee is to improve college affordability by cutting interest rates in half on student loans.

Stafford loans currently carry an interest rate of 6.8%. For a typical $20,000 loan over 10 years, cutting that rate in half would save a student about $4,000, according to an analysis by Mark Kantrowitz, publisher of FinAid.org.

Democrats also want to raise the limit that needy students can receive from the Pell Grant program to $5,100 a year from $4,050, which has been the limit for four years. Sen. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.), who will head the Senate education committee, has unsuccessfully tried to raise that cap in recent years. President Bush in his 2000 election campaign spoke about an increase in the Pell Grant program, when he said he would raise the limit to $5,100, but just for first-year students. That promise never materialized.

Rep. Miller and Sen. Kennedy helped introduce legislation last year that would have provided financial incentives for schools that encourage students to borrow directly from the government, rather than obtain federal loans that are distributed through private banks. The lawmakers are expected to revive the idea. Currently, just one-fourth of federal loans are made directly to students. Democrats point to reports by the Congressional Budget Office and the Government Accountability Office that say direct lending saves the government money, though those reports are contested by the loan industry.

Under the proposal, the government would hand over a portion of the money that it saves to the schools, on condition that it be directed to need-based student-aid programs.

Democrats also want to restore a tax deduction, which expired last year, that used to benefit families who earned up to $160,000 a year. That measure would allow tuition-paying families to deduct as much as $4,000 a year. Other existing tax incentives, including the Hope and Lifetime Learning programs, provide tax credits for families with annual incomes of up to $107,000.

"The bottom line is these proposals will require an infusion of money," says Mr. Kantrowitz of FinAid.org. "So they will need to either increase taxes or cut costs elsewhere to pay for it."

Big Oil Headed For Tougher Congress (CSM)

By Ron Scherer

The Christian Science Monitor, November 15, 2006

NEW YORK

So far this year, 40 bills have been introduced in Congress about alleged gasoline price gouging. Twenty-one bills have addressed windfall profits by oil companies. Few have gotten past the press-release stage.

But next year, Big Oil is likely to feel as if it's wearing one of those "kick me" signs.

The Democratic leadership has already indicated it will try to repeal earlier tax breaks for oil companies. A gusher of new legislation could develop as well, as Democrats get a chance to see their energy bills move past the trash can. In fact, the Democrats will try to put together their own version of a comprehensive energy bill that tackles everything from gas-mileage standards to tax breaks for alternative energy sources, some congressional analysts believe.

"The oil companies are a big target for the Democratic majority," says Steven Smith, a congressional expert and professor at Washington University in St. Louis. "There is virtually near unanimity among the Democrats to do something about company tax breaks, but they will almost certainly seek a package of energy and environmental proposals in this Congress."

Congress is expected to move despite the fact oil and gasoline prices have been falling. Oil is now less than $57 a barrel, compared with more than $70 last spring. Gasoline is about $2.23 a gallon - 6 cents a gallon lower than a year ago, and more than 75 cents lower than in the spring.

"The surge in legislation earlier this year was due to the gas prices, as virtually every member of Congress wanted to go on the record as doing something about it," says Mr. Smith. "I don't think anyone lifted a finger to get that legislation passed."

Still, the oil industry is bracing for a new battle, particularly over tax breaks. "That will be seriously considered: They are sure to have hearings. It will go to markup, that sort of thing," says Jim Ford, a lobbyist for the American Petroleum Institute (API) in Washington. "As policymakers start to look at where the money goes, they will ask practical questions, such as why [the tax breaks] are in the tax code now."

Some of the tax breaks are relatively recent. In the Energy Policy Act of 2005, Congress allowed refiners to expense 50 percent of the cost of capital projects that would increase capacity by at least 5 percent.

"This came about when there were concerns about the adequacy of refining capacity in the US," says Mr. Ford. "It was put there to [create further incentives] and perhaps make it economically viable for capacity expansion."

Another tax break, given during the Clinton administration, gives the oil industry relief from paying the government royalties for deepwater drilling in the Gulf of Mexico. "When it was put in place, we had $20 [a barrel] oil, and you could not afford to drill in a mile of water," says John Felmy, chief economist at the API. "If anyone looks at it fairly, it has been a very successful program."

On the other hand, industry critics maintain the tax breaks haven't worked. The refineries have failed to expand, says Mark Cooper, research director at the Consumer Federation of America in Washington. Royalty relief is now a bad idea, he adds: "At the current price of oil, deepwater drilling is plenty profitable. And the finds in the Gulf have not significantly improved the worldwide supply-and-demand balance."

But the debate over energy policy is likely to go well beyond taxes, says Mr. Cooper, since many of the potential 2008 presidential candidates - some prominent members of Congress - have already drafted energy plans or have well-defined positions. Many of these lawmakers focus on fuel efficiency or the use of biofuels. On the Democratic side, says Cooper, one of the main themes is "efficiency, efficiency."

This spring, Sen. Barack Obama (D) of Illinois (along with Sen. Richard Lugar (R) of Indiana) proposed an energy policy of loan guarantees for those producing biofuels and a requirement that all new cars have fuel flexibility by the end of 2010.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D) of New York has also put together a plan heavy on alternative fuels and efficiency. On the Republican side, Sen. John McCain of Arizona wants to press for 100,000 hydrogen-powered vehicles by 2010.

Even though Congress will be in a lame-duck session for the rest of the year, some members of the energy sector hope it will take up the issue of allowing drilling for oil and natural gas in the eastern part of the Gulf of Mexico. To get the states on board, lawmakers would offer them enhanced revenue sharing.

"It virtually assures the reelection of Sen. Mary Landrieu [(D) of Louisiana] in 2008," says David Parker, president of the American Gas Association in Washington, which favors the proposal. "We're hoping the House passes it before adjournment."

The shift in congressional leadership may also mean additional funding for the Low Income Home Energy Assistance Program, which is currently funded at $2.1 billion for 2007. Says Mr. Parker: "They might add some extra money to get it to the same level as last year," which was $3.2 billion.

Why The Next Congress Will Be 'Greener,' But Only By A Few Shades (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker

The Christian Science Monitor, November 15, 2006

ASHLAND, ORE.

After years in the political wilderness, activists and their champions in Congress are poised to take environmental policy and lawmaking in a decidedly greener direction.

Climate change and renewable energy, land conservation, endangered species protection, pollution prevention - all will get a fresh look as Democrats take over key committees and subcommittees in the US House and Senate.

At the same time, activists don't expect the new Congress to make radical changes.

"We have cause for good cheer and optimism," says Betsy Loyless, senior vice president of the National Audubon Society. "But even with significant congressional changes, there will likely be limits to what's achievable."

Among other things, she says, Congress faces tight fiscal constraints, industry interests continue to hold sway with the Bush administration, most incoming Democrats are moderate rather than liberal, and pro-environment interests will have fewer middle-of-the-road GOP allies (such as defeated Sen. Lincoln Chaffee of Rhode Island) on Capitol Hill.

Still, expect a weakened effort to drill for oil and gas in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in Alaska and in the Rocky Mountain states, less of a push for expansive offshore oil drilling, and more resources to bolster the Endangered Species Act and clean up toxic sites on the Superfund list. The ethanol debate

Among important related issues will be the five-year farm bill, set to expire next year, and crop subsidies connected to ethanol production.

As with other major environmental and energy issues, the ethanol issue presents activists with a political dilemma. Using more ethanol can help reduce reliance on foreign oil, but it can also mean more use of fertilizers and pesticides and less interest in the federal program to set aside agricultural land in conservation reserves to protect wetlands and wildlife habitat.

"The whole [farm bill] debate will be over how much money goes to conservation," predicts Ken Cook, president of the Environmental Working Group.

In other areas, too - the energy and pollution associated with motor vehicles, for example, or power generation impacting fish and wildlife habitat - local interests could conflict with long-term goals of environmentalists. New committee chairs to watch

The biggest immediate changes will be in committee leadership. Rep. Richard Pombo (R) of California lost his reelection bid to political novice Jerry McNerney, a wind energy engineer. It was an indication of the clout the Sierra Club, Defenders of Wildlife, and other activist groups had in this election. Mr. Pombo will be replaced as House Resources Committee chair by longtime environmental champion Rep. Nick Rahall (D) of West Virginia, a leader in the effort to reform the hardrock mining law of 1872, which left thousands of polluted sites across the West.

In the Senate's Environment and Public Works Committee, Barbara Boxer (D) of California will assume the chairmanship from James Inhofe (R) of Oklahoma, who has called the Environmental Protection Agency "a Gestapo bureaucracy" and who once called global warming "the greatest hoax ever perpetrated on the American people." The Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee will be chaired by Democrat Jeff Bingaman of New Mexico, another advocate of dealing directly with climate change.

Much has been made of the centrist - sometimes even conservative - stance of the new crop of lawmakers. But their campaign statements and records on environmental issues would indicate that most are quite green. Related to this, voters in many states passed pro-environment ballot measures, an indicator of political support. And in some ways, the old guard - and not just Democrats - is likely to have even more prominence. Two important Senate proponents of addressing global warming have been Republican and likely presidential candidate John McCain of Arizona and Democrat-turned-Independent Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut.

On the other hand, some of the Democratic old guard may put roadblocks in the way of environmentalists' goals. Rep. John Dingell (D) of Michigan, whose Detroit home district includes Ford, General Motors, and Chrysler, is set to take over the House Energy and Commerce Committee. Mr. Dingell can be expected to resist attempts to stiffen fuel-efficiency standards for autos.

Meanwhile, the White House reportedly will launch an "energy independence" initiative focusing on fuel made from plant waste. This may have been in the works before the election, but the "thumping" President Bush acknowledges having taken on Election Day may help to focus his attention on energy issues.

"Energy was definitely a factor in many of the most competitive races," says Anna Aurilio, Washington office director of the US Public Interest Research Group. War in an oil-rich part of the world and unusually high gasoline prices earlier this year were part of that, she says.

Advocates of renewable energy resources received a boost this week from a new report by the RAND Corp. Researchers at the nonprofit organization find that by 2025 wind power, solar power, the burning of agricultural waste, and other renewable resources could produce 25 percent of the electricity and motor-vehicle fuels used in the US at little or no additional cost while achieving "significant reductions in carbon dioxide emissions from fossil fuel combustion."

As lawmakers and the White House discuss their new relationship regarding energy and the environment, such information sharpens the focus.

"I actually think from talking to Democrats they have the same concerns we do," White House economic adviser Allan Hubbard told the Financial Times last week. "They are concerned about energy, and recognize that we need to accelerate our efforts to cure our addiction to foreign oil."

In the end, agrees Audubon official Betsy Loyless, "Environmental progress can only be made to the extent that the various sides desire to find common ground."

Historian Says Peak Oil Production Is Still A Quarter-century Away (MCT)

By Kevin G. Hall

McClatchy Newspapers, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - Far from being a nearly exhausted resource, the world's oil reserves are three times bigger than what some popular estimates state, and peak global oil production is still about a quarter-century away, according to a new study by Pulitzer Prize-winning oil historian Daniel Yergin.

The remaining oil resource base is about 3.74 trillion barrels, according to a report released Tuesday by Cambridge Energy Research Associates, which Yergin runs. That's more than three times the 1.2 trillion barrels that "peak-oil" theorists suggest.

CERA's report, titled "Why the Peak Oil Theory Falls Down," challenges an increasingly popular view that the world is about to run out of oil. On the contrary, CERA argues that the world is likely to begin running out of oil between 2030 and the middle of the century. Even so, CERA says, efforts are needed now to push that date back, such as new oil field discoveries, new technologies, energy conservation and alternative energy sources.

Peak-oil theorists warn that the world is on the cusp of a disastrous and rapid decline in oil production. A leading proponent of the theory is oil banker Matthew Simmons, who in the popular book "Twilight in the Desert" suggested that the world's top producer, Saudi Arabia, has entered an oil-production decline and will take the world down with it. Last month, Simmons told a forum that the world might have reached peak oil production last December.

The peak-oil theory has gained supporters since late 2004, when surging global demand for oil began tightening up available supplies and driving up world oil prices. The price hit $78.40 a barrel in July, but has fallen to less than $60 a barrel in recent months.

The CERA study debunks the so-called Hubbert Peak Oil Theory, first espoused in 1956 by geologist M. King Hubbert. Working at the time for Shell Oil Co., he predicted that world oil production would follow a bell-shaped curve in which production grows steadily until it peaks, followed by a rapid decline.

Hubbert was pretty accurate on the timing of U.S. peak oil production, coming within two years of 1970, the year experts now recognize as the peak of continental U.S. production.

But his theory failed to recognize that new technologies enabled reserves to grow over time. His theory preceded the exploitation of massive oil reserves in Alaska and the Gulf of Mexico.

That's why Yergin dismisses talk of peak oil.

"This is really the fifth time we've `run out of oil,'" Yergin said in a teleconference with journalists on Tuesday. He recalled past predictions dating back to 1880 of an end to oil or gasoline production.

Yergin's views carry weight because he won the Pulitzer for his 1991 book "The Prize," an exhaustive history of oil economics.

He and colleagues believe that the decline in oil availability will play out as an "undulating plateau," in which annual production produces a series of ups and downs, eventually peaks and then declines slowly.

"We see the undulating plateau existing one or two decades, rather than a sharp decline," said Peter Jackson, CERA's director of oil industry activity. He sees outright decline beginning no earlier than 2030 and perhaps after 2050.

Future oil supplies, said CERA, will be accessible by new technologies that permit drilling more than 7,000 feet below the ocean's surface or extracting oil from tar-like deposits in sandy soil found in western Canada.

"Ours is not a view of endless abundance of resources," said Jackson, cautioning that he doesn't want CERA's findings to "distract us from addressing real issues."

Another source of optimism for this energy-hungry world emerged from another report this week, this one a technical paper from the Los Angeles-based think tank Rand Corp. It ran 1,500 simulations of varied energy prices and technology costs to estimate future supplies of both renewable and nonrenewable fuels.

It concluded that up to one-quarter of the electricity and motor fuels consumed in the United States in 2025 could be produced from renewable sources, up from only 6 percent today. For that to happen, the price of fossil fuels must remain high and the costs of producing alternative energy must keep falling.

"The renewables case could displace about 2.5 million barrels a day of petroleum products in the United States in 2025, or 20 percent of total consumption," the Rand report said.

Together, the two reports give hope that energy will be plentiful for another generation or more.

"I've never seen so much activity in terms of energy technology all along the spectrum," Yergin said. "I think the system is responding."

Enter, Pariah: Now It's Hugs For Lieberman (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 14 — Senator Joseph I. Lieberman strode into a Democratic caucus gathering like he owned the place or, at the very least, like someone who is a flight risk and could leave at any minute, taking the Democrats' new majority with him.

In other words, everyone was extra-special nice to the wayward Democrat on Tuesday.

"It was all very warm, lots of hugs, high-fives, that kind of stuff," said Senator Ken Salazar of Colorado.

Senator Ron Wyden of Oregon marveled, "One senator after another kept coming up and shaking his hand."

And Senator Blanche Lincoln of Arkansas noted, "I gave him a hug and a kiss."

Mr. Lieberman received a standing ovation at a caucus luncheon after Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, who is poised to become the majority leader, declared, "We're all family."

All of which is particularly touching in light of recent history. It was, after all, just three months ago that Mr. Lieberman became something of a party pariah after losing the Democratic primary in Connecticut but continuing his re-election bid as an independent.

Mr. Lieberman won re-election last week without help from most of his Democratic Senate colleagues, who backed Ned Lamont, his Democratic rival, over their "good friend Joe Lieberman."

These would be many of the same good friends "who were happy to leave my dad by the side of the road," as Mr. Lieberman's son, Matthew, put it in an election night speech. These, presumably, would include "friends" like Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, John Kerry of Massachusetts and Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut, all Lamont supporters.

"It's clear that the Democrats need him at this point more than he needs them," said Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, whom Mr. Lieberman genuinely does consider a close friend. "How sweet is this?"

Indeed, it is hard to imagine how Mr. Lieberman could have emerged better from last week's election. He was re-elected comfortably, and the Democratic Party he still belongs to is now in the majority, assuring him the chairmanship of the powerful Homeland Security Committee.

Yet that majority is slim enough, 51 to 49, to turn Mr. Lieberman into arguably the Senate's most influential member. If he defects, the Senate would effectively be under Republican control because Vice President Dick Cheney would cast tie-breaking votes.

"It was very painful to him to have all these people he thought were his friends embrace his opponent," Ms. Collins said. "They just threw him overboard. But now, not only is he re-elected resoundingly, but he is also the key to which party controls the Senate."

Mr. Lieberman's situation underscores the precarious calculus of political friendships. People close to him say he remains miffed, if not bitter, about what he considers the betrayal of allies who supported an unknown, untested and unfamiliar candidate.

In recent months, Mr. Lieberman has frequently invoked the Harry Truman maxim that if you want a friend in Washington, get a dog.

Mr. Lieberman has suggested he has felt especially wounded by Mr. Dodd, Connecticut's senior senator, with whom he had shared a close bond since arriving in the Senate in 1989. Mr. Dodd had supported Mr. Lieberman in the primary, but endorsed Mr. Lamont after he won. Mr. Dodd's appearance with Mr. Lamont at a Democratic "unity" rally and in a campaign commercial infuriated Mr. Lieberman, friends said.

Mr. Dodd said in a brief interview Tuesday, "We all make decisions, and those decisions have consequences."

Earlier in the day, he attended a Capitol Hill news conference that drew every Democrat in Connecticut's Congressional delegation except Mr. Lieberman.

Friends said the strains between Mr. Lieberman and his Democratic colleagues show.

"It will take a little time for the room to really warm up from both ends," said Senator Mary L. Landrieu of Louisiana, one of the few Senate Democrats who supported Mr. Lieberman in his general election campaign. "I would not be forthright if I didn't say there was some healing and work that has to be done."

During the campaign, Mr. Lieberman said repeatedly that he would continue to vote with the Democratic caucus, but there were calls from the left for the Democratic leadership to strip him of his seniority and committee assignments if he won.

But as Mr. Lieberman claimed a healthy lead in polls, Mr. Reid reached out to him. Over time, Mr. Reid's and other Democratic leaders' support for Mr. Lamont became half-hearted, or nonexistent, according to Mr. Lamont's campaign.

Mr. Lieberman classifies himself as an "independent Democrat" and has said that recent events left him feeling "liberated" and "unshackled," not exactly reassuring words to Democrats.

He stirred more anxiety Sunday, when in an interview on NBC's "Meet the Press," he refused to rule out becoming a Republican (while adding, "I hope I don't get to that point").

In brief remarks to reporters Tuesday, Mr. Lieberman said he had refused to rule out switching parties largely because Tim Russert, the show's host, "kept pressing me on it."

But Mr. Lieberman also said that while "most of my vote clearly came from independents and Republicans" in Connecticut, "it's fair to say that I couldn't have won without Democratic support."

Mr. Lieberman restated that it was possible he could join Senate Republicans, but he added, "I'm not going to threaten on every issue to leave the caucus."

Clearly, friends say, he is relishing his sudden ascent from Democratic reject in Connecticut to Senate kingmaker in Washington. "He is just sitting there in the catbird seat, and it must be delicious for him," Ms. Collins said.

DOJ_NMG_0094578

Mr. Lieberman was asked Tuesday if he viewed his position as similar to a swing vote on the Supreme Court, a role often played by former Justice Sandra Day O'Connor or Justice Anthony M. Kennedy. The parallel had not occurred to him, Mr. Lieberman replied, but he considered it "a complimentary analogy."

He beamed as he said this, as he did for much of the day.

Top 2 Census Officials Resign (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

The two highest-ranking officials in the U.S. Census Bureau quit yesterday, putting management of the agency in flux as preparations for the next census enter a critical phase.

The departures of Census Bureau chief C. Louis Kincannon, a statistician appointed by President Bush to lead the agency in 2002, and Hermann Habermann, a career statistician who runs the census operation, could complicate a revision of the counting process in 2010 -- to produce a detailed picture of the U.S. population every year, rather than once a decade.

The census determines such key issues as congressional representation to highway expenditures, so it draws intense scrutiny from lawmakers.

"This will hurt the agency as it tries to roll out the planning process," said Columbia University professor Kenneth Prewitt, a former Census Bureau director. "The 2010 census is a very big operation that involves detailed planning spread over a number of years."

The open positions will likely take at least six months to fill, he said.

Kincannon officially cited family responsibilities for his departure. But in an interview he mentioned "different views perhaps about priorities" at the agency.

"My perception is that I don't have the same level of trust that I did a year or so ago," said Kincannon, who began his career at the agency in 1963. "The relationship has changed, and that relationship I regard as essential." There was no official reason given for Habermann's departure and no letter was released. Habermann could not be reached to comment.

Kincannon will stay on until his replacement is found and is confirmed by the Senate. Habermann will stay until early January. His successor will likely come from the bureau's career ranks, though a political appointment is possible.

In his resignation letter to Bush, Kincannon defends the Census Bureau's finding in 2003 that it used the best methods possible in counting Americans from communities -- including minorities, renters and immigrants -- that are the most difficult to tally and tend to vote Democratic. Because the census forms the basis for apportioning congressional districts, past efforts to adjust the numbers in undercounted areas ignited partisan battles that have raged on and off for decades.

Addressing the issue, Kincannon's resignation letter cites extensive scientific documentation, "should my successor have need of it."

One person with knowledge of the situation suggested that the two officials -- especially Habermann, a career employee -- were targeted by Republicans who would want to install an official who could better protect against Democratic congressional efforts to reinvigorate adjustment efforts -- a move some think could favor Democrats.

"I think there persists among congressional Republicans a concern about that, but if they look at the facts they will see that's not a likely thing," Kincannon said.

One Hill staff member with knowledge of census operations said the resignations anticipated the release in coming weeks of a congressional report on lost laptop computers at the agency. The Census Bureau is part of the Commerce Department, which revealed several weeks ago that the Census Bureau has lost 672 laptop computers since 2001. One-third of the computers contained personal data, though no evidence has emerged that the information has been misused.

"I don't think the laptop situation was a determining factor" in the resignations, Kincannon said. "We've had some problems and we've taken steps to address that problem."

The Census Bureau has also repeatedly run into budget problems on the Hill.

Kincannon said the agency had $50 million trimmed from its 2007 budget request of $878 million. The budget is not final, but without the money, "We can wind up limited in our ability to achieve the automation required to carry out the census in 2010 at lower cost."

Neither Commerce nor the Census Bureau issued statements on the departures. While Kincannon's letter was released, neither agency would confirm that Habermann, who is not required to write a resignation letter, issued one.

Commerce spokesman Dan Nelson refused to comment on the unusual timing of the departures. "They've both done a great job," he said. "The 2010 census is on track and on schedule."

Some members of Congress weren't so sure. "Changing management at a time like this is very dangerous," said Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney (N.Y.), a member of the Government Reform Committee and former ranking Democrat on the census subcommittee, said in a statement. "It's disturbing that two world-class statisticians who have worked for years to make sure we will have an accurate count in 2010 left on the same day so soon before the beginning of the census.

"At this point, without knowing who's taking over, it fair to say that the accuracy of the 2010 census is absolutely in jeopardy."

Time Again To Choose Or Switch Drug Plans (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 14 — Starting Wednesday, Medicare beneficiaries can sign up for prescription drug coverage or switch plans, and many may want to do so because prices have changed, with some of the most popular plans charging much higher premiums for 2007.

In every state but Alaska and Hawaii, more than 50 drug plans are available. Beneficiaries have until Dec. 31 to sign up or change plans, but federal officials said they should act by Dec. 8 to avoid the problems that caused turmoil at pharmacies in January, when many people were unable to get their drugs.

Several recent surveys, including one by J. D. Power & Associates, the market research company, suggest that three-fourths of the people with Medicare drug coverage are satisfied. Michael O. Leavitt, the secretary of health and human services, said: “The program is working. People are happy. ”

The Bush administration says that premiums for Medicare drug coverage will average $24 a month in 2007, about the same as in 2006. But for many beneficiaries, the reality may be substantially different.

Melvin London, an 83-year-old retired filmmaker in New York City, said Tuesday that the new Medicare benefit had saved $245 for him and $685 for his wife. He was annoyed at the prospect of a sharp increase in premiums in 2007. For Mr. London’s plan, known as Humana Enhanced, the monthly premium will be $29.60, up from $9.42.

“I call that bait and switch, when the company charges $9 to get you in and then goes to $29,” Mr. London said. “It took me three months to find a plan that was suitable. Am I now supposed to go through the same process every year to determine which plan is best for me? That’s an unfair burden for beneficiaries.”

Thomas T. Noland Jr., a senior vice president of Humana, said: “We still offer excellent value. We will have the lowest premium in 38 states, the second-lowest in 10 states and the third-lowest in the remaining two states.”

About 4.5 million Medicare beneficiaries receive drug coverage from Humana plans. Humana has been wooing people with free showings of the Humphrey Bogart movie “Casablanca.” Medicare beneficiaries eat popcorn and sip sodas while watching the film, along with a short extolling Humana’s Medicare plans.

The $24 premium emphasized by the Bush administration is for basic coverage, the minimum required by law, and many plans provide additional benefits for an extra premium. Moreover, the average includes premiums for drug coverage offered by managed care plans and by free-standing drug plans, which serve people in the traditional Medicare program.

Both types of plans charged about $24 a month, on average, for drug coverage this year. In 2007, the average premium will increase about 10 percent for free-standing drug plans, but will decrease about 35 percent for drug coverage offered by managed care plans.

Most drug plans have a gap in coverage. “Beneficiaries tell us this was a helpful benefit for six or eight months, until they fell into the coverage gap,” said Deane R. Beebe, a spokeswoman for the Medicare Rights Center, a consumer group that counsels people with Medicare.

Some insurers provide coverage for generic drugs in the coverage gap, and a few also provide coverage for brand-name drugs in the gap. But Ms. Beebe said, “In 11 states, we cannot find any free-standing drug plan that provides coverage for brand-name drugs in the gap.”

The Medicare handbook, sent to all beneficiaries, says that a plan offered by Coventry Health Care will pay for generic and brand-name drugs in the coverage gap. But Francis S. Soistman Jr., executive vice president of Coventry, said Tuesday that only five brand-name drugs, out of the many available, were covered in the gap.

Jeff Nelligan, a Medicare spokesman, said, “We corrected the online version of the information.”

Sixteen Democratic senators, led by Byron L. Dorgan of North Dakota, said this week that some insurers were misleading consumers by marketing drug plans under names that included the word “complete.”

“How can a plan be called ‘complete’ when it contains a gap in drug coverage?” they asked in a letter to Mr. Leavitt.

John C. Rother, policy director of AARP, the lobby for older Americans, said the new program had helped many people. His “biggest disappointment,” Mr. Rother said, was that several million low-income people had not applied for the extra help available to them.

Drug Makers' Politics Produces A Bitter Pill (WSJ)

By Alan Murray

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

Since Election Day, drug stocks have gotten clobbered. Pfizer, Wyeth, Eli Lilly and Novartis have tumbled 5% or more; GlaxoSmithKline, Merck and Johnson & Johnson are down 4% or more; and Bristol-Myers Squibb is down 3.5%.

Add it up, and you've got nearly $50 billion in market value wiped out by Democratic victories.

That's the price big pharma is paying for a badly bungled political strategy. For years, the industry operated on the assumption it could get what it wanted out of Washington. Then, when the going got tough, it doubled down on Republicans and ignored a groundswell of public anger over high drug prices.

TALKING BUSINESS

Should the government negotiate drug prices for senior citizens directly with the big drug companies? Join the discussion.1 Alan Murray will read your thoughts and post replies.

Even ex-congressman Billy Tauzin, the Democrat-turned-Republican who heads the industry's trade group, acknowledges that before he took over two years ago, the group used "a scorched-earth policy" to get its way.

The most conspicuous example of overreach was a line inserted in the Medicare Modernization Act of 2003 that prohibited the U.S. government from negotiating prices directly with drug companies. That prohibition was unnecessary; the law created a structure in which private insurers and health plans did the negotiating on the government's behalf.

But someone allied with the drug industry -- it's still a little unclear who -- insisted on making the implicit explicit, and in the process, created a campaign issue for Democrats.

As a result, the industry's big bet has now gone bad. Allowing the government to negotiate prices directly with drug companies has become Democratic dogma. And a few moderate Republicans are toeing the line as well.

That doesn't make it a good idea.

Truth is, drug companies can't really "negotiate" with the government, any more than a backwoods hiker can negotiate with a 900-pound grizzly bear.

With a market share of about 46%, the government would set drug prices, not negotiate them, and then establish "formularies" telling seniors which drugs they could use and which ones they couldn't. Would that make seniors feel better off? I doubt it.

The challenge facing the industry is to balance the legitimate desire for lower prices against the equally legitimate desire for new drugs, which cost large sums of money to develop. The marketplace doesn't always get that balance right. But there's no reason to think government bureaucrats would do it better.

Moreover, negotiated prices would force drug companies to redouble their lobbying efforts in Washington. That would be unfortunate. One reason the industry is in such a mess is because its leaders have spent too much time trying to get Washington to solve their problems, and too little time fixing a broken business model.

In the past two years, there's been a purge -- Henry "Hank" McKinnell of Pfizer, Raymond Gilmartin of Merck and Peter Dolan of Bristol-Myers Squibb have all been pushed out of their jobs. A new generation of chief executives is looking to blaze a fresh trail, and the government should encourage them, not force them to reverse course.

And here's the biggest surprise: The new prescription-drug benefit for America's senior citizens, created by the Medicare Modernization Act, is working pretty well. Oh sure, there was a lot of confusion at first over the "doughnut hole" and the complexity of choices. But a year into this grand experiment, the cost of the drug benefit is going down -- it now averages $24 a month, instead of the $42 estimated by actuaries, according to Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt -- and the satisfaction of seniors is going up. Why mess with it now?

If Democrats need their political pound of flesh, there are other ways to extract it without causing such damage to consumers.

One option, being pushed by Sen. Ron Wyden, an Oregon Democrat, would give the administration limited negotiating power to be used only in extreme cases, when drug companies with a monopoly product refuse to negotiate with Medicare's middlemen. Another option would be to push measures that help the marketplace, rather than hamper it -- creating a pathway for generic versions of biotech drugs, for instance.

Meanwhile, drug companies should be allowed to get on with the tough task of developing new drugs and fixing their businesses. They've got a lot of work to do. With price pressures rising around the world and blockbuster drugs going off patent, they need to figure out how to cut costs without sacrificing the critical research that leads to lifesaving cures.

It's in everyone's interest they succeed. The pharmaceutical industry's bad bedside manner has earned it a lot of enemies. But its lifesaving and life-enhancing products should make it many more friends.

Healthy Industry In Medicaid, Private HMOs Take A Big, And Profitable, Role (WSJ)

By Barbara Martinez

Some 55 million poor and disabled Americans are covered by Medicaid. With an annual price tag topping $300 billion, it's among the biggest government programs around.

It's also a lucrative business for some private companies that act as middlemen between the government and patients. Instead of directly paying the bills when a Medicaid patient goes to the doctor, state governments increasingly outsource the job to private contractors. More than one in three Medicaid beneficiaries now receive care through a private insurer.

The potential gains are big. Four years ago, a private-equity fund in which George Soros was the largest investor took a 70% stake in WellCare Health Plans Inc., a leading Medicaid health-maintenance organization. The fund finished cashing out the stake this August, bringing in a total of $870 million for an investment that originally cost $220 million.

Four of the biggest Medicaid HMOs -- WellCare, Centene Corp., Molina Healthcare Inc. and Amerigroup Corp. -- have seen their shares surge on the New York Stock Exchange over the past few years, although prices of the latter three have been volatile. WellCare's stock price has tripled since it began trading in July 2004, bringing the value of stock and options held by its chief executive, Todd S. Farha, to $77 million.

The companies are growing fast. Centene boasts nearly 1.2 million members and posted $1.5 billion in revenue last year. That compares with 142,000 members and $200 million in revenue six years earlier.

With the growth has come criticism from some doctors and patients who accuse Medicaid HMOs of scrimping on care. Even as they restrict medical tests and use of prescription drugs, the companies spend the money they get from states on items that don't have an obvious connection to patients. Centene has funded a multimillion-dollar arts center in St. Louis and paid to put its name on stadiums in Montana and Missouri. The HMOs are also big donors to political campaigns.

Executives say their profits are justly earned and don't come at patients' expense. Traditional Medicaid is a fee-for-service program: The government pays each medical bill the patient racks up, with little or no effort to manage the costs. Medicaid HMOs, like other HMOs, seek to save money by eliminating unnecessary care and paying for preventive treatments. Centene Chief Executive Michael Neidorff says the company sometimes gives free child-safety car seats to pregnant women who attend all of their prenatal exams. "We save millions" by preventing premature births, he says.

Mr. Neidorff earned $1.85 million in salary and bonus last year and as of the end of last year held restricted stock valued at $26 million. The company also recorded $135,547 last year in compensation for Mr. Neidorff representing the value of personal trips he took on the corporate jet, a Bombardier Challenger that features an espresso machine on board, according to the lease agreement.

Centene spokesman Robert Schenk declined to say how much the company pays to lease the jet. He said the jet is needed because many of Centene's operations are hard to reach by commercial carriers, and the company's board requires Mr. Neidorff to use corporate transportation even on personal travel to ensure that he is secure and accessible.

Centene's business is managing the care of patients such as Melissa Bishop, 39 years old, of Phillipsburg, N.J. When she needed radiation for cancer near her pancreas this summer, she called Centene, her Medicaid HMO. She says she tried three facilities suggested by the company, but none of them were part of Centene's plan. "I was going round and round and round," says Ms. Bishop. "I was getting so aggravated."

After she got an appointment at a fourth place, an administrator there told her it didn't accept her plan either. The administrator, Barbara Tofani of Hunterdon Regional Cancer Center in Flemington, N.J., says she called a dozen other centers in the region and struck out every time. Finally, Ms. Tofani called Centene and negotiated an ad-hoc deal to cover Ms. Bishop's treatment, although Ms. Tofani says the center will be lucky to break even.

Andrew Greenberg, Ms. Bishop's radiation oncologist, says that if it hadn't been for the special effort, "Melissa would have gotten lost in the system." Centene didn't provide comment on Ms. Bishop's case.

Each state runs its own Medicaid program but the majority of funding generally comes from the federal government. When states sign up HMOs to manage care, they often calculate what they would spend on Medicaid patients directly and pay the HMOs a per-patient premium below that amount. Florida, for instance, sets its HMO premium rates about 8% below what it would cost the state. WellCare, a big operator in Florida, says it saves the state $75 million a year. HMOs have an incentive to keep their costs under the premium because they keep the difference as profit.

After several years of spiraling growth in Medicaid costs, there's some evidence that the tide is turning, although it's unclear how much HMOs have contributed. Total Medicaid spending grew in fiscal 2006 by just 2.8%, according to a report last month by the Kaiser Commission on Medicaid and the Uninsured. That was the lowest rate of growth since 1996. The commission said that for the first time in years many states aren't feeling pressure to cut people off Medicaid rolls.

Are Medicaid HMOs slashing necessary care to achieve cost savings and raise profits? Yes, says Jerry Flanagan, health-care policy director of a California group that wants to stop state governments from moving Medicaid beneficiaries into private managed care. "What's good for shareholders is bad for patients," he says. "What's really happening is we're giving less money for far, far fewer services."

Private companies "deliver a good-quality product at a reasonable price," counters Ruben Jose King-Shaw Jr., a former top federal Medicaid and Medicare official who joined WellCare's board in 2003. He notes that states often require private HMOs to achieve high rates of vaccination and other quality standards that weren't met when bureaucrats did all the work. Mr. King-Shaw, whose final annual salary in government was $142,500, has sold WellCare shares for $1.8 million. He owns shares and options valued at an additional $1.5 million. "You only do well in health care if you deliver value," he says.

States began experimenting with using managed care for Medicaid patients in the early 1980s, and the idea took off in the 1990s. Now many states are moving aggressively to put more Medicaid patients in HMOs. Last month, Ohio chose the winning bidders to provide Medicaid HMO services to 120,000 of the state's aged, blind and disabled population -- a group that traditionally hasn't been placed in HMOs.

When states run their own Medicaid programs, they spend on average 4% to 6% on administrative costs, according to Martha Roherty, director of the National Association of State Medicaid Directors. The rest -- 94% to 96% -- goes to paying for medical care. At Medicaid HMOs, only 80% to 85% of premium dollars generally go for medical costs. The rest covers other costs -- including executive compensation, entertainment and political contributions -- or becomes profit for shareholders.

States monitor the profit margins of Medicaid HMOs, which are generally reported as 5% or less. State officials say that with such a thin margin there's little room for further savings, although a review in New Jersey questioned whether one HMO was overcharging its subsidiary in the state for services. That could make the subsidiary's profits look lower.

While they spend fewer dollars on medical care, companies say they are more efficient and improve the health of patients. Elizabeth Douglas of Chicago says her 11-year-old son has kept up on his immunizations thanks to a WellCare program that gives her a free ride to the doctor's office.

Some patients and doctors have a different view. Kuldeep Singh, an internist in Valdosta, Ga., says that when Georgia began to move more than a million Medicaid recipients into HMOs this year, he suddenly faced hurdles not imposed by regular Medicaid. Recently, he says, one of his assistants had to wait on hold to get approval from WellCare for a hospital chest X-ray on a patient suspected of having pneumonia. "It was ridiculous," says Dr. Singh. A spokesman for WellCare says it sometimes requires such approval because hospital-based X-rays cost two to three times as much as those done in a doctor's office or imaging center.

Many doctors refuse to take patients in Medicaid HMOs because reimbursements are so low. (The same problem occurs in traditional Medicaid.) Noha Polack, a pediatrician in Union City, N.J., has an arrangement under which Centene pays her a fixed monthly sum per child to handle basic medical needs. Until a few months ago, that sum was $11.50 per month, equal to $138 a year -- about half of what other Medicaid insurers pay, says Dr. Polack. A child who had a few colds or scrapes during a year would quickly put her in the red.

Dr. Polack threatened to drop all her Centene patients and recently got a raise -- the amount of which is confidential, she says -- but she still stopped accepting new Centene patients.

The HMO is stingy about drugs that others approve with little question, says Dr. Polack, naming the antibiotic Ceftin as an example. "Many times we have to make treatment decisions not depending on what would be best for the patient but what the patient can afford," she says. While she could ask for an exception to use Ceftin, "they are so notorious for not getting back to you" and there's little time when a child has an infection, she says.

Vickie Vickers, a 39-year-old Trenton, N.J., single mother on disability and Medicaid, learned about the difficulty of finding a doctor this year. She hurt her hand on Mother's Day while stooping to pick up playing cards that fell on the floor. She went to the hospital for a temporary cast but spent weeks with Centene trying to find an orthopedic doctor.

She finally found one an hour away. She says the orthopedist told her she needed an MRI or CT scan, but Centene wouldn't approve it. It took until late June for an orthopedist to fit her with a splint with metal bars.

Ms. Vickers rents a house in a run-down part of Trenton with a rusty fence outside and a leaky roof that has caused big water stains in the attic, bedroom, bathroom and kitchen. She wishes the old Medicaid were back because in the 1990s "you didn't have to call 50 doctors" to get an appointment.

Centene didn't provide comment on the complaints by Dr. Polack and Ms. Vickers.

Research on the quality of care in Medicaid HMOs is thin. A study of infant health last year by researchers at the University of Illinois-Chicago and the Urban Institute found that Medicaid managed care was correlated with a slight increase in inadequate prenatal care in some women but in general showed little difference from traditional Medicaid.

While some doctors and patients complain of Centene's stinginess, the company has been generous in regions where it has offices. Centene last year was the biggest donor for a $9.5 million renovation of an arts building in St. Louis, now called the Centene Center for Arts and Education, according to a spokeswoman for the center. The company paid $200,000 last year for the naming rights of a minor-league baseball stadium in Montana, where Centene employs 100 claims processors but doesn't have Medicaid clients. Centene also pledged $400,000 this year to the school district in Clayton, Mo., where the company has its headquarters, to rename the district's stadium.

Cynthia Schultz, director of the Great Falls International Airport in Montana, says Mr. Neidorff, the Centene CEO, once walked through the airport and heard that it couldn't afford artwork. Centene then commissioned and donated a $7,000 welded-metal sculpture of an eagle with a 16-foot wingspan that now hangs prominently in the airport, she says. The company confirmed the donation. "It's a great gift from someone who doesn't even live here," says Ms. Schultz.

Mr. Schenk, the Centene spokesman, said the donations show Centene is a "responsible and publicly focused corporation" and they help make the communities better places to live.

A few big U.S. insurers that serve large employers, including UnitedHealth Group and WellPoint Inc., also compete in the Medicaid HMO market. Many others don't. Medicaid HMOs assemble doctor networks in places with many people on Medicaid -- such as big cities and poor rural areas -- and deal with a single kind of customer, state governments. Those skills "are importantly different than what most commercial insurers have," says John W. Rowe, the former chief executive at Aetna Inc. and now a professor at Columbia University.

Medicaid HMOs have donated to candidates in state political races who support their existence. In 2005, five WellCare subsidiaries together donated $125,000 to Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich, a Democrat who won re-election this month. WellCare has 92,000 members in Illinois.

This year, 20 WellCare subsidiaries each donated the legal maximum of $500 to the campaign of Republican Tom Lee, who was narrowly defeated in his bid to become chief financial officer of Florida, WellCare's biggest market. WellCare donated $34,000 to the Republican Governors Association this year and contributed $100,000 to President Bush's second inaugural festivities in 2005.

"I call a governor, I usually get a call back within 24 to 48 hours," says Centene's Mr. Neidorff.

States keep track of the finances of Medicaid HMOs to ensure that the HMOs are spending a sufficient part of their revenue on medical costs. However, the numbers are subject to interpretation. A review of Centene's New Jersey subsidiary in 2004, by a unit of Marsh & McLennan Cos., said hundreds of thousands of dollars that Centene counted as medical costs should have been considered administrative costs.

The report also questioned cases where Centene's New Jersey subsidiary pays a national Centene subsidiary for specialized services such as mental-health or a nurse hotline. It said the New Jersey subsidiary was paying an above-market rate for some of these services. That would tend to increase the state subsidiary's medical costs and reduce its profit, without affecting the bottom line of Centene as a whole. Mr. Schenk of Centene declined to discuss the report in detail but said Centene has used the findings "to strengthen its operational efficiencies."

In Illinois, the state and the Justice Department asserted in a lawsuit that Amerigroup spent only $131 million on medical care from 2000 to 2004 despite taking in $243 million from the state. The lawsuit accused Amerigroup of fraudulently trying to exclude pregnant and sick patients to reduce its medical costs. A jury in Illinois state court agreed last month, finding Amerigroup liable to the government for $144 million. Internal Amerigroup emails filed in court show managers contemplated disciplinary action for employees who signed up women in the third trimester.

Amerigroup said it will appeal. The company says it discouraged transfers by pregnant women so their care wouldn't be disrupted. A spokesman said the figures in the suit are "extremely misleading," in part because they don't account for preventive health programs.

A Lame-Duck Revival For Postal Service Overhaul? (WP)

Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) said yesterday that she is not giving up on legislation that would overhaul the U.S. Postal Service and will try to win approval of the bill next month during the lame-duck session.

Collins said she has met with the chief Democratic sponsor, Sen. Thomas R. Carper (Del.), and has talked with White House officials about how to revive the bill. Various proposals are being discussed by mailers and others to see whether modifications can be made to get the bill moving, she said.

Still, Collins said, "I'm not optimistic I will be successful."

The Senate bill stalled in late September when the National Association of Letter Carriers objected to a relatively minor provision that would require a three-day waiting period before injured postal workers could begin drawing workers' compensation benefits.

The union said any workers' compensation changes should apply to all of the federal workforce, not just postal employees. The objection derailed Collins's effort just as the bill appeared to be nearing Senate approval.

"I'm still stunned that the bill did not pass," Collins said in an interview.

The letter carriers union has said it will not drop its objection to the bill, even though Collins got the White House to drop proposals that unions had claimed were dealbreakers, such as forcing injured postal workers into retirement rather than letting them continue to collect higher workers' compensation benefits.

The bill would resolve some multibillion-dollar funding issues for the U.S. Postal Service, link postage increases to a consumer price index, set up an expedited rate-setting process and provide enhanced discounts to big mailers that take over some postal work.

Collins, in what many of the largest mailers consider a big victory, got the White House to sign off on changes that would permit military pensions earned by postal workers to be paid out of the Treasury. This means the pensions' costs would not be passed on to mailers in the form of higher rates. The White House also agreed to use an escrow fund to finance future postal retiree health-care benefits.

Congress created the escrow fund in 2003 after learning that the Postal Service had been ordered to pay too much into a retirement trust fund. Postal payments into the fund, if unchecked, would grow to $105 billion by 2071. Unlocking the fund could add to the federal deficit, according to budget rules.

"I just find it inconceivable that the unions and mailers and other affected parties would walk away from a proposal that would put billions of dollars on the table," Collins said.

Even if a new bill could regain the union's support and keep the White House on board, the revised bill has to pass the House.

Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), who has worked on versions of the bill, has expressed concerns about whether Congress should dictate a rate-setting formula, which he worries might lead the post office to reduce services in tight economic times. Waxman also wants to ensure that mailer discounts do not become sweetheart deals. House GOP conservatives, meanwhile, are afraid that the postal bill might shift some costs to taxpayers, making it harder to reduce the federal deficit.

Despite his concerns, Waxman supports a postal overhaul and thinks it is worth a lame-duck effort to resolve differences, an aide said.

"This is the year," Collins said. Without congressional action next month, she said, "I fear it will never pass."Mansfield Fellowships

Federal employees with a strong career interest in U.S.-Japan relations may attend an information session Nov. 22 on how to apply for a Mike Mansfield fellowship.

The fellowships include a year of full-time language training and a year working in Japanese government offices. After completing the program, fellows return to their federal agencies. The application deadline is April 2.

Aye, Spy (NYT)

By John Deutch

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

Cambridge, Mass.

PRESIDENT BUSH salvaged what for him was an otherwise dismal week by nominating Robert Gates to be secretary of defense. Mr. Gates is an experienced Washington hand with the right temperament to change the administration's thinking about our mission in Iraq and to make much-needed long-term changes in how we defend our nation.

Some critics point out that Mr. Gates spent most of his career in C.I.A.'s intelligence directorate, and question whether that background is appropriate for the Pentagon job. Well, as somebody who has served at both institutions, I can't think of any better pedigree. C.I.A. intelligence analysts are dedicated to giving an objective estimate of what is really happening to policymakers who are often invested in particular outcomes. This sort of neutral mind-set is just what President Bush needs and the country expects.

The big question he must answer on Iraq is this: Are we making progress toward meeting our minimum objectives — helping the Iraqis maintain security, establishing a working government and restoring basic services? If the answer is no, as I suspect, then Mr. Gates should tell the president that it is time to withdraw. Better sooner than later to avoid more lives lost and more treasure spent.

Contrary to conventional wisdom on both sides of the aisle, the consequences of withdrawal need not be catastrophic to American interests in the region. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice; the national security adviser, Steve Hadley; and Mr. Gates need to develop a secondary track, simultaneous with a military withdrawal, centered on new economic and diplomatic initiatives in the Middle East to re-establish America's credibility and purpose.

In particular, we must take a new approach to Iran: its actions can encourage or dampen civil violence in Iraq, its oil exports are important to world supply and its uranium enrichment program puts it on a path to a nuclear bomb. Two years ago, Mr. Gates and the national security adviser in the Carter administration, Zbigniew Brzezinski, led a Council on Foreign Relations committee that recommended a more active approach to Iran centered on a "compartmentalized process of dialogue, confidence building and incremental engagement." Mr. Gates's work on the committee demonstrated his pragmatic approach to foreign policy and his ability to work effectively with those of differing ideologies.

Yes, there is an aspect of irony in having a former intelligence director become secretary of defense after the Iraqi weapons-of-mass-destruction intelligence failure was used to justify our 2003 invasion. And it is also true that the cultures of the C.I.A. and the Pentagon are very different. But Mr. Gates would not be the first top director of central intelligence to become secretary of defense. James Schlesinger moved from the intelligence directorship to the Pentagon in the 1970s, and he is remembered for his fierce independence from the White House.

Of course, there will be much more on the new secretary's plate than just Iraq. First, I hope that Mr. Gates will quickly re-establish the trusting relationship with senior military leaders — the chairman the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the heads of the combat and supporting joint commands — that was the hallmark of Secretary of Defense William Perry's successful tenure in the 1990s.

Next year's Pentagon budget, at greater than $530 billion, is giving Congress sticker shock. Down the road, modernization costs will only increase and there will be a large bill to pay to "reset" the Army and Marine Corps readiness and equipment to acceptable levels after we leave Iraq.

Mr. Gates is well suited for making his case to Congress. He is not, however, a technology or acquisitions expert, and he will need to listen to others in establishing a sound and affordable multiyear program to reshape the military to meet today's threats.

Perhaps nobody is better suited than Mr. Gates for reforming the military's intelligence operations. The revamping of the government's intelligence community in 2004 has been a mixed success. One important shortcoming is the Defense Department's continued use of its considerable intelligence budget to run its programs in isolation from the other intelligence agencies.

Mr. Gates surely understands the need to integrate the military's intelligence operations with those of other agencies. The Pentagon should stop competing with other agencies over collection and dissemination of information, and become more of an informed user of intelligence gathered by the multiagency intelligence community.

Last, a few will raise questions, based on Mr. Gates's involvement in the Iran-contra affair, about his ability to control covert operations. In this, I have full confidence in Mr. Gates's judgment. When I was the C.I.A. chief, my job was made easier by the way Mr. Gates had structured the partnership between the directorate of operations and the directorate of intelligence during his tenure in order to ensure that operations were launched only after disciplined analytic thinking of consequences.

To President Bush, for his choice of Robert Gates, I say "bravo," a word I'll bet he has not heard a lot recently. Congress should confirm the nominee promptly, thank him for his willingness to serve, and tell him we expect great results.

Earmarks Are Efficient (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0094587

By John Culberson

USA Today, November 15, 2006

As a dedicated fiscal conservative who is committed to the Republican principles of limited government and a balanced budget, I believe "earmarks" can help ensure our tax dollars are spent effectively.

Every year, members of Congress are approached by dozens of constituent groups ranging from schools, hospitals, non-profits, city and state governments to the private sector requesting funding for projects or programs. Because members have a strong grasp on the needs of their districts, it is safe to assume they know which projects deserve federal support. Without earmarks, thousands of groundbreaking medical, science, energy and defense projects, along with critical infrastructure investments for flood control and highways, would go unfunded.

As elected and accountable representatives of the American people, members should set high standards for carefully selecting which projects receive federal funding. Personally, my starting answer is "no" on all spending requests, and "yes" has to be earned. I will approve an earmark only if it is absolutely essential and fits within the federal government's limited responsibilities. I proudly publish all my earmarks and my request letters to the Appropriations Committee on my website.

Eliminating earmarks will not save taxpayers money because the invisible bureaucracy will simply spend it. Earmarks are simply a way of directing budgeted money to specific projects. Instead of concentrating solely on earmarks, which account for about 1% of all federal spending, Congress must reform entitlement programs, which are the real source of annual deficits.

Any debate over meaningful budget reform should start with a Balanced Budget Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Forty-nine states already have some form of a constitutional requirement for a balanced budget. We also need to create a deficit reduction account where all spending cuts can be deposited to help balance the budget.

"Earmark" has become a bad word because a few members have abused the system, but that does not mean Congress should surrender its constitutional authority to direct federal spending to unelected bureaucrats who rarely step foot outside of Washington.

Rep. John Culberson, R-Texas, serves on the House Appropriations Committee.

The District Deserves A Vote (WP)

By Adrian Fenty

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

Last Tuesday Americans across the country flooded their polling places and voted for far-reaching change in our national legislature. Whether it was the war in Iraq or such issues as national security, education, health care and the environment, Americans sent a clear message with their votes that it's time for change.

But the nearly 600,000 Americans living in the District of Columbia were forced to sit on the sidelines and watch as the rest of the nation elected our new Congress. With no voting member of Congress to elect, Washingtonians were again denied participation in American democracy.

As the newly elected mayor of Washington, D.C., I'm concerned about the important issues facing the people of the District. I'm concerned about the families unable to afford health care or housing. I'm concerned about the parents grieving over the loss of daughters and sons in Afghanistan and Iraq. I'm concerned about the children who are being left behind in schools. And I'm outraged that D.C. residents have no vote in the Congress that will decide how to handle these challenges.

At the top of Congress's agenda right now should be this important part of its unfinished business: enactment of H.R. 5388, the D.C. Voting Rights Act. This legislation would give voting representation in the House of Representatives to D.C. residents for the first time ever. Passage of the bill is a key component of our plan to turn the District into a world-class capital.

The legislation provides D.C. residents with a vote in the House of Representatives while providing Utah with an additional congressional seat. Utah was the next state in line to receive an additional representative after the last census. H.R. 5388 has bipartisan support and is vote-neutral. We are working closely with Utah Gov. Jon Huntsman to negotiate a fair compromise that benefits the people of Utah and the District of Columbia.

In September I sat alongside Mayor Anthony Williams and members of the D.C. Council at a House Judiciary subcommittee hearing on the D.C. Voting Rights Act. I listened as every witness and lawmaker present agreed that denying a vote in Congress to citizens living in Washington is a problem that must be fixed. We have made considerable progress in advancing this bill, and we are presented with a window of opportunity to correct the injustice by the end of this year.

The D.C. Voting Rights Act is backed by constitutional experts such as Kenneth Starr and Patricia Wald, who, as legal scholars, understand that the District clause of the Constitution gives Congress the power to provide representation for Washingtonians.

I look forward to working with Congress on a number of additional reform issues, including budget and legislative autonomy and a transformation of the public school system. Let us begin that partnership by taking a step toward strengthening our nation's capital.

I urge Congress to pass this bill swiftly so that President Bush can sign it into law this year. America is the only democracy in the world that denies voting representation to the people of its capital. That needs to end right now.

I am humbled by the strong support of D.C. residents who share my vision of a world-class capital. We are not alone. I have traveled across the country meeting with mayors in America's greatest cities who share our frustration and our hope for bringing representation to our nation's capital. Achieving full and equal participation in our democracy is essential to working toward that vision. We need voting representation in Congress and control of our own affairs to help move our city forward.

As American citizens, we deserve full and equal representation in both the House and Senate. The D.C. Voting Rights Act moves us toward equality. Give Washingtonians a vote in the House. We deserve more -- but certainly no less.

Que CIRA, CIRA . . . (WSJ)

By Robert C. Pozen

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

Democrats and Republicans agree that Americans need to save more for retirement -- our personal savings rate has dropped to an all-time low. Despite numerous legislative programs to lure employers into offering retirement plans, many still have not taken up the bait. Today, almost 30 million full-time employees -- 25% of the full-time work force -- are not offered a retirement plan at work.

So what can be done to promote retirement savings for these 30 million workers? Legally, if employees are not offered a workplace retirement plan, they can establish an individual retirement account (IRA) -- regardless of their income level. However, only a small portion of these employees have enrolled. Although employees usually say they want to save more for retirement, most cannot overcome inertia to open an account. By contrast, if an employer takes retirement contributions out of their employees' paychecks, most employees will stay in the plan -- i.e., they will not opt out. In one study, the participation rate increased to 92% from 66% in opt-out plans relative to opt-in plans, with even larger increases for low-income workers.

A bipartisan Congress should harness these forces of inertia and mandate that all employers not otherwise offering a retirement plan establish a check-off IRA (CIRA) for employees. An employer could take out a minimum percentage (e.g., 3%) of their employees' wages from their paychecks, tax deductible in the year of contribution. But employees would have 60 days from their enrollment date to increase their contribution rate, or to opt out completely of any payroll deduction. The employer utilizing this auto-enrollment approach would be protected from legal liability by a safe harbor, if the employer followed specified procedures and provided specified disclosures.

Similarly, those payroll deductions would be presumptively invested in a balanced fund -- with 50% in a diversified stock fund and 50% in a high-quality bond fund. Again employees would have 60 days from their enrollment date to opt out of the balanced fund by choosing from a slate of investment alternatives -- a diversified stock fund, diversified bond fund, a money market fund or bank deposit. If the CIRA offered these four funds, its sponsor also would be legally protected by another safe harbor.

While the CIRA would increase retirement savings by workers with relatively low self-discipline, it would not be unduly burdensome on small employers -- the bulk of firms without retirement plans. Small employers (those with under 100 employees) would not be required to make any contribution to a CIRA, nor would they have to satisfy the complex IRS tests for anti-discrimination. Instead, they would be required only to connect their payroll system to a qualifying financial institution offering a

CIRA, involving minimal administrative costs. Nevertheless, Congress might choose to exempt employers with fewer than five or 10 employees, because many of these do not have an outside payroll service or computerized payroll program.

By contrast, if a larger employer (with 100 or more employees) chose to adopt a CIRA rather than a 401(k) plan, that large employer should additionally be required to make a reasonable contribution to the CIRA accounts of its participating employees -- for instance, a 50% match of annual contributions by full-time employees up to 6% of wages (a maximum match of 3%). To smooth the transition for growing companies, this matching requirement could be limited to employers with 100 or more employees for three consecutive years. Furthermore, since this matching requirement is similar to the new safe harbor for meeting the anti-discrimination tests in 401(k) plans -- but slightly lower for simplicity's sake, any larger employer contributing such matches to a CIRA should also be deemed to have met the antidiscrimination tests.

Without this additional requirement, larger employers could drop their 401(k) plans in favor of CIRAs in order to avoid making any retirement contributions. The creation of the CIRA should not be an excuse for a larger employer to stop helping its employees save for their retirement; rather, the CIRA is a device to encourage workplace savings by shifting most functions to a financial institution. This is the only way to ensure that the minority of larger employers, who have resisted years of government incentives to offer retirement plans, contribute their fair share to boosting retirement savings.

Many financial institutions would be ready to offer a CIRA for modest or no fees if the procedures were streamlined and the investments included funds managed by that institution. Monthly payroll deductions, say, could be limited to full-time employees who had worked for the same employer for at least one year, and the default investment could be a balanced fund run by the institution handling those deductions. Moreover, no loans from CIRAs, and no pre-retirement withdrawals for college tuition or first homes, would be permitted.

If employees with a CIRA switched jobs, they could transfer their monies to the retirement plan of their new employer. If employees with a CIRA were terminated, they could stay in the same CIRA or make a tax-free transfer of their CIRA amounts to a rollover IRA. If employees with a CIRA retired, they could make a tax-free transfer to a rollover IRA, or withdraw their CIRA balances subject to withholding taxes.

The CIRA would assure that almost all full-time workers would have access to a tax-advantaged retirement plan, with enrollment and investment procedures designed to make it likely that they would actually save for retirement.

Will Fair Pay Have Its Day? (NYT)

At his first post-election news conference last week, President Bush said that he believed he could find common ground with the new Congress on Democrats' longstanding drive to raise the federal minimum wage. That is welcome, but long overdue. The minimum wage has been stuck at a miserly $5.15 an hour since 1997, with Republican lawmakers blocking repeated attempts since then to raise it. Adjusted for inflation, the purchasing power of the wage has dropped to its lowest level since 1955.

Clearly, the bottom is falling out for the nation's estimated 5.6 million minimum-wage workers. That's bad for the economy. Even Wal-Mart, not exactly an advocate for high wages, favors raising the minimum wage to support consumer spending.

A too-low minimum wage is also bad for society. One reason for having a minimum wage is to help ensure that even the lowest-paid workers do not fall irretrievably behind everyone else. Without a higher wage, that goal is increasingly out of reach.

For most Americans, the economic growth of the Bush era has not translated into improved wages, greater financial security, better health care coverage or other measures of a rising standard of living. But Mr. Bush has never offered corrective policies. As for the minimum wage, he has echoed the perennial Republican warning that raising it could force businesses that can't meet the payroll to lay off workers. Persuasive and copious research on the issue disputes that assertion.

This summer, in perhaps the lowest blow, Republican lawmakers scuttled the most recent effort to raise the minimum wage by linking it to yet another huge estate-tax cut for America's wealthiest families, one of Mr. Bush's most cherished goals.

Come December, the minimum wage will have remained unchanged for the longest period since it was established in 1938. There are no valid reasons to delay an increase, and many good ones to proceed. Supporting a higher minimum wage would be a way for Mr. Bush to begin to rectify the inequality that has grown so alarmingly on his watch.

Fargonomics (WSJ)

Kent Conrad's Web site proclaims that the North Dakota Democrat "has been a leading voice for fiscal responsibility" in Washington, and the Senator rarely misses an opportunity to bemoan "deficits as far as the eye can see." Maybe once Mr. Conrad comes off his latest spending binge, he can buy the rest of Washington some binoculars.

Or at least enough magnifying eyewear to see $4.9 billion, which is the amount of emergency drought relief the parsimonious Mr. Conrad is attempting to shovel into a Senate military construction bill in this week's lame duck session. If this is the sort of "fiscal discipline" we can expect from the new Democratic majority, K Street ought to be popping the champagne corks.

Farm-state Senators have been pushing for this handout for months, and the only good news is that they've modestly scaled back their demands. Nebraska Democrat Ben Nelson had offered a $6.5 billion "relief" amendment to the port security bill in September. But Republicans said farm aid wasn't germane to port security -- no kidding -- and Mr. Nelson failed to get a vote. The GOP ought to do the same with this latest spending extravaganza, while it still has the power to do so.

Mr. Conrad is calling his amendment "emergency" spending, and it is true that the Plains states and Texas endured a drought this summer. But the government already provides a safety net for such events: crop insurance. That federal program was created with the express purpose of eliminating the need for emergency bailouts. The vast majority of U.S. insurable crops are covered by the program, including 98% of North Dakota's.

And don't forget federal farm subsidies. Last year alone, farmers pocketed $20.2 billion worth of commodity program payments and conservation money. North Dakota (since we're on the subject) was the recipient of more than $1 billion, much of which goes to a handful of large agribusinesses.

Mr. Conrad's spending enthusiasm also comes when the farm industry is doing well. Last year marked the second-highest net farm income on record. While some crops, such as wheat, have been hurt by the drought, the nation's biggest crops -- corn and soybeans -- are on track for a bumper year. Prices are also strong, in no small part because the government is mandating use of corn-based ethanol. Drought aid on top of all this amounts to quadruple dipping at the taxpayer trough.

September's "emergency" drought bills were also stuffed with the usual Member goodies that have little to do with lack of rain. Mr. Nelson's previous bill would have given farmers $1.6 billion for high energy and fertilizer costs. Other proposals included $6 million for Hawaii sugarcane growers, $2 million for cattle herds with bovine tuberculosis, and $6 million for a flood-prone region in (of course) North Dakota. Mr. Conrad's latest bill, meanwhile, would set up a new $300 million small-business economic-loss "block grant" program that has as much chance of disappearing in the future as Christmas.

The Bush Administration has tried to keep a lid on this largesse, while helping in targeted ways. The Agriculture Department sped up some $700 million in countercyclical payments, and also provided $50 million to livestock producers hurt by the drought. As for legislation, some Republicans have reasonably demanded that any money given out in emergency farm payments be offset with reductions elsewhere in the farm budget. Mr. Conrad and his allies have refused, claiming this is an emergency on the level of Hurricane Katrina.

Which gets to the heart of the farm problem. Americans are generous to neighbors in need, but ballooning farm subsidies and industry resistance to any reform have shown this to be a one-sided affair. As for Mr. Conrad: Meet the new spenders, same as the old spenders.

Redistricting Reconsidered (WP)

IT WOULD BE easy for those complacent about partisan redistricting to look at this year's election as evidence that it's not a problem after all. Gerrymandering of congressional district lines failed to protect a number of incumbents around the country from defeat. It didn't prevent the House of Representatives from switching hands. Maybe letting politicians use sophisticated computers to choose their own voters actually calcifies the American electoral system less than the past few elections have suggested.

The election this year was dramatically more competitive than others in recent history. According to data from the Center for Voting and Democracy, 34 House races were decided by a margin of fewer than 5 percentage points, more than in 2002 and 2004 combined. An additional 26 were decided by fewer than 10 percentage points, compared with 28 in the past two elections combined. The reason for the change is simple: Voters were angry at Republicans. And while partisan redistricting can make red districts redder and blue districts bluer, it cannot stop either from going purple as a party fails to persuade its own voters or get them to show up at the polls.

But don't let these numbers fool you. The overwhelming majority of seats remained beyond serious democratic competition -- as always. Three hundred and seventeen seats were decided by margins of greater than 20 points, 95 of them by more than 40 points. In 55 races, candidates of one major party faced no opposition from the other major party. In other words, this year's competitiveness is only comparative. For most members, incumbency still offered surefire protection from voter dissatisfaction. And the power of incumbency undoubtedly protected Republicans from further losses. Of the closest races in which incumbents hung on to win, only two, at most, involved Democratic incumbents scraping by, both in Georgia. The rest were all Republicans, several of whom clearly benefited from the way the lines had been drawn after the 2000 Census.

Partisan redistricting is not the only -- or even the principal -- factor shielding incumbents from electoral accountability. Even districts drawn in an apolitical fashion will tend to have stronger ideological centers of gravity than one might imagine. And incumbents also benefit from fundraising advantages and the ability to bring home pork. But redistricting adds to all of that a measure of simple cheating to make challenges more difficult. The party in power in a given state gets to shield its own officeholders and burn the other side's, or the parties can jointly conspire to protect virtually all incumbents. As this election shows, it doesn't always work completely. America is not a Soviet republic. But even at their most competitive, House races are far from models of electoral accountability.

Stocks Surge On Fed Official's Comments (AP)

By Madlen Read

AP, November 15, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) - Wall Street rebounded sharply Tuesday, with the Dow Jones industrials surging further into record territory after a Federal Reserve official indicated the Fed will maintain its policy of stable interest rates.

Investors who were heartened by an earlier report of slowing wholesale inflation were cheered by comments from Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis President William Poole, who described the Fed's interest rate policy as "about right." Poole, who currently sits on the Fed's policy-making Open Market Committee, reassured a market that has been counting on a steady rate policy for the near future.

Earlier, the Labor Department said wholesale inflation as measured by the Producer Price Index dropped by 1.6 percent last month following a 1.3 percent slide in September. Plunging energy prices were behind the declines, which gave Wall Street some relief from concerns that rising inflation might prompt the Fed to raise rates after three straight meetings where they were left unchanged.

In late afternoon trading, the Dow Jones industrial average rose 93.09, or 0.77 percent, to 12,224.97. Blue chips hit a trading high of 12,228.01, putting them on track to finish above the closing high of 12,176.54 reached Wednesday.

The Nasdaq composite index rose 3.46, or 0.14 percent, to 2,409.84.

Bonds rose on the inflation news, with the yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note falling to 4.57 percent from 4.59 percent late Monday. The dollar rose against other major currencies, while gold prices slipped.

Before Poole's comments, investors sifted through economic reports, which also included a second straight monthly drop in retail sales during October. The 0.2 percent decline reported by the Commerce Department report reflected the 25 percent drop in crude oil prices since mid-July rather than a weakness in consumer spending. The drop in sales was also smaller than expected.

The market was initially unnerved by a disappointing earnings report at Home Depot Inc. (HD), which raised concerns about the toll that slowing home sales is taking on other industries. Home Depot rose $1, or 2.8 percent, to $37.40, after posting a 3.1 percent third-quarter profit drop on a sharp decline in same-store sales, those from stores open at least a year.

"There's a sense that the housing market has bottomed," said Jay Suskind, head trader at Ryan Beck & Co.

Meanwhile, Wal-Mart Stores Inc. (WMT) rose $1.43, or 3.1 percent, to $47.75, after reporting third-quarter earnings rose 11.5 percent despite weak growth in U.S. sales. The world's largest discount retailer promised its most aggressive holiday discounts ever to boost year-end business.

Discounter Target Corp. rose $1.02, or 1.8 percent, to $58.78, after it beat analysts' projections with an 11 percent rise in sales.

D.R. Horton Inc. climbed $2.10, or 9.4 percent, to $24.48 after its third-quarter results surpassed analysts' expectations. Still, the homebuilder's profit tumbled 51 percent on falling sales, reflecting a bleak housing market.

The performance of the stock market going forward will depend largely on whether the economic data released later this week - including the Consumer Price Index, housing starts and industrial production - come in strong or weak.

"There's been a subtle change from investors ignoring bad economic news to now finally paying attention to it," said Alexander Paris, economist and market analyst for Chicago-based Barrington Research.

The Russell 2000 index of smaller companies rose 8.55, or 1.11 percent, to 780.96.

Advancing issues outnumbered decliners on the New York Stock Exchange, where volume was 9.8 billion shares.

Overseas, Japan's Nikkei stock average closed up 1.11 percent. In late trading, Britain's FTSE 100 closed down 0.12 percent, Germany's DAX index was down 0.10 percent, and France's CAC-40 closed down 0.26 percent.

Fed Policy 'About Right,' Official Says; Investors Send Dow To Record High (WP)

NEW YORK, Nov. 14 -- Wall Street barreled yet higher Tuesday, with the Dow Jones industrial average surging further into record territory after a Federal Reserve official indicated the Fed would maintain its policy of stable interest rates.

The Dow rose 86.13, or 0.71 percent, to close at 12,218.01, above the previous record close of 12,176.54 set Nov. 8. The blue chips also reached a new trading high of 12,228.01. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 8.80, or 0.64 percent, to 1393.22. It hit a trading high of 1394.49, the first time the S&P 500 surpassed 1394 since November 2000. The Nasdaq composite index rose 24.28, or 1.01 percent, to 2430.66.

Investors who were heartened by an earlier report of slowing producer prices began buying in earnest after Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis President William Poole described the Fed's interest rate policy as "about right."

Poole, a voting member on the Fed's policymaking Open Market Committee, had reassuring words for a market that has been counting on a steady rate policy for the near future.

Blue Chips Climb To Another Record After Fed Official's Remarks On Rates (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Dow Jones Industrial Average plowed to a record, closing above 12200 for the first time, after a Federal Reserve official made upbeat comments on interest rates.

Stocks began with declines after weak October retail-sales numbers were released, but shares spurted higher following comments by William Poole, president of the St. Louis Federal Reserve Bank, that Fed rate policy is "about right." That reinforced hopes the Fed won't raise rates and might cut them next year, which would help businesses and consumers.

The Dow industrials rose 86.13 points, or 0.71%, to 12218.01, up 14% this year. The blue chips have risen in six of the past seven sessions, with 15 record closes since the beginning of October.

Technology stocks, which can benefit from economic optimism, led the market. The Nasdaq Composite Index hit another six-year high, up 1.01%, or 24.28 points, at 2430.66. It is up 10.2% in 2006.

The Russell 2000 small-stock index finished at a record, up 1.64% at 785.06, up 16.6% this year.

Declining retail sales, and a steep October drop in wholesale prices, initially sowed worry that the economy is slowing too much. But Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and Target Corp. reported strong quarterly profits, and fears that Mr. Poole might make hawkish rate comments proved unfounded.

"The news from Mr. Poole wasn't earth-shattering, but it wasn't negative," said Todd Leone, head of listed trading at New York brokerage firm Cowen & Co., "and then you saw money pouring into the market."

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index hit a six-year closing high, rising 0.64%, or 8.80 points, to 1393.22. It is up 11.6% this year. The S&P isn't near a record, but the news that it joined the Nasdaq and the Dow at a new multi-year high pushed money managers to buy for fear of being left behind. Trading volume was heavy.

Treasury-bond prices also rose, pushing yields lower, because soft inflation holds down interest rates and bond yields.

Investors now nervously await October consumer-price data, due tomorrow.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 0.41%, or 0.94 point, to 231.07.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks advanced1. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 3.02 billion shares, as 2,441 stocks rose and 871 fell.

Bond prices gained2. The 10-year Treasury note rose 8/32, or $2.50 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.576%. The 30-year bond was up 20/32 to yield 4.666%.

The dollar weakened3. Late in New York, it traded at 117.51 yen, down from 118.19, while the euro rose against the dollar to $1.2822 from $1.2803.

Prices Fell Sharply In October (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

Wholesale prices fell at a record rate last month as two economic forces that rarely move in the same direction — the costs of gasoline and light trucks — both plunged.

DOJ_NMG_0094594

The new statistics, released yesterday by the Labor Department, added to a growing pool of economic data that showed inflation was easing. For investors focused on the Federal Reserve's next move on interest rates, the news suggested that rates would remain stable, with some predicting that a cut in borrowing costs might even come as early as March.

The report, along with comments yesterday from a Fed official that the central bank's policy on interest rates has been "about right," helped touch off a late rally on Wall Street.

The Standard and Poor's 500-stock index closed at its highest level in six years, and the Dow Jones industrial average broke another record.

Consumer spending is showing signs of slowing but remains robust. The Commerce Department said yesterday that retail sales in October, apart from gasoline, rose 0.4 percent, suggesting that many Americans are going into the holiday season in a good mood from the savings they are reaping from lower fuel prices. Wholesale prices as measured by the producer price index, a seasonally adjusted gauge of the prices businesses charge one another just before they are sold to consumers, fell 1.6 percent in October, matching the steepest decline on record, set in 2002.

The core wholesale inflation rate, a measure that does not take into account the frequent gyrations in energy and food prices, declined 0.9 percent last month, its biggest fall in 13 years.

The overall picture of wholesale inflation last month was heavily colored by plummeting prices for light trucks, which include sport utility vehicles, pickups and minivans, and declining oil prices. Light truck prices fell 12.4 percent, the biggest year-over-year decline since the Labor Department began tracking them in 1964. The price of wholesale gasoline dropped 18.5 percent from October 2005 to October 2006.

Still, even if the decline in vehicle prices had not been so steep, wholesale inflation in October would have been low. When the core rate is recalculated without automobile sales, wholesale prices rose 0.1 percent.

"There's evidence that with energy prices falling and with the slowdown in the housing market, there's a picture of more benign price increases emerging," said Peter Kretzmer, an economist at Bank of America. "I don't think it will be that long before this starts to translate into somewhat muted consumer price trends."

Whether falling prices at the producer level eventually lead to falling prices for consumers is never as direct as it might seem. But some economists found it encouraging that yesterday's report was the second consecutive set of wholesale price data to show an overall decline. In September, wholesale prices fell 1.3 percent. For the year, prices are down 1.6 percent.

Pressure continued to ease further up the production chain. Prices of crude goods — items in the earliest stages of production, like gravel, scrap metal or animals used for slaughter — fell 10.5 percent in October after declining 3.4 percent in September. Prices of intermediate goods declined 1.1 percent.

The falling costs of materials could help reduce the threat of inflation from rising labor costs. One critical question Fed policy makers must answer as they chart the nation's monetary policy is whether the recent wage gains — which have just started to outpace inflation — are pressuring employers to pass along the cost by raising prices.

"The issue is what happens with labor," said Jack Caffrey, an equity strategist with J. P. Morgan Private Bank. "If the Fed then remains with their focus on inflation risks being the dominant issue, it likely stays with a tighter monetary policy for longer."

William Poole, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis, said yesterday that the Fed could go either way. "I believe that the outlook for Fed policy is roughly symmetrical," he said after giving a speech in Wilmington, Del. "I can imagine data coming in that would make me want to tighten policy. And I could imagine data coming in that would lead me to believe that we ought to be easing policy."

Economists said the tipping point for the Fed to lower rates could come if the labor market shows signs of weakening. Last month, unemployment fell to 4.4 percent, the lowest level since May 2001. That is close to what economists consider full employment, and some experts have said they think the number of jobless will rise in the coming months.

"People will debate how quickly before the Fed pulls the trigger, and how much weakening you need," said James O'Sullivan, an economist at UBS. "But if we start to see the unemployment rate edge up, I think it's just a matter of time before the Fed starts easing."

U.S. Consumer-Spending Data Bolster Hopes For Holiday Sales (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

American consumers maintained their spending in October, leading economists to hold out hope that robust holiday sales will help insulate the U.S. economy from a sharp downturn in housing.

Excluding gas stations, which were hurt by lower fuel prices, sales at food and retail establishments rose to a seasonally adjusted $332 billion in October, up 0.4% from September and 6.5% from a year earlier, the Commerce Department said.

Higher spending at restaurants and drugstores helped to offset declines in sales of housing-related goods, such as building materials and furniture. Overall retail sales shrank 0.2% from September, but were up 4.5% from a year earlier.

Together with a big drop in wholesale-goods prices, the retail-sales report persuaded some investors that the economy is cooling just enough to keep inflation in check, allowing the Federal Reserve to hold short-term interest rates steady at their current 5.25%. As a result, stock and bond prices rose.

Economists said the report suggests that consumers, whose purchases make up more than two-thirds of the U.S. economy, are slowing down a bit, but that falling home sales aren't yet seriously affecting spending in other sectors.

While downward revisions showed that September retail sales were weaker than previously thought, sales excluding gas, autos and building materials rose 0.9% in the two months taken together. The numbers point to a rise in inflation-adjusted consumer spending in the current quarter of about 3% -- below the 10-year average of 3.7%, but still healthy. "That's a good start to the quarter," said Brian Jones, senior economist at Citigroup Inc. "You've got to think that we're going to have a pretty decent holiday shopping season."

In recent months, economic forces have been pushing consumers in opposite directions. Falling home prices have made them feel poorer, but job and wage gains, together with lower gasoline bills, have left them with more spending money. Economists estimate that personal income in October, adjusted for inflation, was up more than 4% from a year earlier.

"The positive income effects from the labor market are at the moment outweighing the negative wealth impact from the housing market," said John Shin, senior economist at Lehman Brothers. "While we're still very concerned about the housing market, we don't see the impact of that kicking in just yet."

Gas stations and housing-related retailers suffered the biggest dollar declines in October sales. Sales at furniture and home-furnishings stores dropped a seasonally adjusted 0.7% from a month earlier. Building materials and garden supplies fell 0.3%.

Sales in other areas grew. Eating and drinking establishments' sales rose 0.3%, and health and personal-care retailers saw a 1.3% rise. Sales at auto and auto-parts dealers rose 0.6%, despite auto companies' reports of a weak month.

Analysts believe low gas prices and income gains bode well for the holiday shopping season. Darrell Rigby, head of the global retail practice at Bain & Co., forecasts retail sales of general-merchandise items such as clothing and electronics will be up 5% to 5.5% in November and December from the same period last year, and up from a long-term average of 4.3%.

In another reflection of falling energy prices, the Labor Department reported yesterday that its index of wholesale-goods prices fell 1.6% in October from September. Excluding food and energy, wholesale prices were still down 0.9% -- the largest one-month decline since 1993.

Economy Seen Slowing As Wholesale Prices Plummet 1.6% (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — Falling energy prices and slumps in the housing and auto sectors propelled a record decline in wholesale prices in October.

Retail sales were muted during the month, the government said Tuesday. Overall, the data indicate the economy is slowing, and price pressures moderating, as the Federal Reserve has projected.

But analysts said the Fed is still far from an all-clear on inflation. Bill Cheney, chief economist at John Hancock Financial Services, cautioned that the wholesale index measures goods prices, which have been held down by globalization.

"Services are much less subject to competition from overseas … to the extent that you find yourself getting a real tight labor market in the U.S., it could push up wages and push up costs," Cheney says. He said the next Fed move is unclear.

The central bank has held short-term interest rates at 5.25% since June, after raising them 17 times from mid-2004 to mid-2006 to tamp down inflation. Core consumer inflation, which excludes volatile food and energy prices, was 2.9% in the 12 months, above the Fed's informal 1%-2% comfort range.

The Labor Department said Tuesday that wholesale prices plunged 1.6% last month, equaling a record decline in October 2001. Core prices fell a sharp 0.9%.

Energy prices fell 5% in October following an 8.4% plunge in September. Gasoline prices dipped 7.9% from the previous month and natural gas prices, 9.3%. Sport-utility vehicle prices fell 9.7%; car prices, 2.3%.

"The drop in petroleum prices and natural gas has helped with diesel fuel, construction plastics and delivery costs. The slump in home building certainly is affecting gypsum prices," says Kenneth Simonson, chief economist of The Associated General Contractors of America.

Though consumers are saving on energy bills, they haven't boosted spending elsewhere. The Commerce Department said retail sales dropped 0.2% in October, following an 0.8% September decline. The dip largely reflected the impact of falling energy prices but furniture, building supplies and other areas also declined.

Still, with a strong job market, many economists expect a solid holiday season. "Despite all the angst about a slowing economy, I don't think Santa will be laying off any reindeer," Cheney says.

US Economy Hit By Housing Slowdown (FT)

By Krishna Guha And Eoin Callan In Washington And David Pilling In Tokyo

Financial Times, November 15, 2006

A slew of economic reports on Tuesday showed the US economy feeling the strain from the sharp slowdown in the housing sector, while offering hopes that inflation pressures could be easing.

The US data came as Japan announced a stronger-than-expected 2 per cent annualised growth rate for the third quarter, raising the prospect of a second interest rate rise there.

The latest US retail sales figures, from October, showed that consumer spending remained resilient in spite of the pressures from the housing market. Sales excluding petrol increased by 0.4 per cent over the month. Lower oil prices meant the value of total retail spending fell 0.2 per cent on the previous month.

But downward revisions to the previous two months' retail sales suggested that consumer spending was weaker than thought.

Drew Matus, a senior economist at Lehman Brothers, said: "The retail picture points to a slightly lower growth profile than we anticipated."

Reports from Home Depot, the world's biggest DIY retailer, and D.R. Horton, the second-biggest US home builder, showed that pain continues in sectors most directly exposed to the housing slowdown.

Home Depot, which reported a 3 per cent fall in third-quarter net earnings, said the slowdown had come "faster and deeper" than expected. Bob Nardelli, chief executive, said the softening in the housing market had caused "significant" deterioration in home improvement sales, with conditions likely to worsen.

D.R. Horton, meanwhile, reported a rise in cancellations of new home sales for the third quarter in a row. "I'd say we are in the early stages of a downturn," said Don Tomnitz, president and chief executive.

The US inflation picture improved moderately, as data showed core producer prices fell last month at their sharpest rate in 13 years. Peter Kretzmer, senior economist at Bank of America Securities, said the fall in core PPI – excluding food and energy – was "almost entirely the result of lower car and truck prices".

Bond prices rallied on hopes that tomorrow's consumer price report would show evidence that this reduction would feed into slightly lower consumer price inflation. US stocks also closed higher, with the Dow Jones Industrial Average reaching a record 12,218.01.

The much stronger than expected growth in Japan sent the Nikkei stock average up 1.67 per cent to 16,290, its biggest percentage gain in six weeks.

Southern California Home Prices Hold As Sales Continue To Slow (LAT)

By Annette Haddad

The Los Angeles Times, November 15, 2006

Southern California home prices remained in a holding pattern last month while sales continued to decline, albeit at a slower pace, data released today showed.

The median price of all types of homes sold in October was $484,000, which was the same as in September, and 2.3% higher than a year ago, La Jolla-based research firm DataQuick Information Systems reported.

Meanwhile, sales in the six-county region fell 22.4% to 22,117, DataQuick said. It was the worst showing for an October in a decade, but the rate of decline was the slowest since July.

For much of this year, potential buyers have been hanging back, waiting to see if prices will decline. The result has been fewer sales and an upsurge in supply as more homes sit unsold for longer periods and new listings continue to come on the market.

What's more, homeowners who would like to move up or downsize are reluctant to put their homes up for sale, fearing they may not get the price they want.

"Buyers are taking their time, trying to wait out the uncertainty in a market that is rebalancing itself," said DataQuick President Marshall Prentice.

One region economists have been watching closely is San Diego County, where California's housing boom was launched six years ago and where it first started to fade. But in October, San Diego's home prices recovered some ground, rising nearly 2% to $485,000, compared to the month before. It was the first increase since March. Nonetheless, when compared to a year ago, the rate of appreciation in San Diego declined 5.5%, DataQuick said.

Southern California home-price gains have been decelerating for the last year. Year-over-year increases have been in the single digits for seven months and are expected to turn negative by the end of this year or early next year, DataQuick analysts said.

Indeed, the rate of the slowdown is starting to spread beyond San Diego. In Ventura County, home prices dipped 2.3% to $582,000. Sales fell 19.6% to 940.

In Orange County, the region's priciest market, the median price rose 3.1% to $625,000, which was the same median a month ago. Sales declined 24.9% to 2,715.

The Inland Empire counties of Riverside and San Bernardino, where prices were still rising by double-digits as recently as this spring, also showed marked slowing. In October, the median in Riverside rose 4.9% to $410,000, but was off its peak of $423,000 reached in September. Sales fell 24.2%.

San Bernardino's median price edged up 2.3% to $362,000 year over year, but was flat with the median price set last December. Sales declined 21.3%.

On Monday, DataQuick reported that Los Angeles County's median price rose 4.5% to $514,000 as sales dropped 21.8%.

Libel Lawsuit A $7 Million Win For Judge (CHIT)

By James Kimberly

Chicago Tribune, November 15, 2006

A Kane County jury Tuesday decided a small local newspaper should pay $7 million to the Illinois Supreme Court's chief justice for defaming him in two columns published three years ago.

Justice Robert Thomas cried and hugged his attorneys as Judge Donald J. O'Brien read the verdict Tuesday afternoon. Thomas, 54, of Wheaton shook hands and embraced jurors leaving the wood-paneled courtroom in the historic courthouse in downtown Geneva.

"I thank God," Thomas told reporters. "I thank the jury for listening and paying attention. The truth prevailed."

DOJ_NMG_0094598

The verdict was unusual, partly because of the amount awarded and partly because the plaintiff was a sitting judge, said Bruce D. Brown, an attorney who is representing the Boston Herald in its appeal of a $2 million libel judgment awarded last year to a Massachusetts state court judge.

"If you were to look at the range of libel judgments, it's certainly on the high end," Brown said.

The newspaper found to be at fault, the Kane County Chronicle, is a daily paper owned by the Shaw Newspaper Group. It circulates mostly in St. Charles, Geneva and Batavia. Its circulation is about 14,000, down from 38,000 in 2003.

Brown said the U.S. Supreme Court set the libel standard very high for public officials: A plaintiff must prove the newspaper knew it was publishing false information or had serious doubts about its veracity. "Public officials are often successful in the courtroom at creating sympathy for the situation they found themselves in, but because of the substantial constitutional protections enjoyed by the press, approximately 70 percent of those verdicts have been overturned," Brown said.

Attorney Stephen Rosenfeld, who defended the Chronicle and its former columnist, Bill Page, said the verdict would be challenged in post-trial motions and likely on appeal.

"I think it does have a chilling effect on the 1st Amendment and the press' ability to criticize public officials, especially elected officials," Rosenfeld said.

The appeal could raise a host of legal issues because all but two of the sitting Illinois Supreme Court justices testified during the two-week trial, Rosenfeld said.

Ex-columnist disappointed

Page, 58, a former restaurant owner-turned-freelance publicist and writer, said he was disappointed with the verdict.

"Obviously this has been an emotional time for everybody," said Page, who was a part-time contributor to the Chronicle until earlier this year, when he moved to Gainesville, Fla.

The columns at issue accused Thomas of injecting politics into a case before the Illinois Supreme Court.

Page testified that confidential sources told him that Thomas pushed for a severe punishment of former Kane County State's Atty. Meg Gorecki in a disciplinary case but backed off after local Republican leaders agreed to support a judicial candidate he favored in an upcoming election.

But Page never revealed the sources of his information, and at the trial the newspaper could not produce a single witness to support the accusations.

Ultimately, the Illinois Supreme Court suspended Gorecki's law license for four months because she left an answering machine message for a friend suggesting a county government job could be obtained in exchange for political donations to a county official. An investigation uncovered no evidence of a jobs-for-campaign donations scheme. Page wrote that Thomas was "out for blood" in the Gorecki case and pushed for a lengthy suspension or disbarment until local politicians supported his candidate.

Thomas said the columns were false and sued over two of them, contending his reputation had been damaged so severely that his future earning potential was diminished.

Thomas' attorney, Joseph Power, asked the jury to award Thomas $17 million.

"All they had to do was print some sort of retraction," Power said.

Jurors decided quickly

The jury sided with Thomas on every count. After the trial, several jurors told reporters that they quickly determined that the columns published May 20, 2003, and Nov. 25, 2003, were false and published with malice.

After four hours of deliberations Monday night, jurors spent 4½ hours Tuesday deciding how much money to award Thomas. They found he should receive $1 million for lost potential future earnings, $1 million for the public humiliation he suffered, and $5 million for the damage done to his professional and personal reputations.

"To have your integrity questioned in front of your family and the world, that was the most important part," said juror Ken Sotera, 46, of St. Charles.

Juror Kelly Groves, 26, of Aurora, said the jury blamed the Chronicle more than Pagebecause the newspaper should have done more to verify the information.

DOJ_NMG_0094599

"We all understand and respect confidential sources," Groves said. "We just feel if they would have done a little work they should have been able to substantiate this without confidential sources."

Power said Page's actions helped him prove the case.

Power introduced into evidence an e-mail that Page sent to a spokesman for the Illinois Supreme Court that warned of a "nightmare of bad publicity" for the court if Thomas were allowed to influence deliberations in the Gorecki case. Power said the e-mail was a threat. Page said it was an innocuous attempt to get someone from the court to speak with him about the case.

Jury Finds That Columnist Acted With Malice And Awards Judge $7 Million (NYT)

By Katharine Q. Seelye

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

GENEVA, Ill., Nov. 14 — In a case that media lawyers say has broad implications for press freedoms, a jury here found Tuesday that a newspaper columnist falsely wrote in 2003 that the chief justice of the Illinois State Supreme Court had traded his vote for a political favor, and had acted with malice.

The chief justice, Robert R. Thomas, brought the case against Bill Page, a former columnist for The Kane County Chronicle, a 14,000-circulation daily here, about 40 miles west of Chicago.

The jury awarded Justice Thomas $7 million, with $5 million for damaging his reputation, $1 million for future economic losses and $1 million for humiliation. It is the second-largest award in the county's history, after a $21 million medical malpractice award this year, said F. Keith Brown, a circuit judge here.

The justice's lawyers said that Mr. Page had essentially accused him of official misconduct, a felony, when he wrote that he had traded his vote on a disciplinary case in exchange for political support for his favored candidate in a local judicial race.

"This sends a message to renegade journalists that this conduct will not be tolerated," said Joseph A. Power Jr., a lawyer for Justice Thomas.

The jury deliberated for nine hours. Ken Sotern, 46, a juror and merchandising manager, said that the jury wanted to send a message to the news media "to a degree," but that its main concern was to try to restore Justice Thomas's reputation.

The newspaper's lawyers said they were handicapped because the trial judge did not allow them to argue that as a columnist, Mr. Page was not held to the standards of a reporter. They said Mr. Page accurately reported information from his unidentified sources.

The lawyers said the verdict would have a "chilling effect" on coverage of public officials and could embolden other judges to file suit, particularly since the award was high.

Steve Rosenfeld, part of the defense team, said the verdict would most likely be appealed. But he said it would be tricky because Mr. Thomas, 54, a former place-kicker for the Chicago Bears, oversaw all judges, including the trial judge, Donald J. O'Brien Jr., who was brought in from Cook County, and the State Supreme Court justices, most of whom took the stand on his behalf.

The case was also significant because it prompted an appellate court to establish a judicial privilege in Illinois, allowing deliberations to be kept private, much like doctor-patient discussions.

Newspapers are sued frequently, but it is unusual for a judge to sue a newspaper. Of 397 complaints filed against the news media last year, judges and magistrates brought 25 of them, or 6 percent, according to the Media Law Resource Center.

Sandra Baron, executive director of the center, said it was not clear if such cases were increasing, but she said the verdict made the press more vulnerable while it is under attack "from almost every aspect of society" and the industry is in some economic turmoil.

"In the short run it looks as if the judge has vindicated his reputation," Ms. Baron said. "But in the long run, society will pay for his vindication when the media is reluctant to criticize those in high office in the wake of lengthy, bitter, expensive trials."

It is peculiar for a judge sue a newspaper, said Cameron Stracher, a co-director of the law and journalism program at New York University Law School, because judges are supposed to protect free speech.

"The courts were the last protector," Mr. Stracher said, "and now even the courts are suing."

DOJ_NMG_0094600

The Kane County Chronicle's lawyers said that when a state's highest-ranking judge brought the case, he could wield as much influence as if he were sitting on the bench. Steven P. Mandell, a defense lawyer, said that most of the witnesses were beholden to the justice and that the defense had trouble getting witnesses and experts.

Jurors said that Justice Thomas's status made the case somewhat difficult but that they put it aside. "He's a guy just like anyone else," said one juror, Kelly Groves, 26, who deals with worker compensation claims.

Justice Thomas's lawyers said it was important for judges to be able to answer their critics. They said they understood that the suit would bring Mr. Page's columns to the attention of far more people than had seen them originally.

Mr. Power said the accusation of a felony damaged Mr. Thomas's reputation and could impede him in trying to join a prestigious law firm or being appointed to the United States Supreme Court. He said that though few people had seen the original columns, they could be converted into attack advertisements by anyone out to get Justice Thomas.

Jurors said they were not bothered that Mr. Page used unidentified sources, but wished there had been some confirmation of what they said. Without that, and without seeking a response from the justice before publication, the jurors said, the newspaper appeared to act recklessly.

Rick Shaw, 50, a juror and an engineering manager, said of the charges of vote-trading, "We were O.K. with confidential sources, but if it was so widespread, someone should have confirmed the facts."

Wal-Mart Sued Over Food Labels (WP)

By Ylan Q. Mui, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

An activist group representing small farmers has filed a complaint with the U.S. Department of Agriculture, alleging that Wal-Mart Stores Inc. incorrectly labeled several products as organic.

The retailer recently began expanding its assortment of organic foods as part of an effort to attract wealthier, more urban customers. In a statement yesterday, Wal-Mart defended its program and questioned the intentions of the group, called the Cornucopia Institute.

In an e-mail, Wal-Mart spokeswoman Karen A. Burk wrote "it's hard to take their claims seriously" and said one of the group's founders, Mark Kastel, had worked for a Wal-Mart rival. Kastel was a consultant for Organic Valley, a national farming cooperative that competes with several of Wal-Mart's suppliers. Kastel said he has severed professional ties with the co-op, though he declined to comment on whether it donated money to Cornucopia.

In its letter to the National Organic Program, an arm of the USDA, Cornucopia said that at several stores, Wal-Mart had incorrectly labeled Stonyfield Farm all-natural yogurt as organic. It also said several stores had included non-organic products such as tofu, egg-roll wrappers and juice in a cooler designated for organic produce.

"We were actually surprised to find these labeling errors and surprised to find them across the board," Kastel said.

Burner Concedes; Conn. Count Near End (RC)

By Nicole Duran

Roll Call, November 15, 2006

Political neophyte Darcy Burner (D), who came closer to knocking off first-term Rep. Dave Reichert (R-Wash.) than most political analysts anticipated, conceded to the former King County sheriff on Tuesday.

Her decision left nine House races — including the tantalizingly tight 2nd district in Connecticut — still officially unresolved one week after Election Day.

Burner, a former Microsoft manager, called Reichert on Monday night to congratulate him on a hard-fought campaign in the Evergreen State's 8th district. During a news conference Tuesday she made it clear that she would not seek a recount or challenge the 51 percent-to-49 percent result, even though some 20,000 absentee ballots have not been counted yet.

Burner did say that her campaign will continue to monitor the vote-counting process, however, leaving open the extremely unlikely possibility that Reichert's lead could eventually shrink enough to trigger an automatic recount under state law.

The victor must win by fewer than 2,000 votes and the difference between the two candidates' totals must be less than one half of 1 percent to trigger a recount.

Reichert's lead extended to 4,727 votes as of Tuesday.

"Darcy Burner really ran the kind of campaign that inspires supporters and leaves a lasting impression with voters in the district," said Kate Bedingfield, a spokeswoman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

Meanwhile, the results of the much-closer contest in Connecticut's 2nd district should be known this morning.

Former state Rep. Joe Courtney (D) clung to a 90-vote lead over Rep. Rob Simmons (R-Conn.) early Tuesday evening.

Courtney's 167-vote lead on Election Day was narrow enough to trigger an automatic recount. All of the 65 towns in the district were expected to finish re-checking their tallies late Tuesday night. At press time, five towns had yet to finish their recounts.

Courtney's lead has gone up and down since the recount began, at one point shrinking to just 66 votes.

Both candidates have until Nov. 21 to petition the Connecticut Supreme Court for a second recount, the cost of which would be born by the candidate who requests it.

Simmons has not said what he will do if he comes up short again this morning.

Courtney declared victory last week and came to Washington, D.C., this week for freshman orientation.

Simmons has not conceded.

In Florida, which is once again home to the most controversial outcome of a federal election, a Sarasota circuit court judge on Tuesday granted Democrat Christine Jennings' request to impound electronic voting machines used in Sarasota County.

In the open-seat contest to succeed Rep. Katherine Harris (R) in the Sunshine State's 13th district, Sarasota County produced an unusually high number of "undervotes" — ballots that leave some races blank. More than 18,000 ballots did not record a preference in the matchup featuring Jennings, a bank executive and Vern Buchanan (R), a car dealer. Jennings and many voters blame new touch-screen voting machines for the discrepancy.

Preliminary results had Buchanan edging out Jennings by 373 votes, a margin small enough to trigger an automatic recount.

The recount got under way Monday. The undervote problem prompted a state audit and has caused two watchdog groups to call for a new election in the district.

The state audit was set to begin today, but the judge's decision delays it until at least Thursday, giving all concerned parties time to reach an agreement on the process for the audit.

Jennings' decision to go to court shows that her campaign does not trust local or state officials, including the secretary of state. That distrust could stem from the disputed 2000 presidential election and then-Florida Secretary of State Harris' role in it.

Jennings has not conceded, and both she and Buchanan were on Capitol Hill this week for freshman orientation.

In North Carolina's 8th district, teacher Larry Kissell (D) is ready to ask for a recount in his close contest with Rep. Robin Hayes (R).

More than 1,400 provisional ballots should be counted by Friday. In a news release Tuesday, Kissell said a recount is "inevitable" and that he is ready to demand a "hand-eye" recount to challenge the results that currently show Hayes leading by 462 votes.

Kissell also has not conceded.

Other races that remain officially unresolved — though their results are unlikely to change — are in Georgia's 8th and 12th districts, New Mexico's 1st district, Ohio's 2nd and 15th districts and Wyoming's At-Large seat. Democratic incumbents lead in the two Georgia districts, while GOP incumbents are ahead in the other states.

Signs Of Democratic Takeover Were Hard To Miss (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - Karl Rove must read polls through red-colored glasses.

That might explain why two weeks before Election Day he snapped at a reporter who dared suggest that he saw trouble in the polls for the Republicans.

"I'm looking at 68 polls a week," Rove, the president's political strategist, chided a National Public Radio reporter. "You may be looking at four or five public polls a week that talk about attitudes nationally but that do not impact the outcome of individual races.

"I'm looking at all of these . . . and adding them up. I add up to a Republican Senate and Republican House . . .You are entitled to your math and I'm entitled to THE math."

Well, Rove was wrong. His math wasn't THE math. Maybe it was what George W. Bush once called "fuzzy math."

For the rest of us, the numbers had been adding up for more than a year.

Take, for example, McClatchy's reporting as early as May 2005 that the tide had turned against Republicans, that congressional scandals, violence in Iraq and Republican overreaching were creating a toxic political environment like the one that shadowed the Democrats in 1993 - the year before they were swept from power.

Or our October 2005 analysis that Republicans feared a wave of anger like the 1994 tsunami that washed the Democrats away. "It's worse today," Republican strategist Frank Luntz said then.

Or reporting from around the country last March that revealed a dispirited Republican base, frustrated and angry over federal spending and illegal immigration.

Then came McClatchy-MSNBC polling of key Senate races this fall, conducted by the respected Mason-Dixon Polling & Research, Inc. While Rove was right that many media polls surveyed the entire country - and missed on-the-ground differences - he seemed to ignore the work by Mason-Dixon, which specializes in state-by-state research.

Our first poll, released Oct. 2, found that Democrats were in position to gain six seats and win control of the Senate. Democrats did not trail in any battleground state; Republicans did not lead in any. Many analysts by then were writing that Democrats might take control of the House of Representatives, but most called the Senate out of reach.

Our second series of polls, released Oct. 24, found Republicans holding narrow leads in Tennessee and Virginia and close in Missouri - suggesting a Southern battleground would decide Senate control.

Our final wave of polls, released Nov. 5, showed a close contest for the Senate, with Republicans gaining in two overlooked states, Montana and Rhode Island, and pulling away to a 12-point lead in Tennessee.

Some readers didn't like that. One compared me to Nazis. Another suggested I should die. None argued with the numbers, just the writer. But the analysis focused on the newest information - growing Republican chances to hold two states widely written off as lost.

Our partner, MSNBC, went farther. Its headline: "Polls: GOP looks likely to keep Senate control."

Our final polls came very close to what happened on Election Day. Eleven of our 12 state-poll results were within the margin of error, which was plus or minus 4 percentage points. That means you can add or subtract the four points for either candidate, for a total possible swing range of eight points. Most of our polls were much more on target than that.

In Arizona, we showed the Republican up by 8 percentage points; he won by 9.

In Maryland, we showed a 3-point lead for the Democrat. He won by 11 points, exactly at the outside edge of our poll's margin of error.

In Missouri, we showed a 1-point lead for the Democrat. She won by 1 point.

In Montana, we showed a tie. The Democrat won by 1 point.

In New Jersey, we showed 7-point lead for the Democrat. He won by 8.

In Ohio, we had the Democrat ahead by 6; he won by 12.

In Pennsylvania, we had the Democrat up by 13; he won by 18.

In Rhode Island, we had the Republican up by 1 point; the Democrat won by 6.

In Tennessee, we had the Republican up by 12; he won by 3 - or 1 point outside the margin of error.

In Virginia, we had the Democrat up by 1; he won by less than 1 percentage point.

In Michigan, we had the Democrat with a 16-point lead; she won by 16.

In Washington, we had the Democrat with a 16-point lead; she won by 19.

"We did pretty good," said Mason-Dixon pollster Brad Coker. "The only two states that anybody would call into question would be Rhode Island and Tennessee. That had lot to do with the timing."

DOJ_NMG_0094603

He said both polls found a bump in Republican support after Democratic Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts suggested that U.S. soldiers in Iraq are uneducated. That bump had disappeared by Election Day, and with it the Republicans' last chance to keep the Senate and prove Rove right.

Conservatives In Denial (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

On their journey through the stages of grief, conservatives don't yet seem to have gotten past denial.

Republicans may have lost, conservatives argue, but only because they misplaced their ideology. "[T]hey were punished not for pursuing but for forgetting conservatism," George F. Will, conservatism's most trenchant champion, wrote on this page last week.

Their mortal sin, in this gospel, was their abandonment of fiscal prudence.

They doffed their green eyeshades and gushed red ink. "The greatest scandal in Washington, D.C., is runaway federal spending," said Indiana Rep. Mike Pence, the true-blue conservative who is challenging Ohio's John Boehner for the post of House Republican leader.

Holding conservatism blameless for last week's Republican debacle may stiffen conservative spines, but the very idea is the product of mushy conservative brains unwilling to acknowledge the obvious: that conservatism has never been more ascendant than during George Bush's presidency; that the Republican Party over the past six years moved well to the right of the American people on social, economic and foreign policy; and that on Nov. 7 the American people chose a more pragmatic course.

After all, it wasn't just the president's war that was driven by right-wing ideologues. Particularly in the past two years, Republican economics, too, was shaped by ideology. The president's proposal to privatize Social Security was the brainchild of right-wing think tanks and the financial institutions that yearned to sell all those annuities. It never penciled out, and all sober analysis concluded that its chief effect would be to imperil retirement security itself. By nonetheless making it the signature domestic issue of his second term, George Bush again stamped himself a true believer and as indifferent in economic policy as he was in foreign policy to such vulgar trivialities as facts.

Of course, one way conservatives defend the faith is to argue that the conservatism of contemporary Republicanism isn't really conservatism at all. The invasion of Iraq, in this telling, was the handiwork of Wilsonian interlopers who had strayed unaccountably into Republican ranks one night when the barn door was left ajar. But in fact the invasion of Iraq and the doctrine of preventive war have a sterling conservative pedigree; they were handed down from the right-wingers in the early years of the Cold War who rejected the strategy of containing communism and argued instead for rolling it back (an idea that Dwight Eisenhower considered sheer madness).

As well, conservatives at both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue saw the war in Iraq as a way to gain a political advantage over the Democrats, who had backed the war in Afghanistan but who could be pilloried as appeasers for failing to grasp the need to roll into Baghdad. To argue that Iraq was not the conservatives' war requires expunging every congressional vote, administration speech and talk show rant of the past four years.

Besides, when Americans think of isms, they think -- at least they think first -- of how liberals and conservatives stand on social issues. A liberal backs abortion rights and gun regulations; a conservative wants to ban abortions and legalize all guns. By that measure, what has defined conservatism in the popular mind over the past couple of years has been its willingness to enlist government to block stem cell research, stop the teaching of evolution and supersede the duties of Terri Schiavo's husband.

This may be a conservatism that makes libertarians cringe, but it is the conservatism that dominates the Republican Party we have. Republicans generally and conservatives particularly have profited mightily from the rise and politicization of fundamentalism over the past few decades. The decimation of Republican moderates from the Northeast and Midwest in last week's elections came at the hands of centrist and independent voters who'd had it with the Southernized religious conservatism of the Republicans' base -- and with its moderate Republican enablers.

Finally, conservatives argue that the newly elected Democrats are really conservatives, too -- proof that the ideology is in no need of a tuneup. It's true that some of the Democrats take conservative positions on guns and abortion. But it's also true that virtually all the new Democrats look askance at free trade, want to raise the minimum wage and back a bigger role for government in making health care more affordable.

At a time when corporations abandon their employee benefits, globalization depresses wages, and individuals are compelled to shoulder more and more risk, the last thing Americans need is a government that tells them -- as it told their countrymen in New Orleans last year -- they're on their own.

That's why Republicans just ran a campaign devoid of new ideas. In a laissez-faire world that already induces anxiety and that becomes more laissez-faire with each passing day, who needs a laissez-faire party? Conservative, heal thyself.

Election Signals Decline Of Old School Liberalism (USAT)

By Kirsten Powers, By

USA Today, November 15, 2006

It's more glacial shift than radical revolution, but change is afoot in the Democratic Party.

In a low point in Democratic Party history, Pennsylvania Gov. Bob Casey was banned from speaking at the 1992 Democratic Convention for being opposed to abortion rights. This year, his son, Bob Casey Jr., who holds the same views, was actively recruited by that same Democratic Party and unseated Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa.

This was a welcome move in a party that is home to vocal and organized far-left activists and bloggers who have grown increasingly shrill and threatening toward moderate and conservative Democrats. They also have excoriated former president Bill Clinton's brand of centrist politics. They argue for "party discipline," best exemplified by their jihad against Connecticut's Sen. Joe Lieberman for deviating from the party line on the Iraq war. During the past election for Democratic National Committee chair, delegates booed former congressman Tim Roemer of Indiana because he, too, opposes abortion rights.

Yet, without centrist Democratic candidates, it would have been President Bush and GOP strategist Karl Rove celebrating last week. More than half of the new House members will join the New Democrat Coalition or the Blue Dog Coalition caucuses, known for their fiscal responsibility, business-friendly stance and generally more socially conservative views. While most criticized the war, few have called for an immediate withdrawal.

In addition to running fiscally responsible candidates, the Democratic Party appealed to the vital center by slaying a few of old school liberalism's sacred cows: aggressive secularism and intolerance of anti-abortion views. Yes, the war was a major issue. But it was critical that Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois and Sen. Charles Schumer of New York — who ran the campaign committees — recruited candidates palatable to conservative or moderate voters who wanted to send a message about the war, but who didn't want to compromise on beliefs about abortion, gay marriage or the role of religion in public life.

Earlier this year, Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., found himself on the receiving end of left-wing rage when he urged the party to be more open to people of faith and their views. He was on to something. Many successful Democratic candidates spoke about their faith.

In North Carolina, Democrat Heath Shuler ran as a born-again Christian who opposes abortion. Pro-gun Brad Ellsworth, who opposes abortion and favors an amendment banning gay marriage, will be a new representative from red-state Indiana. Rep. Ted Strickland, a United Methodist minister, became the first Democrat to win as governor in Ohio in 20 years.

The liberal evangelical minister Jim Wallis, who counsels Democrats, characterized these elections — perhaps too optimistically — as the end of not just the religious right's power but also of the secular left's political dominance.

For years, Democrats have quietly won governorships and statehouses in red and purple states by running candidates who shared the values of voters in their state, not the beliefs of the coastal intelligentsia. It turns out even in blue states, voters like centrist politics. After liberal anti-war candidate Ned Lamont's beat Pariser's liberal candidate in one of the bluest states in the country — and centrist and conservative Democrats helped usher in a Democratic Congress.

What's Right With Kansas (NYT)

It would be remiss to finish the election post-mortems without noting a major shift in the nation's heartland. Kansas — lately considered the reddest of red states — emerged from the election as a bastion of moderation.

Just two years after President Bush carried the state by 25 percentage points, Kansas voters rebelled against continued domination of the state's politics by the sharply conservative state Republican Party. The Democratic Party posted major gains, including some by former Republicans who switched parties.

The moderate Democratic governor, Kathleen Sebelius, received a whopping 58 percent of the vote to secure her re-election. Three moderate Republicans holding statewide jobs also won easy re-election, two of them after beating back conservative challengers in the primary. And two of the four people elected to the House of Representatives were Democrats, a result that would have seemed inconceivable not too long ago.

Victories by moderate Democrats and Republicans ended conservative control of the Kansas State Board of Education, which tried to replace evolution with creationism in public school classrooms.

And for us, one of the most satisfying results was the resounding defeat of Attorney General Phill Kline, an anti-abortion zealot who gained national notoriety by misusing his office to further his ideology. He tried to force health care workers to file reports on the sexual activity of teens, and to seize women's confidential medical records. That gross assault on privacy and legal rights was a major issue in the campaign. The 58-to-42 landslide that elected a former Republican, Paul Morrison, was a victory for moderation and the rule of law.

Help Wanted: Democrats (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- When cable news channels projected that Democrats would win control of the House, the crowd roared at the party's official election-night party here.

California Rep. Nancy Pelosi was introduced as the first female speaker of the House. Mrs. Pelosi, in turn, drew an ovation when she referred to Nevada Democratic Sen. Harry Reid as the next Senate majority leader, even though it would take another day for the election results to become known.

Another winner that night was David Bolger, who exchanged high-fives with other Democrats, as the crowd applauded the party leaders. Mr. Bolger isn't a lawmaker or a congressional aide. He is a Democratic lobbyist.

After more than a decade of Republican rule in Washington, Democratic lobbyists have a lot to celebrate. Just a week after Election Day, they are getting promotions and signing up new clients.

When Republicans took over Congress in 1994, most lobbyists were Democrats. Although the power shift would ultimately have resulted in increased numbers of Republican lobbyists, the party leadership set out to accelerate the process. Republicans pressured corporations and lobbying firms to hire Republicans, and Republican lawmakers, such as former Rep. Tom DeLay of Texas, told businesses that he would speak only with Republican lobbyists. Mr. DeLay was instrumental in a strategy called the K Street Project, which pressured corporations to hire hundreds of Republican lobbyists.

Five years ago, Mr. Bolger was a victim of the K Street Project. After the 2000 election, the trade group where Mr. Bolger worked in the communications office, the U.S. Telecom Association, replaced its president, Democrat Roy Neel. Mr. Bolger lost his job in the change.

Now Democrats like Mr. Bolger, 44 years old, expect opportunities to pick up, as their effectiveness is likely to rise on Capitol Hill. The benefits from the change in the congressional majority will take months for Democratic lobbyists to chart. But already there are indications that ties to Democratic lawmakers are a valuable currency among those whose work will include lobbying the 110th Congress.

On Election Day, private-equity firm Svoboda, Collins LLC, Chicago, announced that it had purchased a majority stake in Washington's largest all-Democratic lobbying and public-relations firms, the Glover Park Group, which posts annual revenue of more than $30 million. Both firms declined to disclose the size of the investment.

"Suddenly, people are taking a fresh look at us," says Michael Feldman, a Glover Park partner and a White House aide in the Clinton administration. Other partners include Carter Eskew, chief strategist for Al Gore's presidential campaign; Joe Lockhart, a White House spokesman for President Clinton; and Howard Wolfson, a top adviser to Sen. Hillary Clinton (D., N.Y.).

Another Democratic lobbyist, John Raffaelli, decided to leave the firm he established years ago, the Washington Group, and start a new one. "This is a unique opportunity for Democrats to open up new ventures because for many years, particularly with the K Street Project, it was very difficult for Democratic lobbyists to operate."

Two years ago, Democrat Julie Domenick left her post as chief lobbyist for the Investment Company Institute, the mutual-fund trade association, after reports that congressional Republicans pressured the industry to replace her with a Republican. She moved to the lobbying firm founded by former Republican Rep. Tom Loeffler of Texas, where she represents the mutual-fund industry. With Democrats back in control, Ms. Domenick now is in discussions with the lobbying firm about taking a higher profile role.

Ms. Domenick says that it should "become abundantly clear that companies will now need people with impeccable Democratic credentials, who have strong relationships with the new Democratic majority...and that means Democrats, especially those who supported the party during its long decade of dark days."

Paul Equale, a Democrat, says he was pushed out of his job as the top lobbyist for the Independent Insurance Agents of America and replaced by a Republican in 2001. Since then, Mr. Equale has run a small consulting firm advising financial-services firms on how to deal with Washington.

Now, Mr. Equale says, he is seeing the benefits of the Democrats' return to power. "It's the functional equivalent of flirting. People call and find out if I have the availability to go out on a date," he says. "Just like dating, there will be a number of relationships that deepen."

Democratic lobbyists say they don't plan retribution against the Republicans who pushed them out of jobs. But they predict that some companies that hired many Republicans will now hire Democrats to balance their lobbying teams.

"A lot of people got spooked by Tom DeLay and hired a lot of Republicans and those people are going to have the hardest time," says Steve Elmendorf, a Democratic lobbyist who is close to Mrs. Pelosi.

Democratic lobbyists may find their own set of problems. Mrs. Pelosi and Mr. Reid won control of Congress in part by campaigning against a "culture of corruption" in Washington and by highlighting the close ties between some Republicans and corporate lobbyists. Now, the newly empowered Democratic leaders on Capitol Hill promise to approve legislation early next year that will tighten restrictions on lobbyists. "The lobby reforms are going to give some people on the Democratic side a little heartburn," Mr. Equale says.

For now, Democrats like Mr. Bolger are still savoring their Election Day victory. Mr. Bolger, who served in the Clinton administration as a spokesman for the Federal Railroad Administration, joined the trade association for the local phone industry in the late 1990s.

When he lost his job in 2001, the U.S. Telecom Association gave him a six-month severance package. In January 2002, he landed a job in the Washington office of United Parcel Service Inc., where he is a lobbyist and spokesman. Mr. Bolger has continued to donate to Democratic candidates for Congress and in the 2004 presidential election he took a leave of absence to work for the campaign of Sen. John Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat.

Mr. Bolger, who plans to remain at UPS, says, "What has changed just in the last week is that there are greater opportunities for people who have worked on the Democratic side. It's a unique opportunity that Democrats haven't seen in 12 years."

As Guard Changes In Congress, Lobbyists Scramble (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

WASHINGTON, Nov. 14 — Republicans do not cede control of Congress for nearly two months, but money, power and influence are already beginning to change hands. The political economy, at least here in the capital, is humming for Democrats.

Democratic lobbyists are fielding calls from pharmaceutical companies, the oil and gas industry and military companies, all of which had grown accustomed to patronizing Republicans, as the environment in Washington abruptly shifts.

Take, for example, Vic Fazio, a California Democrat who rose through the ranks of Congress and reveled in the majority for all but 4 of his 20 years in office. In his second career as a lobbyist, Mr. Fazio did not experience the pleasures of Democratic rule — until now. Suddenly he is in demand.

For Mr. Fazio, who is close to Representative Nancy Pelosi, the California Democrat who is set to become House speaker, the power switch is, quite simply, good for business. Companies are scrambling to fortify lobbying teams with well-connected Democrats.

While Mr. Fazio declined to divulge his still-evolving list of prospective new clients at the law firm Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, he said he intended to bring in Democratic reinforcements to cover the load. "I'll just have more to do and have a little more help to do it," he said.

The Republican Party lost its grip on Congress and is now bracing to lose its hold over K Street, the bustling corridor that has become synonymous with the lobbying industry. The so-called K Street Project, an effort engineered by Republicans to dominate the trade, is unraveling, and Democrats say they intend to pass sweeping reforms rather than reverse the project for their benefit.

Democrats say the changing of the guard provides a raft of opportunities, second only to winning the presidency.

Former members of Congress who left Washington have placed confidential calls to headhunters, wondering whether firms are hiring. (They are.) Former staff members have fielded inquiries from lobbying shops that have an urgent need for people with current contacts and old relationships with Democratic leaders. One prominent lobbyist said a former Senate aide was offered a starting salary of $500,000.

Though this is the moment Democrats have been craving — winning a majority so they can help shape politics and policy — some senior aides are now tempted to leave Capitol Hill to become lobbyists and potentially quadruple their salaries. At the same time, some Republicans began receiving materials on unemployment benefits this week as the party sheds thousands of jobs, relinquishing staff committee assignments and leadership posts in both chambers for the first time in 12 years.

"If you're a Democrat, it's a good time to be looking for work," said David Urban, a Republican who is the managing director of American Continental Group, a bipartisan lobbying firm. "For Republicans, there is a little bit of panic that sets in when people realize they have to move out of their office into a cubicle."

At the offices of Tongour Simpson Holsclaw, a Republican firm, an unusual number of Democrats have been calling in recent days. The phones began ringing after the company's founder was quoted in Roll Call, a Capitol Hill newspaper, saying it was "a seller's market for Democratic staffers." It was, said Mike Tongour, as though he had placed a giant help-wanted ad.

"Several Democrats said, 'I hear you are interested in expanding your firm,' " Mr. Tongour said, recalling his post-election conversations with several senior Democratic aides. "You got the sense that they are going to be asking for premiums."

Even though most firms are bipartisan, the shift in the balance of power has resulted in a shift of responsibilities between Republicans and Democrats.

"I've told my Democratic partners it's time for them to buy some suits," said Wayne Berman, a well connected Republican lobbyist. "I went out and bought two new fishing rods and looked into yoga classes."

He was joking, sort of.

Even before Election Day, the pharmaceutical industry hired Democrats to bolster its public relations efforts, hoping to ease the blow if Republicans lost their majority and Democrats followed through on pledges to let the government negotiate prescription drug prices.

"You literally have to create war games to plan for worst-case scenarios," said Ken Johnson, the vice president for government affairs at the leading trade association for drug companies. "We've got a lot of friends on the Democratic side, but clearly we need some more."

Acquiring those friends, however, may not be easy.

Steve Elmendorf, a longtime senior adviser to former Representative Richard A. Gephardt who began working as a lobbyist at Bryan Cave Strategies in 2005, said Democrats in the House and the Senate would operate differently.

"The Republicans' view of lobbying is we give people money, we buy them lunch and then go up and tell them what to do," said Mr. Elmendorf, whose client roster included Shell Oil and Ford before the election and has grown since then. "We go in and make public policy arguments. The business community is going to have to reorient their view."

As Democrats prepare for January, implications of a change in power extend across Washington.

Lawyers say they expect their business to increase if House Democrats follow through on their pledge to investigate the Bush administration. Real estate agents paid careful attention to the election results, too, sending welcome packets to newly elected Democrats.

"Because both the House and the Senate went to the Democrats, there will be a new wave and new energy," said Michael Rankin, managing partner of the Washington office of Sotheby's International Realty. "A lot of people from around the country will be coming to Washington."

Ivan Adler, who oversees lobbyist headhunting in the Washington office of the McCormick Group, an executive search firm, said he had received calls from former members of Congress and others outside Washington "inquiring what the job market is like in the new Democratic world." Mr. Adler declined to name them, citing confidentiality requirements, but he conceded that not all would make good lobbyists.

"They are all popcorn in the pan — some pop and some don't," Mr. Adler said. "Hopefully you pick ones that would pop."

Though the supply and demand of lobbyists is shifting, well-connected Republicans have hardly been put out of work, particularly given the narrow majority in the Senate. Many lobbying firms, recoiling from a year of controversy and scandal, sell continuity as the most valued asset.

"As we move into a new Congress, people are wiser and they learn to distrust quick fixes," said Nick Allard, a Democratic lobbyist at Patton Boggs, the city's largest firm. "That's one reason why the lobbying scandal fell apart like a political Ponzi scheme: it oversold the notion of political access."

Two days after the election, when it first became clear that the levers of power were shifting, a team of lobbyists at Patton Boggs prepared an analysis of what its clients could expect from a Democratic takeover.

To place the change of power in perspective and to lighten the mood, they opened with the timeless tale from Dr. Seuss: "If I ran the zoo."

Despite Big Win, Dems' Message Control Still Needs Fine-tuning (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, November 15, 2006

Asked on NBC's "Meet the Press" on Sunday what the American public was trying to tell Republicans in last week's election, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said he believed the message was: "That we came to Washington to change government, and government changed us."

If those words sound familiar, it's because they might as well have been read straight off a Democratic talking-points memo. McCain's choice of words was a near-verbatim pull from a slogan Democrats have been using for more than a year.

The phrase has long been a favorite of Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) and also was used by the campaign of Ohio 1st District Democratic challenger John Cranley.

When a politician repeats an opponent's slogans, that's supposedly a positive sign for the opponent, an indication that the phrase has made its way into the political lexicon. But experts say Democrats made only marginal progress this cycle on their much-hyped goals of improving their message control and employing more effective language.

After the 2004 election, Democrats turned to University of California-Berkeley linguistics professor George Lakoff, whose guidance they hoped would help them frame messages better and elicit more favorable responses from the American public, much as Republicans did in 1994 with their Contract with America.

Yet even after the Democratic victories last Tuesday, Lakoff said Democrats are making fewer mistakes but still have yet to articulate a vision of what it means to be a Democrat, something they need to establish soon in preparation for 2008.

"The conservatives came in in 1994 with an understanding of who they were and what they were about and what their long-term vision was, and that's not happening here," Lakoff said, adding that individual Democratic candidates such as Montana Sen.-elect Jon Tester and North Carolina Rep.-elect Heath Shuler are exceptions.

"It's not just a one-liner; it's not just a slogan. There's a set of principles, there's an idea about the moral mission of a Democrat … that has to be put out there."

Lakoff and others agree that the Republicans' onetime strength in the messaging department fell apart this election, most notably when Democrats used President Bush's "stay the course" mantra against him. Eventually, even Bush, who had used it for years, disavowed the phrase.

But whatever Republicans lost in this arena was almost exclusively a result of their own doing and the political realities that have emerged on issues like the war in Iraq, as opposed to Democratic progress on the message front, said Geoffrey Nunberg, a professor at Berkeley's School of Information and author of "Talking Right," a book about the Republicans' linguistic dominance.

Nunberg said Democrats basically didn't use language at all, instead simply recycling slogans that restated a "throw the bums out" theme. The results were slogans such as "Together, America Can Do Better," "A New Direction for America," and "Had Enough?"

Republicans, meanwhile, have tried for the last few years to float too many slogans about the war on terror, and "stay the course" fell flat because of the ongoing death tolls in Iraq, not Democrats' strategic successes, he said.

Democrats did succeed in one major way: They made it clear they weren't Republicans, Nunberg said, but that isn't likely to work in 2008.

"It was the most successful exercise in negative self-identification since 7UP billed itself as the Un-cola," Nunberg said. "And, at the same time, the linguistic machine of the Republicans had the ultimate unraveling."

"The more pithy and memorable [the slogans] were, the more they come back to haunt Republicans when it turns out that language doesn't correspond to reality," he continued. "You can't keep doing that."

Emanuel echoed Nunberg the day after the election when talking about the Democrats' national security strategy. He said Republican phrases like "they stand up, we stand down" and "cut and run" weren't working and showed the American public that Republicans had slogans instead of strategies.

The DCCC chairman also said Republicans' bid to associate Democratic challengers in conservative districts with soon-to-be House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) failed. The Democrats won in four districts where the Republicans ran ads invoking Pelosi and trumpeting her "San Francisco values," by which they meant extreme liberalism.

Emanuel praised Democrats' efforts to attach the adjective "rubberstamp" to many Republicans who were too closely aligned with Bush.

"It became a national identity for the Republican Party and the Republican Congress," Emanuel said. "And they paid a price for their blind loyalty to the president."

Nunberg said the "rubberstamp" strategy was another example of something that worked because of the current environment but can't be counted on in the next election.

"None of that's operative in 2008," he said. "I don't think any of that stuff is going to matter much from here on in."

American Workers Have A Chance To Be Heard (WSJ)

By Jim Webb

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

The most important -- and unfortunately the least debated -- issue in politics today is our society's steady drift toward a class-based system, the likes of which we have not seen since the 19th century. America's top tier has grown infinitely richer and more removed over the past 25 years. It is not unfair to say that they are literally living in a different country. Few among them send their children to public schools; fewer still send their loved ones to fight our wars. They own most of our stocks, making the stock market an unreliable indicator of the economic health of working people. The top 1% now takes in an astounding 16% of national income, up from 8% in 1980. The tax codes protect them, just as they protect corporate America, through a vast system of loopholes.

Incestuous corporate boards regularly approve compensation packages for chief executives and others that are out of logic's range. As this newspaper has reported, the average CEO of a sizeable corporation makes more than $10 million a year, while the minimum wage for workers amounts to about $10,000 a year, and has not been raised in nearly a decade. When I graduated from college in the 1960s, the average CEO made 20 times what the average worker made. Today, that CEO makes 400 times as much.

In the age of globalization and outsourcing, and with a vast underground labor pool from illegal immigration, the average American worker is seeing a different life and a troubling future. Trickle-down economics didn't happen. Despite the vaunted all-time highs of the stock market, wages and salaries are at all-time lows as a percentage of the national wealth. At the same time, medical costs have risen 73% in the last six years alone. Half of that increase comes from wage-earners' pockets rather than from insurance, and 47 million Americans have no medical insurance at all.

Manufacturing jobs are disappearing. Many earned pension programs have collapsed in the wake of corporate "reorganization." And workers' ability to negotiate their futures has been eviscerated by the twin threats of modern corporate America: If they complain too loudly, their jobs might either be outsourced overseas or given to illegal immigrants.

This ever-widening divide is too often ignored or downplayed by its beneficiaries. A sense of entitlement has set in among elites, bordering on hubris. When I raised this issue with corporate leaders during the recent political campaign, I was met repeatedly with denials, and, from some, an overt lack of concern for those who are falling behind. A troubling arrogance is in the air among the nation's most fortunate. Some shrug off large-scale economic and social dislocations as the inevitable byproducts of the "rough road of capitalism." Others claim that it's the fault of the worker or the public education system, that the average American is simply not up to the international challenge, that our education system fails us, or that our workers have become spoiled by old notions of corporate paternalism.

Still others have gone so far as to argue that these divisions are the natural results of a competitive society. Furthermore, an unspoken insinuation seems to be inundating our national debate: Certain immigrant groups have the "right genetics" and thus are natural entrants to the "overclass," while others, as well as those who come from stock that has been here for 200 years and have not made it to the top, simply don't possess the necessary attributes.

Most Americans reject such notions. But the true challenge is for everyone to understand that the current economic divisions in society are harmful to our future. It should be the first order of business for the new Congress to begin addressing these divisions, and to work to bring true fairness back to economic life. Workers already understand this, as they see stagnant wages and disappearing jobs.

America's elites need to understand this reality in terms of their own self-interest. A recent survey in the Economist warned that globalization was affecting the U.S. differently than other "First World" nations, and that white-collar jobs were in as much danger as the blue-collar positions which have thus far been ravaged by outsourcing and illegal immigration. That survey then warned that "unless a solution is found to sluggish real wages and rising inequality, there is a serious risk of a protectionist backlash" in America that would take us away from what they view to be the "biggest economic stimulus in world history."

More troubling is this: If it remains unchecked, this bifurcation of opportunities and advantages along class lines has the potential to bring a period of political unrest. Up to now, most American workers have simply been worried about their job prospects. Once they understand that there are (and were) clear alternatives to the policies that have dislocated careers and altered futures, they will demand more accountability from the leaders who have failed to protect their interests. The "Wal-Marting" of cheap consumer products brought in from places like China, and the easy money from low-interest home mortgage refinancing, have softened the blows in recent years. But the balance point is tipping in both cases, away from the consumer and away from our national interest.

The politics of the Karl Rove era were designed to distract and divide the very people who would ordinarily be rebelling against the deterioration of their way of life. Working Americans have been repeatedly seduced at the polls by emotional issues such as the predictable mantra of "God, guns, gays, abortion and the flag" while their way of life shifted ineluctably beneath their feet. But this election cycle showed an electorate that intends to hold government leaders accountable for allowing every American a fair opportunity to succeed.

With this new Congress, and heading into an important presidential election in 2008, American workers have a chance to be heard in ways that have eluded them for more than a decade. Nothing is more important for the health of our society than to grant them the validity of their concerns. And our government leaders have no greater duty than to confront the growing unfairness in this age of globalization.

Mr. Webb is the Democratic senator-elect from Virginia.

Two Years Till Election Day, And The Race Is On (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON

The 2006 midterms are finally over (almost). Let the 2008 games begin.

A handful of congressional races aren't quite over yet, but the jockeying for the 2008 presidential contest - going on for months, if not years - has burst fully into the open. For the Republicans, Sen. John McCain of Arizona and Rudolph Giuliani, former mayor of New York, have registered committees and signaled they're probably in. By all indications, outgoing Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney is in.

For the Democrats, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York has money and organization - and just bowed out of a party leadership position, another sign she may be in. Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois says he's pondering a run, possibly positioning himself as the un-Hillary. Outgoing Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack is definitely in. Former vice presidential nominee John Edwards has shown all the signs.

But as of now, two years minus a few days until America elects its next president, the front-runners for major-party nomination remain Senators McCain and Clinton. Whether either will ultimately occupy the Oval Office is anyone's guess.

"Here's what's interesting: Both parties have reservations about their presumptive nominees," says Cal Jillson, a political analyst at Southern Methodist University in Dallas.

With Clinton, some Democrats remain concerned that she can easily win the nomination by deploying her formidable political team and fundraising ability, but can't win the general election because of her high negatives. Analysts warn against reading too much into presidential horse-race polls at this stage, since much is based just on name recognition. But for Clinton, who is already known nearly universally to the American public from her years as first lady and now as a senator, the visceral negative reaction she sparks in some voters is cause for concern.

The latest Gallup poll, taken Nov. 9-12, puts her favorability at 53 percent and unfavorable rating at 42 percent. In the same poll, McCain scored at 54 percent favorable and 23 percent unfavorable.

Clinton suffers from some voters' memories of her aborted effort to reform healthcare during her husband's administration, her implication in some White House scandals, and her image as a calculating centrist on issues such as the Iraq war.

The coming elevation of the first woman to be House speaker, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D) of California, could have some bearing on the public's attitude about making Clinton the first female president.

"If Pelosi does a really good job holding the Democrats together, and giving them something they can run with in 2008, that will certainly demonstrate to some people that a woman is tough enough to take on the Republicans," says Linda Fowler, a political scientist at Dartmouth College in Hanover, N.H.

For McCain, the 2006 midterms brought good news and bad news. His own party took a drubbing at the hands of voters, principally in a repudiation of both President Bush and the Iraq war. McCain is now well-positioned to enhance his image as a maverick, triangulating between the Democratic-controlled Congress and the lame-duck Bush White House. But his steadfast support for the unpopular Iraq war and continued calls for more troops in Iraq, not fewer, put him at odds with the American public on the No. 1 issue of the day.

"McCain has got to pray that Iraq goes away as a major issue in '08, otherwise he's got some difficulties," says Mr. Jillson.

McCain also faces the challenge of wooing social conservatives, who were skeptical of him in his 2000 presidential campaign, while not alienating moderate Republicans and independents.

Another hurdle for McCain could be his age. On inauguration day 2009, he will be 72, and if elected, would be the oldest person ever to become US president. But if he can remain healthy and energetic, the age issue could fade.

Below McCain and Clinton sit a small group of men vying to be their principal opponents in the primaries and caucuses, which begin in just 14 months. The announcement this week by ex-Mayor Giuliani that he has formed a presidential exploratory committee in New York State provides the first clue - beyond making speeches in key states - that he might actually run. The latest Gallup poll named him as the top choice for the GOP nomination among Republicans and independents who lean Republican, beating McCain by 2 points, 28 percent to 26 percent. But as a liberal on social issues, many analysts believe he cannot win the nomination.

That's why Governor Romney is getting so much attention. Some midterm defeats have cleared the way for Romney to position himself as the alternative to McCain among the GOP's conservative base. Romney was mentioned by only 5 percent of GOP voters as their top pick, but the race is young, and most voters have not tuned in yet. One question for Romney is how his Mormon faith will affect GOP voters' perceptions of him. But he already has built strong lists of supporters in early nominating states Iowa, South Carolina, and New Hampshire - in addition to Michigan, where his father was governor - and won notice for charisma.

On the Democratic side, the decision by former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner not to run has left an opening for the "anti-Hillary" spot. If Senator Obama decides to run, he could shoot into that position - but, analysts say, he has to decide soon, as the money and campaign talent are quickly being grabbed by others.

The first-term Illinois senator is currently riding a wave of "Obama-mania," following the publication of his second memoir and a book tour that has highlighted his appeal as a fresh face on the political scene - and his opposition to the Iraq war from the beginning, a key contrast with Clinton. The Gallup poll placed him second to Clinton among Democrats and Democratic leaners for the nomination, 31 percent to 19 percent.

The question is whether voters believe he has enough political experience to begin a credible run for president after just two years in the Senate. As a black man, he also faces the race question.

Appearing on ABC's "Good Morning America" on Monday, he said he was still thinking of running, but acknowledged the challenge of his identity.

"Whether it's an African-American candidate, a woman candidate running, if it's a nontraditional candidate, there is another threshold you have to meet," he said. "I think you have to show people competence in a way that, if you're a white male, you may not have to show initially."

With Group Exploring ’08 Bid, Giuliani Buys Himself Time (NYT)

By Sewell Chan

By setting up an organization in New York State to explore a White House run — but not creating a candidate committee with the Federal Election Commission — former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani is buying himself more time to make a decision, although he will face significant restrictions in raising money, according to several election and campaign experts.

The news that the Rudy Giuliani Presidential Exploratory Committee Inc. was established on Friday made front-page headlines yesterday, but Mr. Giuliani remains several steps away from declaring himself a candidate.

The new organization was registered as a nonprofit corporation with the New York State Department of State, but Mr. Giuliani has not committed to formally filing with the Federal Election Commission, as Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa, who is seeking the Democratic presidential nomination, has done.

Mr. Giuliani has said little publicly about his intentions, other than to say he expects to make a final decision by early next year. As he weighs his options, he is expected to rely heavily on the advice of a circle of advisers who have been with him for decades. They include Peter J. Powers, a former deputy mayor who has been a friend of Mr. Giuliani’s since high school, and Dennison Young Jr., who worked with Mr. Giuliani in the United States attorney’s office and was later the mayor’s chief counsel.

Mr. Powers and Mr. Young are the directors of the new organization, along with John H. Gross, a lawyer who has been a campaign treasurer for Mr. Giuliani.

"Everywhere he goes, I can only describe it as a groundswell of support among Republicans, urging him to run," said another friend, Randy M. Mastro, a former deputy mayor.

The former mayor is using a provision of federal election law that allows people exploring a candidacy to "test the waters" before deciding to run for federal office. The prospective candidate does not need to register with the commission, but must abide by the same contribution and spending limits as declared candidates.

The commission advises anyone doing such preliminary exploration to keep detailed financial records, because if he or she formally becomes a candidate, money raised and spent on testing the waters will be considered as contributions and expenditures under federal law.

Such prospective candidates may pay for polling, phone calls, travel, political consultants, office space and stationery, among other things. However, they may not raise more money than "reasonably required for exploratory activity," publicize their intention to run, or refer to themselves as candidates.

"You can travel and assess your viability as a candidate, but without trying to persuade people to support you," said Karl J. Sandstrom, a Democratic lawyer who was on the commission from 1998 to 2002. He suggested that Mr. Giuliani's step indicated a degree of hesitancy or uncertainty. "He doesn't want to be embarrassed if this doesn't start to take off. He's trying to play it kind of safe."

Mr. Sandstrom said a candidate can realistically test the waters only for a short period of time. "How much money can you spend on polls, even with New York pollsters?" he asked.

Bobby R. Burchfield, the lawyer for Mr. Giuliani's new organization, cautioned against reading the mayor's action as a sign of tentativeness. He said the entity was set up as to provide a legal structure and liability protections.

"What you can do as an exploratory committee is everything except campaign," he said. "There's a lot of latitude there. At a certain point of fund-raising, it becomes not credible to contend that you're exploring and not intending to run. If he sets up staff and tries to assemble delegate slates in states, that's out of bounds. But we're a very long way from those things."

He added, "At the appropriate time, he will make the requisite filings with the F.E.C."

Asked why Mr. Giuliani did not file with the commission while continuing to test the waters, an approach Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, has said he intends to take, Mr. Burchfield said there was no practical difference. But under the method he has chosen, Mr. Giuliani cannot present himself as a candidate or raise large sums of money, lest he face penalties.

Mr. Giuliani, who was mayor from 1994 to 2001, strongly considered running for the Senate in 2000, but decided not to after announcing, in quick succession, that he had prostate cancer; that he was involved with a woman, Judith Nathan; and that he was seeking a separation from his wife, Donna Hanover. He married Ms. Nathan in 2003.

The 9/11 attack transformed the mayor's reputation and made him immensely popular even in conservative areas where his moderate positions on abortion and gay rights might instantly sink the prospects of other Republican politicians.

Through his political action committee, Solutions America, he has contributed extensively to Republican campaigns, and this year, according to the committee's Web site, he campaigned with or raised money for Republican candidates in 25 states and Washington, D.C.

"He generates a lot of excitement, because he has instant name recognition and instant star power, and we were able to translate that into votes for us in the last cycle," said Katon Dawson, chairman of the South Carolina Republican Party. "He has almost rock-star status in crowds, because he was the face of 9/11 that we all saw every day."

Mr. Dawson said he expected Mr. Giuliani to run and predicted that he would have no trouble building an organization in South Carolina. "As soon as he pokes his foot in the water, he'll have employees," Mr. Dawson said.

Representative Jeb Bradley of New Hampshire last week lost his bid for a third term, but said he was grateful for Mr. Giuliani's support during the campaign. "People in New Hampshire really respect him," Mr. Bradley said. "Of all of the other presidential candidates, he has been a staunch defender of the New Hampshire primary."

Fred Siegel, a historian at Cooper Union who advised Mr. Giuliani in his 1993 mayoral run and in his first year as mayor, said the speculation over presidential aspirations indeed might have had the effect, whether intended or not, of bolstering Mr. Giuliani's consulting business, Giuliani Partners.

But Mr. Siegel said that he was not suggesting that Mr. Giuliani was trying to enrich himself, only that Mr. Giuliani, not having the political apparatus that a governor or other officeholder might have, used his business as a base of operations.

“He’s got the best of both worlds: He’s still making money for his business and he’s a de facto candidate for president, and the two reinforce each other,” Mr. Siegel said. “He’s using the candidacy to build up the business, and the business pays for the campaign.”

He said he believed the former mayor would run. “He’s been running for a long time,” he said. “It’s a noncampaign campaign.”

Think Tank Will Promote Thinking (WP)

By Marc Kaufman

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

Concerned that the voice of science and secularism is growing ever fainter in the White House, on Capitol Hill and in culture, a group of prominent scientists and advocates of strict church-state separation yesterday announced formation of a Washington think tank designed to promote "rationalism" as the basis of public policy.

The brainchild of Paul Kurtz, founder of the Center for Inquiry-Transnational, the small public policy office will lobby and sometimes litigate on behalf of science-based decision making and against religion in government affairs.

The announcement was accompanied by release of a "Declaration in Defense of Science and Secularism," which bemoans what signers say is a growing lack of understanding of the nature of scientific inquiry and the value of a rational approach to life.

"This disdain for science is aggravated by the excessive influence of religious doctrine on our public policies," the declaration says. "We cannot hope to convince those in other countries of the dangers of religious fundamentalism when religious fundamentalists influence our policies at home."

While the speakers at the National Press Club unveiling were highly critical of Bush administration policies regarding stem cell research, global warming, abstinence-only sex education and the teaching of "intelligent design," they said that their group was nonpartisan and that many Democrats were hostile to keeping religion out of public policy.

"Unfortunately, not only do too many well-meaning people base their conceptions of the universe on ancient books -- such as the Bible and the Koran -- rather than scientific inquiry, but politicians of all parties encourage and abet this scientific ignorance," reads the declaration, which was signed by, among others, three Nobel Prize winners.

Kurtz, a professor emeritus in philosophy from the State University of New York at Buffalo and a longtime critic of the influence of religion on public policy, said that the nation needed the equivalent of a "second Enlightenment." He said the methods of science, which have led to much human progress, "are being challenged culturally in the United States today as never before."

Several speakers also had strong words for the media, which they accused of distorting scientific consensus in the name of journalistic balance. David Helfand, chairman of the Columbia University astronomy department, said for instance that while 99 percent of scientists working in the field of climate change are convinced that it is serious and the result of human activity, the views of the 1 percent who disagree are often given equal weight in stories about global warming.

Lawrence M. Krauss, an author and theoretical physicist at Case Western Reserve University, said the scientific community has done a "poor job" of explaining its logic and benefits to the public. He also said scientists have a more active role to play in opposing faith-based governing, which he said the public often rejects once it understands the issues involved.

"In the current climate there is an implicit, if demonstrably false, sense that if your actions are based on a belief in God you are good person, and if they are not you are a bad person," Krauss said. "We should be very concerned that our political system reinforces the notion that the more you pray for guidance, the better suited you are to govern."

The goals of the new group are to establish relationships with sympathetic legislators, provide experts to give testimony before Congress, speak publicly on issues when they are in the news, and submit friend-of-the-court briefs in Supreme Court cases involving science and religion. The Center for Inquiry-Transnational, a nonprofit organization, is funded by memberships.

Los Angeles

WATCHING the televised punditry about the elections, I felt pummeled by commentators repeatedly using the same clichés — most of which happen to be dead wrong. The three worst offenders:

ALL POLITICS IS LOCAL Tip O'Neill's observation is no longer true. Safe one-party Congressional seats in Boston 50 years ago were local, but only because a few thousand Democratic primary voters chose the winner.

In this election, all politics was global. The voters of Mishawaka and La Porte, Ind., were more influenced by the sectarian politics of Baghdad than by the election-eve announcement by their Republican congressman, Chris Chocola, that he'd gotten $1.4 million in federal money for a local mental health center. He lost.

THIS IS THE MOST NEGATIVE CAMPAIGN EVER. Negative campaigning has been around since the beginning of our democracy, and voters reward it. If people voted against negative ads, you'd never see any.

The most criticized ad of this election poked fun at Representative Harold Ford of Tennessee. The political speech police labeled it racist because it featured a flirty blonde teasing Mr. Ford, who is black, about a Bacchanalian Super Bowl party that he allegedly attended and I'm sad to say I did not. Sure, the spot was inane, but the worst ever? In 1964, the president of the United States ran an ad implying his opponent would start a nuclear war. It's hard to get more negative than that.

THIS ELECTION WILL ALL COME DOWN TO TURNOUT. Nonsense. We Republicans took a beating on Election Day, but it had nothing to do with turnout. The problem wasn't that our voters didn't turn out, it was that our voters alone are not enough. Turnout is important: it is essential to winning primaries (since so few people bother to vote) and very close contests.

Most general elections, however, are decided by the independent and ticket-splitting voters in the middle who swing between parties. When the swing voters stampede toward your opponent, you are usually toast.

Examine exit-polling estimates from the Senate race in Virginia. George Allen won 94 percent of the Republican vote and Jim Webb won 93 percent of the Democratic. Since more Republicans than Democrats vote in Virginia, Senator Allen should have won. Instead of splitting the swing vote, however, Mr. Webb thumped Mr. Allen among independents by 12 points. It was the same in Montana and Ohio and, well, just about everywhere. It is the real reason we lost the House and Senate.

Successful campaign management means using message to be far enough ahead in most races — especially in districts and states where you start with the advantage — that you are never in such deep trouble that you wind up needing an improbably high turnout of only your base vote to win.

Swing voters respond to policy and persuasion, not process spin. The cocky Republican talk about magical 72-hour plans in the last weeks before the election was unfortunate proof that the party's high command had forgotten this most basic fact of politics, at least until the rough news of last Tuesday. Of all the clichés this year, this one was the most damaging for Republicans to believe in.

USA Today, November 15, 2006

President Bush was leaving Tuesday night for an eight-day tour of Asia that includes stops in Singapore, Indonesia and Vietnam, where he attends a summit of Asian-Pacific nation leaders. It will be Bush's first trip to Vietnam, where the United States fought a decade-long war in the south against communist forces that eventually triumphed and unified the country.

Bush's plan to arrive in Hanoi with a pact normalizing trade hit a bump when the lame-duck GOP-controlled House failed to approve the measure on an initial vote Monday. The 228-161 vote was short of the two-thirds majority needed for passage under the expedited rules used to consider it.

Judge wants cocainepenalty-gap narrowed

A federal judge who advocated harsher penalties for crack cocaine crimes said the policy had gone too far and was undermining faith in the judicial system.

DOJ_NMG_0094616

U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton told the U.S. Sentencing Commission that federal laws requiring much longer sentences for crack cocaine than for cocaine powder were "unconscionable." Walton said the laws contributed to perceptions within minority communities that courts are unfair because crack is more of a black, inner-city drug while cocaine powder is used more often in white suburbs.

The law includes a five-year prison sentence for trafficking in 5 grams of crack cocaine but requires 500 grams of cocaine powder for the same sentence.

"I never thought that the disparity should be as severe as it has become," Walton said. He advocated harsher penalties when he was associate director of the National Drug Control Policy during the first President Bush's administration.

The Sentencing Commission has recommended three times that Congress narrow the disparity.

The Justice Department says crack is more addictive and easier to sell in small doses.

Two top officials from Census Bureau leaving

The two top officials of the Census Bureau announced they are leaving. Census Bureau Director Louis Kincannon has run the bureau since 2001. He said he would stay until a new director is confirmed. Hermann Habermann, the bureau's deputy director, said he would retire in January.

Libby says he didn't have motive to lie in Plame case

Lawyers for former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby said they should be permitted to tell jurors at his perjury trial that he was not the federal official who disclosed CIA officer Valerie Plame's name to a columnist in 2003.

Libby is charged with lying to investigators in a probe triggered by the disclosure to columnist Robert Novak. Former deputy secretary of State Richard Armitage said this year that he was inadvertently the source. Libby's lawyers said in court papers that Libby should be allowed to tell jurors that since he wasn't the source he had no reason to lie to investigators.

Special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald has argued that the trial in January should not be about the leak or why only Libby was charged.

Plame and her husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson, have accused Bush administration officials of blowing her cover as retribution for her husband's criticism of prewar intelligence.

Vietnam Trade Bill Grinds To A Halt (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, November 15, 2006

In a stunning setback for President Bush on the eve of a major foreign visit, House Republican leaders Tuesday delayed until December a vote on normalizing trade relations with Vietnam.

"The decision has been made that it's not going to be able to reach the floor this week," says Kevin Madden, a spokesman for House Majority Leader Rep. John Boehner, R-Ohio.

Tuesday's delay complicates prospects for passage of a trade measure that was widely expected to sail through Congress with strong bipartisan support. And it means President Bush will arrive Friday in Hanoi empty-handed for an Asian economic summit.

"We'll just have to keep working with legislators to get this important legislation done," said Steve Norton, spokesman for the U.S. Trade Representative's office.

At issue is legislation granting Vietnam "permanent normal trade relations," which almost all U.S. trading partners enjoy. With the fast-growing Asian nation about to join the World Trade Organization, the measure is needed so that U.S. exporters can enjoy the same low tariffs as their European or Asian competitors.

Business groups that have been backing the legislation were stunned by the vote delay, which came one day after the bill attracted 228 votes, more than a House majority, but failed to pass under rules requiring a two-thirds margin for expedited passage. At the time, House Republican leaders indicated they would seek a vote under normal rules as soon as today.

"For the last three months, the conventional wisdom has been that everybody's for it; there is no opposition. … Now all of a sudden it goes down the drain," says Bill Reinsch, president of the National Foreign Trade Council.

On Capitol Hill, Madden says Republican leaders postponed the vote because they weren't sure that Democrats would stick with the bill amid labor union opposition. But Timothy Reif, lead Democratic trade counsel for the Ways and Means Committee, said there was no strategy to torpedo the bill.

Seen as the final step in a generation-long effort to bind the wounds of the Vietnam War, the measure may also have been overshadowed by both parties' votes later this week on new congressional leadership.

The long-run ramifications of Tuesday's delay are less clear.

In December, the spur of an impending presidential trip will be gone. So some business leaders worry the measure may end up being held over until the less trade-friendly Democratic Congress takes office in January.

"It's a warning shot that we're entering a very bumpy phase in trade relations. This should have been a no-brainer," says Daniel Griswold, director of the Cato Institute's Center for Trade Policy Studies.

G.O.P. House Leaders Withdraw Vietnam Trade Bill (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 14 — Prospects for Congressional approval of several free trade bills backed by the administration were thrown into doubt Tuesday when House Republican leaders abruptly withdrew the one aimed at Vietnam on the eve of President Bush's trip there this week.

The failure of the Vietnam bill was a deep disappointment and embarrassment for the White House, which had hoped that the president would hail its passage as a milestone in improvement in relations with a country where tens of thousands of Americans died more than 30 years ago.

The bill's failure touched off a fusillade of partisan recriminations, with Republicans blaming Democrats for trying to sabotage the bill and Democrats saying that some Republicans, bitter after losing the election last week, were trying to embarrass Mr. Bush.

Though the bill could come back to the House before the end of the year, some legislative aides said that its future was in doubt, along with that of several other bills lowering trade barriers with poor countries in Asia, Africa and Latin America. The administration remained hopeful, at least on the surface.

"As we've said all along, we will work with the Congressional leadership on the Vietnam bill and the other bills," Stephen Norton, a spokesman for Susan C. Schwab, the United States trade representative, said. "This is important legislation and we remain hopeful that Congress will approve it as soon as possible."

The unsettled atmosphere was another sign of the fraying of the pledges of bipartisan cooperation after last week's midterm elections, as well as a reflection of lingering sensitivities over Vietnam. Most of all, it seemed to be a sign that whatever consensus had existed for free trade bills was also starting to crumble.

A spokesman for Representative John A. Boehner, the Ohio Republican who is House majority leader in the waning weeks of this Congress, said there was a "possibility" that the bill could come back later in the lame-duck session. He said the bill was withdrawn because Democrats were turning against it.

The bill came before the House on Monday night and won a majority of votes, with 228 lawmakers voting in favor and 161 against. More than 40 lawmakers of both parties had not yet returned to Washington, however, and it fell short of the two-thirds needed to pass according to the special rules under which the bill was introduced.

House leaders immediately expressed confidence that it would pass as early as Tuesday under regular rules enabling it to be approved by a simple majority. But the "yes" votes appeared to be melting away under a sustained campaign by organized labor and other opponents who argue that the bills cost American jobs.

Kevin Madden, the spokesman for Mr. Boehner, said that the majority leader learned that an effort would be made by House Democrats to send the Vietnam measure back to the committee level, and that the maneuver might succeed. He said Democrats were being pressed by labor groups and anti-trade groups that backed them in the election.

But Democrats said the bill seemed to be a victim of disarray in Republican ranks, and antipathy toward the departing chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, Representative Bill Thomas of California, an ardent advocate of free trade.

An administration official, asking not to be identified, said there appeared to be elements of bad faith and bad feelings on all sides.

Democrats said they had asked the Republican leadership to delay the vote Monday night until Tuesday to allow dozens of lawmakers to return. But they said they were rebuffed by Mr. Boehner's and Mr. Thomas's offices, which expressed confidence that the necessary two-thirds votes were available.

The troubles of the Vietnam bill occur as lawmakers are beginning to discern where the new center of gravity is on the many issues debated in the campaign this year.

In the last few years, a large majority of Democrats have voted against trade bills, like one in 2005 lowering barriers with Central American countries, fearing that imports of textiles and other commodities produced there could throw Americans out of their jobs.

Several Democrats who won in the election this month, notably Senator-elect Sherrod Brown of Ohio, had run promising to block or slow future trade bills in Congress.

The Vietnam bill, however, had the support of crucial Democrats, including the future House speaker, Nancy Pelosi of California, and Representative Charles B. Rangel, the expected next chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, as well as the Republican leadership.

The Vietnam bill was aimed at establishing "permanent normal trade relations" with Vietnam, which is joining the World Trade Organization and, as a result, is obliged to lower trade barriers and subsidies on its products.

Failure of the measure does not bar Vietnam from joining the World Trade Organization. Rather, it would place the United States out of compliance with the organization, because the Jackson-Vanik Amendment, passed in 1975, requires an annual review of Vietnam's political and economic practices, which is not allowed under the W.T.O.'s rules.

The administration argued that granting Vietnam "normal" trade status is the best way of getting it to abide by international trade rules, including bans on copyright piracy and restrictions on foreign investments and imports.

Bush Won't Bring Vietnam Deal To Asia Summit (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In a postelection slap at the White House, Republicans put off action on a Vietnam trade bill until December, denying President Bush an accomplishment he had hoped to cite at an Asia-Pacific Rim summit this week.

The decision came as the House also delayed by a day action on extending a routine stopgap spending bill that Mr. Bush wanted to sign before departing for Moscow and then Asia last night. As a result, a White House aide will have to fly to Asia with the bill, so the president can sign it to keep government agencies operating after this weekend.

Administration officials were irritated, Democrats amused, but the moves mostly captured the fractious postelection alignment here. Smarting from losses in last week's midterms, Republicans are less eager to march to the beat of the president's drum. There is rank-and-file resentment that Mr. Bush didn't announce the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld until after Election Day, and party leaders are more preoccupied with saving their jobs than moving the president's agenda.

The White House had hoped Congress would complete action on the trade bill so Mr. Bush could announce passage when he visits Hanoi, his first visit to Vietnam. Most House members support the goal of granting permanent normal trade relations to Hanoi, but enacting it has become harder since Election Day.

When lawmakers returned Monday, the Vietnam trade bill was called up in the House under an expedited procedure that limited debate, but required a two-thirds majority for passage. The 228-161 vote fell about 32 votes short of the required margin, and the administration was surprised it lost 66 Republicans, about twice the number it had expected, given past experience on similar trade bills.

To allay concerns of domestic textiles producers, who have lost tens of thousands of jobs under pressure from low-cost labor abroad, a provision was added that would empower the administration to impose annual limits on textile and apparel shipments from Vietnam. Nonetheless, Republicans from textile states like the Carolinas rejected the measure. The Texas delegation, where Rep. Sam Hall, a former Vietnam prisoner of war, is a major influence, was prominent in its opposition, as was House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter (R., Calif.)

Given the level of discontent, Majority Leader John Boehner (R., Ohio) feared trying again too soon and risking a fatal stumble over another procedural obstacle. Already facing conservative challengers in caucus elections Friday, neither he nor Republican Whip Roy Blunt of Missouri had much appetite for twisting arms on a subject like Vietnam.

As a practical matter, House Republicans appear so consumed with leadership races that decisions on tax and spending legislation also will be postponed until after Thanksgiving. The revised stopgap bill, expected to be approved today, will run through Dec. 8, but at least another week may be needed still to resolve spending bills for the new fiscal year.

The Senate took a first step last night by approving a nearly $90 billion budget for veterans' health care and military construction projects. In talks with the House, this will grow by about $42 billion to include spending for housing and health-care benefits for the active military, and the appropriations leadership hopes to create a strong enough legislative locomotive to pull the remaining unfinished bills.

As part of the same package, senators added language guaranteeing that the inspector general for Iraq would remain operating until 10 months after 80% of the funds appropriated for the relief and reconstruction effort there have been expended. That date is expected to be near mid-2008 -- or about a year longer than current law allows the IG to operate.

The show of bipartisanship soon dissolved in a fight over farm disaster aid, as Great Plains Democrats pressed for $4.9 billion in emergency assistance. The proposal was finally pulled back -- to allow the veterans bill to pass. But not before Sen. Judd Gregg (R., N.H.), the departing Senate Budget Committee chairman, had accused Democrats of ignoring the message sent by voters last week for more fiscal discipline. "This is a daytime robbery of the Treasury," he said, "and it sells the people...who voted in this election a bill of goods they didn't think they were buying."

Analysis: Humbled Bush Faces Test Abroad (AP-Y)

By Tom Raum

AP, November 15, 2006

Humbled by elections at home, President Bush is heading into talks with leaders in Asia and Europe who will be watching for signs of weakness, uncertainty or retrenchment.

Bush's challenge is to demonstrate that U.S. leadership as the world's last superpower is undiminished on the world stage.

"I think he will go vigorous, I think he'll give a powerful performance," said Kurt Campbell, a top Pentagon official in the Clinton administration who now is with the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Some world leaders, particularly those who resented Bush's cowboy swagger and saw his decision to invade Iraq in 2003 as a dangerous act of unilateralism, might be gloating privately at the president's political misfortunes.

But the United States does not have a parliamentary system, and Bush will remain president for two more years. And other world leaders have been challenged at home, too, especially Iraq ally Tony Blair of Britain and war opponent Jacques Chirac of France, both of whom could commiserate with Bush.

The Democratic capture last week of both the House and the Senate on a tide of voter anger over Iraq diminished the president's authority at home.

That's resulted in "an interesting period here in Washington," Bush told visiting Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert this week. "You might realize the opposition party won, won the Senate and the House. And, what's interesting, is that they're beginning to understand that with victory comes responsibilities."

On the world stage, Bush's misfortunes could marginally embolden Chinese President Hu Jintao and Russian President Vladimir Putin. But, otherwise, it seems unlikely that geopolitical dynamics will be much changed.

"He acknowledges that he took a thumping. But leaders around the world take thumpings all the time," said presidential historian Thomas E. Cronin of Colorado College. The election results also telegraphs to the rest of the world, "including Iraq and Russia, that we can have peaceful elections that alter the makeup of our national government," Cronin said.

Bush was leaving Tuesday night for an eight-day tour of Asia, including stops in Singapore, Indonesia and Vietnam, where he attends a summit of Asian-Pacific nation leaders. At month's end, Bush will travel to the Baltic Sea countries of Latvia and Estonia, once claimed by the Soviet Union, for a NATO summit in Riga, Latvia.

It will be Bush's first trip to Vietnam. During the Vietnam War, he served in the U.S. in the Texas Air National Guard. Now, with the Iraq war dragging on for 3 1/2 years and the U.S. death toll still rising, many of Bush's critics are comparing Iraq to the Vietnamese quagmire.

Bush's plan to arrive in Hanoi with a new pact normalizing trade with Vietnam hit an unexpected obstacle when the lame-duck GOP-controlled House failed to approve the measure on Monday. Its Republican sponsors had hoped to use another strategy to move the bill forward this week, but they put off the effort on Tuesday. It was an embarrassing setback as the president set out on his first postelection overseas trip.

He told a group of U.S. auto executives in the Oval Office on Tuesday that he would deliver this message to trading partners: "Just treat us the way we treat you. Our markets are open for your products, and we expect your markets to be open for ours, including our automobiles."

Even before the elections, some of the go-it-alone tactics of Bush's first term had already been replaced by great diplomacy, including U.S. efforts to rely on other countries to defuse nuclear tensions with North Korea and Iran.

"Some of the people who used to criticize us for unilateralism are now beginning to criticize us for not taking more decisive individual action," said Stephen Hadley, the president's national security adviser.

Not only is Bush under pressure at home from Democrats and some Republicans to change course on Iraq, but he is encountering calls from some U.S. allies, including most recently Blair, to reach out more to Iran and Syria in hopes of promoting broader stability in the region given the changing nature of the battle in Iraq.

Bush said Monday that Iran must first verifiably halt its enrichment of uranium as a precondition to talks. If Syria wants to contribute to the peace process, it should leave Lebanon for good and stop harboring terrorists, Bush suggested.

As presidential terms wind down, incumbents find themselves increasingly challenged in getting domestic programs through Congress and seem to prefer spending much of their time on foreign policy.

Nixon did it, traveling to Moscow to sign an arms-control agreement as the Watergate scandal was bringing down his government. Clinton did it after surviving an impeachment battle with the GOP-led Congress, spending the last days of his term trying to arrange a peace deal in the Middle East.

And Eisenhower did it after the Democrats swept the 1958 midterm elections, finding the only leverage he had at home was to veto bills, and preferring touring the world instead.

There's a difference. Eisenhower was greeted as a hero. Clinton as he traveled drew huge crowds and affection. But Bush is widely disliked throughout much of the world.

Bush still has two more years in power, despite the midterm elections repudiating Republicans.

"The negative, obviously, is that he's been repudiated," said Fred Greenstein, a political science professor at Princeton University. "The positive is that he's been chastised and tempered and we're seeing much less of the my-way-or-the-highway approach to diplomacy and international relations."

Protectionists Punish Vietnam (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 15, 2006

THE HOST COUNTRY for the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum is not your father's Vietnam. Its Ho Chi Minh mausoleum notwithstanding, the Hanoi that President Bush will visit Friday is the capital of a nation that is prospering as a result of its embrace of private enterprise and freer markets. America may have lost the Vietnam War, but American values are slowly winning the peace.

A 2001 bilateral trade deal between Hanoi and Washington helped solidify Vietnam's reforms, and the country has become the second-fastest-growing economy in Asia after China, not to mention an anchor of stability in a region once renowned for its instability. Vietnam, in short, has been one of the more positive global stories in the last decade, and it remains a nation with strong emotional bonds to the United States.

All of which makes the cavalier rejection by Congress of a trade normalization measure so unconscionable, not to mention embarrassing to the president. Under a relic of the Cold War years, Vietnam's U.S. trade preferences are subject to annual congressional review; before Vietnam can join the World Trade Organization, that law has to be rescinded. Yet on Monday, the House turned down a measure to do so when it failed to achieve the required two-thirds vote under a procedure that limited debate. Though the bill can be resubmitted under normal procedures, thus requiring only a majority vote to pass, GOP leaders have decided to wait until next month to try again.

The vote sends a disastrous signal to the people of Vietnam (the message being that the superpower that once bombed you isn't too excited to see you prosper) and to Asian leaders.

Beyond Vietnam, the cause of free trade may be in for a rough time once Democrats take control of both houses of Congress. There are troubling signs that the party's new protectionist wing will try to torpedo upcoming trade pacts with Peru and Colombia, and stand in the way of progress on a comprehensive deal to lower global trade barriers under the Doha round of WTO talks. Also endangered is Bush's fast-track trade authority, which allows him to sign trade deals subject only to a yes-or-no vote by Congress. It expires in July.

All of this is unfortunate. Vietnam is far from the only country where free trade has made a profound difference. Open markets create customers for U.S. goods and provide cheap imports for U.S. consumers while improving relations around the world and boosting economies. A successful Doha round would probably do more to relieve poverty in Africa than all the foreign aid doled out to the continent put together.

President Clinton steered the Democratic Party away from protectionism, a move that benefited the party and the nation. Taking a step backward now would only hurt both.

Democrats And Trade (WSJ)

Triumphant Democrats are talking up their new moderation, and we're about to get an early test of their sincerity: Are they willing to support the kind of trade opening with very poor countries that Bill Clinton supported? Or will they take orders from the AFL-CIO?

At issue this week are a bilateral free-trade pact already signed with Peru, and an amendment to extend a key provision of the African Growth and Opportunity Act (AGOA) that Mr. Clinton and Republicans passed in a bipartisan spirit in 2000. The trade bills will be a particular test for Charlie Rangel, the soon-to-be chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, who professes to care deeply about the world's poor. Here's his chance to prove it.

The African provision allows sub-Saharan Africa to source fabric for its apparel industry from any country in the world and then sell the garments in the U.S. duty-free. This "third country provision" has made garment assembly in Africa competitive and boosted sub-Saharan appeal as a destination for capital from the apparel industry.

AGOA has a 15-year life but the "third country" provision is set to expire in 2007. If Africa is forced to once again buy only U.S.-made fabric to maintain its U.S. duty-free status, its apparel industry will vanish. Clothing makers will pack up and move, taking something like 150,000 jobs with them. The biggest winner would probably be China as garment makers relocated to Asia.

GOP Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas has crafted a bill to extend the third-country provision through September 2008 and provide new investment incentives for U.S. companies in the region. Haiti, the poorest country in the Western Hemisphere, also gets a small but important third-country fabric provision. Mr. Rangel was one of those who supported a U.S. invasion of Haiti in 1994 in the name of helping its poor citizens; free trade is a lot easier.

The case for ratifying the U.S.-Peru trade pact is just as obvious. Peru already enjoys broad duty-free access to the U.S. under the Andean Trade Preferences act. This deal would preserve that access but also open Peruvian markets to U.S. exporters and expand choice for Peruvian consumers. Under the deal, 80% of U.S. industrial and textile products, and more than two-thirds of U.S. farm exports, would enter Peru duty free immediately. Most other barriers would be gone within 15 years.

According to the American Farm Bureau Federation, farm exports to Peru could increase by $705 million a year. U.S. producers of machinery, plastics, cereals and mineral fuels, as well as wheat, cotton and coarse grains all expect strong export growth if it passes. On the other hand, if the U.S. walks away from Peru, the leadership in Lima will likely look to the EU and its Latin American neighbors for trade agreements, putting U.S. producers at a disadvantage.

Big Labor is pushing Democrats to block a vote and demand that the pact be renegotiated to include more labor protections. But Peru's labor laws are nearly identical to those in Chile, with which the U.S. already has a free-trade agreement. Peru protects the right to collectively bargain and its laws are consistent with International Labor Organization standards. The AFL-CIO's real game here is to force provisions on Lima that will increase the clout of unions in Peru. Never mind that these are issues for Peruvians to decide, not to be imposed by Big Labor gringos from Washington.

Ratifying the pact would also help Peru resist the influence of Venezuelan strongman Hugo Chávez, who is pushing his own regional trade bloc to exclude the U.S. and isolate South America. Later this month the U.S. is expected to sign a free trade pact with Colombia, another country that wants closer relations with the U.S. and is resisting Venezuela's cold embrace. A number of Democrats were only too happy to praise Mr. Chávez last year in return for receiving some of his discount oil, but Mr. Rangel denounced his recent anti-American rant at the U.N. Killing the Peru and Colombian deals would harm American interests and hand Mr. Chávez a strategic gift.

The AFL-CIO is claiming its new "economic populism" helped Democrats win last week, though there's little polling evidence to show it. In any case, it is a strange populism that advertises its power by trampling on the economic aspirations of the world's poorest citizens. Is this what Democratic control of Congress is going to stand for?

Vietnamese Activists Cite Curbs On Dissent (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, November 15, 2006

HANOI -- Vietnamese democracy and human rights activists accused the government yesterday of stepping up harassment in an effort to silence them ahead of President Bush's visit and a high-profile economic summit this week.

The activists, some of whom are under house arrest, praised a vote in the U.S. House of Representatives on Monday that denied permanent normal trade relations (PNTR) status to Vietnam and criticized Vietnam's removal from the State Department's blacklist of countries that limit religious freedom.

"The PNTR status must come with a condition that the government respect human rights for our own people," said Pham Hong Son, an activist who was detained for two years beginning in 2002 and has been under house arrest for another two.

He said he was detained because of an article on democracy that he translated into Vietnamese from the Web site of the U.S. Embassy in Hanoi and posted separately on the Internet. His claim could not be independently verified because the government does not comment on dissident cases.

The government accuses democracy activists of plotting to destabilize the country and to shame it before the 21 heads of state expected at the annual Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) summit this weekend.

The Foreign Ministry called Monday's House vote "very regretful, not suitable, and not serving the mutual interest and wishes of the peoples of the two countries."

Human rights advocates in the House, such as Rep. Christopher H. Smith, New Jersey Republican, led opposition to the bill, which fell short of a needed two-thirds majority by a single vote. The bill is not expected to come back for another vote before the end of the month.

The deal was part of a flurry of activity by the two sides, seemingly designed to clear away irritants on the eve of Mr. Bush's departure for Vietnam.

On the same day as the vote, a Vietnamese-American was released from prison and allowed to return to the United States, and Vietnam was removed from a list of countries that severely restrict religious freedoms.

John V. Hanford III, the State Department's at-large ambassador for international religious freedom, denied Monday that politics or business played any role in the latter decision, saying Vietnam had taken a number of specific steps to get off the list.

He said Hanoi had clarified laws on religious policy; greatly curbed the practice of "forced renunciations" of religious belief; released dozens of Buddhist, Catholic, Protestant and Hoa Hao religious prisoners; allowed previously outlawed groups and denominations to register and practice their faith, including 39 new congregations in Ho Chi Minh City alone in the past month; and permitted greater freedom for Protestant and Catholic congregations, including a sharp increase in the number of new Vietnamese priests and ministers.

Mr. Hanford acknowledged that "important work remains to be done," especially in more remote regions of the country. Protestant Montagnard groups from the central highlands have complained of harsh repression, and even torture and killing of believers by the authorities.

Nevertheless, Mr. Hanford said, "We are hearing from every religious group that we meet with that conditions have improved, that there's really a change in the attitude."

However, Vietnamese activists complained of continuing religious repression in an open letter published in Washington yesterday.

"The Vietnamese people do not have freedom of religion and worship," said the writers, a group of engineers, lawyers, professors and religious leaders grouped under the name "A Call For Democracy."

"Religious organizations which were not established by the state, such as the Unified Buddhist Church of Vietnam, the Hoa Hao Buddhist Church, the Cao Dai congregation and the Mennonite Church of Vietnam, are all prohibited from operating," the letter said.

Amnesty International agreed that the practice of religion "remains under strict control" by the government in Vietnam.

"Church members seen as opposing state policies continue to be harassed, arrested and imprisoned," the human rights group said. "Church property has been destroyed. For example, a small Mennonite church in Ho Chi Minh City was destroyed in May."

Mr. Son said the decision to take Vietnam off the list was "not good news for those who care about human rights."

The activist cited at least three attempts by security police this month to warn him against speaking with foreigners who are arriving in Hanoi for the APEC summit.

On two occasions, he said, masked men on a motorcycle ran into his motorbike while he was riding it -- first with his two sons and then with his wife -- injuring him and damaging the motorbike. Democracy advocates and other government opponents said the authorities regularly engineer such "accidents" to send them a warning.

Nguyen Van Dai, a lawyer and member of Vietnam's Human Rights Committee, said he has been invited to meet with Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper during the APEC summit, but will not go.

"I can't leave my house because it's under heavy surveillance," he said. "They will use force if they have to in order to prevent me from going anywhere."

Both Mr. Son and Mr. Dai spoke by telephone and warned a reporter against visiting their houses. All interviewed activists said they strive to achieve their goals of democracy and human rights only by peaceful means.

Mr. Pham noted that the government recently released political prisoners under pressure from Washington, but said that many of them are now under house arrest. He added that he personally knew at least 10 such persons.

Call For Rethink Of US-Asean Trade Ties (FT)

By John Aglionby

Financial Times, November 15, 2006

The US needs to reassess its strategy towards south-east Asia while countries in the region should take concrete steps to enhance their competitiveness in order to optimise trade and investment between the two, the US Chamber of Commerce recommends in its first report on ways to boost mutual business links.

“[The region] is our fourth-largest trading partner and we’ve hardly scratched the surface,” Tom Donohue, the president and chief executive of the US Chamber of Commerce, told the Financial Times while in Jakarta on a regional tour. “It’s got potential written all over it as well as challenges.”

The study, Southeast Asia: dynamic opportunities for US competitiveness, written in conjunction with the regional American Chambers of Commerce and to be released in Singapore on Wedenesday, sets out the steps the chamber thinks the US and the 10 members of the Association of South East Asian Nations should take to ensure an expansion of trade and investment between them.

"This publicly commits us to a whole lot of serious dialogue, it forces us to focus, it forces us to collect our thoughts," Mr Donohue said. "We've expanded our staff in the region and we're going to establish resources to encourage trade and investment."

Recommendations for the US government include investing in capacity-building initiatives that support regional economic reform and integration, providing resources to bolster programmes in the region by institutions such as the US Export-Import Bank, raising awareness across the US of economic opportunities in south-east Asia and streamlining visa procedures.

South-east Asian nations need to establish predictable investment regimes, promote good corporate governance, increase protection of intellectual property, harmonise standards, integrate customs procedures and establish a more open and transparent agricultural market.

"If you think you've got almost 600m people and you think of the growth of the middle class, the move away from poverty, the engagement in the global economy, you don't have to be the smartest guy on the block to realise we should be investing more here," Mr Donohue said.

Japanese Premier Plans To Fortify U.S. Ties In Meeting With Bush (WP)

By Anthony Faiola

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

TOKYO, Nov. 14 -- Prime Minister Shinzo Abe on Tuesday outlined a vision for a stronger Japan and vowed to fortify the U.S.-Japan security alliance during his first official meeting with President Bush in Hanoi this weekend.

In a wide-ranging interview with The Washington Post, Abe, who succeeded Junichiro Koizumi in September, also said he would push to redraft Japan's pacifist constitution.

In the current charter, which was drafted by the United States during its occupation of Japan following World War II, Tokyo effectively renounces the use of virtually any form of aggression. Abe, saying he hoped to foster a "new spirit" in Japan, said he would seek a new constitution within six years -- referring to the maximum time a prime minister can serve in office.

Few postwar Japanese leaders have secured such long terms. Given new threats facing Japan -- most notably a nuclear North Korea -- Abe suggested that his administration could take the interim step of reinterpreting the existing constitution to increase defensive capabilities.

Abe noted that it is unclear whether Tokyo is permitted under its own constitution to shoot down a ballistic missile flying over Japanese territory en route to the United States. Rules of engagement for Japanese troops on overseas peacekeeping missions are also severely limited by the constitution. Under current interpretations, for instance, Japanese troops are not permitted to defend themselves -- or U.S. or other allied troops -- unless directly fired upon.

But leading Japanese scholars have said policy changes to address such issues may not require the adoption of a new constitution, and could instead be made through official clarifications issued by the cabinet. While declining to provide a timetable for declaring new security protocols, Abe called for options to be analyzed on a case-by-case basis.

"We need to take up each individual example and study whether they . . . infringe upon the constitution," he said.

The Bush administration has backed the notion of a more assertive Japan, viewing Tokyo as an increasingly important partner at a time of dwindling support for the administration's foreign policies among U.S. allies. But the idea has unnerved critics in China and South Korea, where memories of World War II-era atrocities still run deep.

Since North Korea tested a nuclear device last month, some observers have even feared that Japan might seek to develop its own nuclear weapons. Yet most domestic scholars say Japan, the only nation to ever suffer a nuclear attack, is unlikely to ever seriously consider such an option, even if it saw itself as the primary target for North Korean aggression. Abe echoed those sentiments Tuesday, vowing that Japan would adhere to its nonnuclear principles.

Still, some right-wing leaders here, including a key member of Abe's ruling Liberal Democratic Party, have called for a broader public debate on whether Japan should possess nuclear weapons. While Abe said he would move to prevent any "official" debate, he added that he could not stop private citizens from expressing their views.

"For the general public to discuss this matter -- for example, academics, scholars or journalists -- is the freedom of the Japanese people," said Abe, 52. "I am not in a position of restricting that."

Abe, considered hawkish by most analysts here, has taken the global lead in calling for international sanctions against North Korea for conducting a nuclear test and has imposed its own sanctions on the Pyongyang government. On Tuesday, Abe approved a series of new measures banning the export of luxury goods to North Korea, an action aimed directly at the authoritarian elite in Pyongyang who revel in high-end Japanese goods.

During his first six weeks in office, Abe has at times sought to moderate his tone. For instance, while he has backed Koizumi's controversial decision to pay annual homage at a Tokyo shrine honoring the country's military dead, including World War II-era war criminals, Abe has refused to say whether he will continue to make such visits himself.

"Now that he is in office, Abe is trying to hide his beliefs," said Tenzo Okumura, a leading member of the opposition Democratic Party. "As the prime minister of Japan, he has the responsibility to the Japanese people to be clear on his positions, but he has chosen to be ambiguous."

This weekend, Abe will meet with Bush at the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit in Hanoi.

The prime minister said he would use the occasion to stress the importance of maintaining a strong alliance with the United States and a firm line on North Korea. Some U.S. Democrats and Republicans have questioned Bush's refusal to hold direct negotiations with the North Koreans. Instead, the United States has agreed to meet them only within the context of six-party talks that also include China, Japan, Russia and South Korea. Japanese officials have favored Bush's approach, which has given Tokyo a greater role in the issue.

When asked whether he felt that policy might change with the new Democrat-controlled Congress, Abe reiterated Japan's desire to maintain the current multilateral format. "I believe that the six-party talks is the place to resolve the North Korean issue," he said.

India's Nuclear Record, Iran Links Questioned Ahead Of Senate Vote (AFP)

By P. Parameswaran

AFP, November 15, 2006

A non-partisan US Congressional study has underlined lawmakers' unease over India's non-proliferation record and its links with nuclear renegade Iran, on the eve of a Senate vote on a landmark US atomic deal with New Delhi.

The report by the Congressional Research Service raised the issue of whether India had adequate teeth to implement export control regulations in efforts to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons.

In 2004, the United States imposed sanctions on two Indian scientists for nuclear related transfers to Iran, which is facing sanctions for refusing to comply with UN demands it freeze its uranium enrichment work.

The Congressional report by Sharon Squassoni, a national defense specialist, noted that President George W. Bush's administration had not formally responded to claims that India had a "flawed" nonproliferation record in the nuclear area.

It also cited allegations that New Delhi had a "poorly implemented" national export control system and an "illicit" procurement system for its own nuclear weapons program, as well as a procurement system that "may unwittingly transfer sensitive information" about uranium enrichment.

"Indias nonproliferation record continues to be scrutinized, as India continues to take steps to strengthen its own export controls," the report said ahead of an expected Senate vote this week on the US-India civilian nuclear deal clinched by Bush and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh in March.

Under the deal, India, a non-signatory of the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT), would be allowed access to long-denied civilian nuclear technology in return for placing its atomic reactors under global safeguards.

To facilitate the deal, the US Congress has to create an exception for India from some of the requirements of the US Atomic Energy Act, which currently prohibits nuclear sales to non-NPT signatories.

The US House of Representatives gave its thumbs-up to the deal in July but a Senate vote had been delayed due to legislative elections last week that resulted in Democratic control of both chambers in the new Congress from January.

The current Congress is Republican dominated but the party is divided on the Indian nuclear deal.

"President Bush has tried to sell this nuclear deal by claiming that India is our natural ally, but as Ronald Reagan once said, 'Trust, but verify.'" said Edward Markey, who co-chairs a House bipartisan taskforce on nonproliferation.

DOJ_NMG_0094626

"It is clear that on the issue of preventing Iran from going nuclear -- and on the crucial issue of nonproliferation -- India's record is not encouraging," he said.

Squassoni suggested that some kinds of Indian support might be more important than others, for example, in backing a diplomatic drive to pursue negotiations with Iran or by coming aboard the US-led Proliferation Security Initiative aimed at containing the spread of unconventional weapons.

She said Indias long relationship with Iran and its support of Non-Aligned Movement (NAM) positions on nonproliferation "are obstacles" to Indias taking a hard line on Iran.

Yet, the Bush Administration, she added, had asserted that US-India nuclear cooperation would bring India into the "nonproliferation mainstream."

US weapons experts have warned that forging a civilian nuclear agreement with non-NPT member India would not only make it harder to enforce rules against renegades Iran and North Korea, but also set a dangerous precedent for other countries with nuclear ambitions.

Lawmakers Concerned About U.S.-India Nuclear Trade Deal (WP)

By Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

Congressional leaders requested a secret intelligence assessment of India's nuclear program and its government's ties to Iran in January amid concerns about a White House effort to provide nuclear technology to New Delhi. Ten months later, as the Senate prepares to vote on nuclear trade with India, the intelligence assessment has yet to be seen on Capitol Hill, congressional and intelligence sources say.

The pending nuclear deal with India would reverse years of U.S. policies aimed at preventing the spread of nuclear weapons. U.S. law forbids selling civilian nuclear technology to countries such as India that have refused to sign the Non-Proliferation Treaty. Arms-control experts, concerned that the deal would have major ramifications for U.S. efforts to stop nuclear programs in Iran and North Korea, said yesterday that the White House plan would allow India to rapidly increase its nuclear arsenal.

For the Bush administration, the deal is part of a strategy to accelerate India's rise as a regional counterweight to China. Further, officials have argued that a nuclear arsenal in the hands of democratic India, which conducted its first nuclear test in 1974, would not be a threat to the United States.

The White House wants legislation for the deal approved by the lame-duck Congress and is hoping the Senate will vote on it by Friday. The bill would carve out an India-specific exception to long-standing laws that forbid nuclear trade with countries that have not signed the NPT. Sen. Harry M. Reid (Nev.), who will become majority leader when Democrats take control of the Senate in January, has said that he wants the India bill to come up before the current Congress ends in December.

In July, the House voted in favor of a similar bill. Lawmakers did not know at the time that the Bush administration was planning to sanction two Indian firms for selling missile parts to Iran -- a fact that seemed to undercut administration assurances that India's nonproliferation record is excellent.

Democrats later accused the administration of deception, and Senate and House staff members said yesterday that they are concerned that the White House is still pushing for congressional approval without providing needed information, such as the intelligence report.

In a Jan. 23 letter to John D. Negroponte, director of national intelligence, the ranking chairmen of the House and Senate foreign relations panels asked for "an interagency assessment" of India's nuclear program, its record of proliferation and its ties to Iran. The letter was signed by Reps. Henry J. Hyde (R-Ill.) and Tom Lantos (D-Calif.) and Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.) -- all of whom have been generally supportive of the India deal but have raised concerns about the proliferation implications and about India's relations with Iran.

The four asked Negroponte to assess how India is implementing its nonproliferation commitments, the adequacy of its export controls and the movement into and out of India of materials to make weapons of mass destruction.

Much of the deal rests on assurances that India will separate its nuclear and civilian facilities so that the United States can be certain that the nuclear technology it provides will go only to the civilian energy side. With a population of 1 billion, India has vast energy needs and civilian technology would help it to modernize. But the arrangement would also free up India's nuclear infrastructure so that it could be devoted solely to weapons.

The letter asked the intelligence community to gauge the extent to which the deal "may enhance India's ability to produce fissile material for weapons." The senators also asked for a full assessment of India's positions on Iran.

In a Feb. 9 response to the letter, Negroponte wrote: "We look forward to providing the necessary information in the near future." Copies of both letters were read to The Washington Post. Negroponte's office said yesterday that it could not comment on the letters or the status of the assessment.

Several congressional sources said that the National Intelligence Council provided two oral briefings, in March and April, that focused on the history of U.S.-India relations as well as the beginnings of India's nuclear program, but that the briefings did not address the specific information requested in the letter. "We expect a written intelligence product," one Republican said. Four other staff members -- two Democrats and two Republicans -- also said that they expected a complete intelligence assessment that responds point by point to the issues raised in the letter. All spoke on the condition of anonymity, fearing that public comment would put their congressional jobs at risk.

The terms of a U.S.-India accord, worked out in secret in 2005, took Congress by surprise. Congress must approve any final deal before it can be implemented. While both parties support a strategic alliance with India, some have voiced concerns about its strong ties to Iran.

Tehran and New Delhi signed an extensive agreement in 2003 and their military, scientific, political and economic ties are growing.

A report issued yesterday by the Congressional Research Service, which does in-depth analysis for Congress, said that "India's long relationship with Iran" made it unlikely that India would take a hard line on Tehran. India does not support nuclear weapons for Iran, but "its views of the Iranian threat and appropriate responses differ significantly from U.S. views."

The report also found that entities in India and Iran "appear to have engaged in very limited nuclear, chemical and missile related transfers over the years."

Commerce Secretary Embraces Trade Negotiations With China (WSJ)

By Andrew Batson

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

BEIJING -- Secretary of Commerce Carlos Gutierrez urged continued negotiation -- rather than confrontation -- with China on ways to address its yawning trade gap with the U.S., saying China's leaders are moving forward with measures to address major complaints such as counterfeiting.

Mr. Gutierrez, speaking yesterday after meetings with officials including Chinese Premier Wen Jiabao and Minister of Commerce Bo Xilai, admitted he still needs more concrete results if he is to quiet domestic critics of his approach. The U.S. trade deficit with China is on track this year to far exceed last year's record $202 billion, while the Democratic victory in last week's congressional elections creates new political pressure to address trade concerns.

"The important thing is that there is a great deal of understanding of what needs to be done" among top Chinese officials, Mr. Gutierrez said. "Obviously the proof always is in the results, and we know that we have a lot of work to do to continue to deliver results."

Mr. Wen expressed hope that negotiations could help avoid a more serious breakdown in trade relations. "Facts prove that consultation and dialogue are the right way to settle bilateral economic and trade frictions. Trade protectionism will only harm the common interests of both sides," the official Xinhua news agency quoted him as saying during his meeting with Mr. Gutierrez.

Reducing piracy and counterfeiting in China has become a major goal of U.S. and European trade policy. Mr. Gutierrez pointed to cooperation between Chinese and U.S. law enforcement on cases involving counterfeit drugs, favorable rulings from Chinese courts on the trademarks and patents of U.S. companies, and new enforcement actions against the piracy of DVDs, CDs, and college textbooks.

The Bush administration has faced pressure from lawmakers to file a case at the World Trade Organization against China's intellectual-property practices. Mr. Gutierrez said the U.S. isn't ruling out that option, but he emphasized that "our preference is to solve issues through dialogue."

Mr. Gutierrez, in an interview, said he also continued to lobby China to grant improved access to markets like financial services, film and retail.

U.S. Warns China On Piracy, Market Access (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

BEIJING, Nov. 14 -- Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez said Tuesday that he is telling concerned Chinese officials that the best way to avoid trade restrictions from the new Democratic-controlled Congress is to act swiftly on U.S. complaints about brand pirating and market access.

"We don't want to give anyone the justification for protectionist trade policies, which we think would be a big mistake," Gutierrez said in an interview at a U.S.-sponsored roundtable on intellectual property rights.

The suggestion from Gutierrez responded to worries among some Chinese officials and other specialists that Democrats assuming House and Senate committee chairmanships will be less friendly toward China than their outgoing Republican counterparts, particularly on such issues as trade and human rights.

The presumptive incoming speaker of the House, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), has been noted here as a particular critic of the Communist Party government and its human rights record. In general, Chinese specialists said, Democratic leaders also seem more willing than Republicans to lend a sympathetic ear to complaints from labor unions that U.S. jobs are being lost as companies expand to China, seeking to benefit from a cheap workforce.

Gutierrez said the danger of protectionist measures in Congress had been a subject of concern during his three previous trips to China as commerce secretary. Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) last year stirred worries here by seeking punitive 27.5 percent duties on Chinese products unless Beijing revalued its currency against the dollar. The effort went nowhere under the Republicans, but concerns have arisen anew in China since Democrats gained control of both houses of Congress in last week's midterm elections.

The underlying problem, China's trade surplus with the United States, has not subsided. The U.S. deficit with China was $202 billion last year and hit $166 billion in the first nine months of this year. Heeding U.S. concerns, China has allowed its currency, the yuan, to revalue slightly against the dollar over the past six months, but at a rate dismissed as too slow and too little by Schumer and other critics.

"Those who espouse protectionism as a legitimate economic policy have a loud voice," Gutierrez said in a speech to participants in the roundtable discussion that addressed those concerns. "They cite specific imbalances. And they point to the lack of robust protection" of intellectual property "in China as a top reason why we should put protectionist policies in place. This would be the wrong course. However, we can't disprove the critics with rhetoric. We need results."

Specifically, Gutierrez said China should strike harder at criminal groups that pirate U.S. brands, enacting laws that make prosecution easier. In response, China's commerce minister, Bo Xilai, told reporters that Chinese prosecutors are bringing more cases against counterfeiters and that the government has financed 50 centers around the country to gather information on intellectual property violations.

In practice, however, knockoff brands have become part of the scene in Beijing and other Chinese cities, where street vendors openly hawk pirated DVD movies and small shops sell fake designer labels. Although police occasionally crack down, enforcement has been sporadic at best, in part because the livelihoods of many poor merchants depend on such trade.

Gutierrez said greater market access for U.S. movie companies also could help discourage such trade, making legitimate discs more available. Banking and retail merchandising are two other areas where regulations should be loosened to allow U.S. business greater freedom to operate, he said.

Although the deficit remains large, since China's accession to the World Trade Organization, U.S. exports to China have grown about 20 percent a year, making China the fourth-largest U.S. export market, Bo told Gutierrez. So far this year, they have risen 34 percent over the comparable period last year, totaling $40.2 billion.

U.S. Official Presses China To Punish Piracy (NYT)

By David Lague

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

BEIJING, Nov. 14 — China should intensify its fight against intellectual property theft with a crackdown on organized crime gangs that are responsible for widespread copyright piracy, Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez said Tuesday.

As the United States maintained pressure on China to curb rampant counterfeiting, Mr. Gutierrez called on Beijing to make it easier to prosecute criminals who steal intellectual property.

He said contacts between American and Chinese legal authorities and recent enforcement actions had revealed that organized crime was involved in many piracy cases.

“These are criminal organizations and one of the things they do is run a supply chain for illicit goods, pirated goods,” Mr. Gutierrez said during an interview on the second day of a four-day visit to China at the head of an American business delegation. “This is organized crime. One day it could be T-shirts, the next day it could be watches and the next day it could be medicines.”

With China on track to record a huge trade surplus with the United States this year, Mr. Gutierrez renewed a warning that intellectual property theft in China was a threat to trade ties.

Protectionists in the United States have become an increasingly vocal group, he said in a speech to business executives, adding, “and they point to the lack of robust I.P. protection in China as a top reason why we should put protectionist policies in place.”

Mr. Gutierrez said the theft of intellectual property was costing United States businesses an estimated $2.3 billion a year.

Mr. Gutierrez acknowledged that the Chinese authorities were stepping up their efforts to enforce laws protecting intellectual property. He noted the recent Chinese seizures of counterfeit Tamiflu, a drug used to treat influenza, in an operation that involved cooperation with United States law enforcement agencies.

Envoys To Work On Nuclear Talks Strategy (AP)

By Bo-mi Lim

AP, November 15, 2006

Nuclear envoys from the United States, South Korea and Japan will meet Wednesday to seek a common strategy ahead of the resumption of long-stalled nuclear disarmament talks with North Korea, officials said.

The U.S. and its top two Asian allies planned to meet on the sidelines of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit in Vietnam where North Korea is expected to be a dominant theme.

South Korea said Tuesday the six-party disarmament talks that broke down in 2005 could resume by mid-December. The U.S. administration has ruled out a first meeting in November but said it hoped for a session in December.

North Korea agreed to return to the talks after it shocked the world by testing a nuclear device on Oct. 9, a move that triggered U.N. sanctions.

"We have said all along that we want to start the six-party talks as soon as possible but a key element of that is to be well prepared because when we do start, we want to be sure that we can really make progress," U.S. nuclear envoy Christopher Hill said Tuesday.

Hill will meet South Korea's top nuclear negotiator Chun Yung-woo and Japan's Kenichiro Sasae Wednesday morning to consider ways to pressure Pyongyang to give up its nuclear weapons program. China and Russia are also parties to the talks.

"It's a process for coordinating the positions of partner countries before the six-party talks," a Japanese government official in Hanoi said Tuesday of the upcoming meeting.

The impoverished North has often pursued a strategy of brinksmanship to gain aid and security guarantees. Chun said Tuesday that talks must be substantive.

"There should not be a breakdown," Chun Yung-woo told reporters after flying into Hanoi. "If we do not make substantial progress, the future for the six-party talks will be very unclear. There should not be talks for the sake of talks."

There are divisions among the parties to the talks over how strongly to enforce U.N. sanctions against the North for its nuclear test. Japan and the U.S. have called for tough measures, while South Korea favors a softer approach.

Seoul said Monday it will not fully participate in a U.S.-led Proliferation Security Initiative that is largely aimed at stopping North Korean weapons traffic at sea, insisting it is doing enough to prevent the North's proliferation.

Another major sticking point at the nuclear talks is North Korea's demand that the U.S. lift financial restrictions imposed for the communist regime's alleged illegal activities, which Washington says include counterfeiting and money laundering.

The last round of six-party talks was a year ago, when negotiators failed to make progress toward implementing an earlier agreement in which the North agreed to give up its nuclear programs in exchange for aid and security guarantees.

The 21-nation APEC bloc, formed in 1989 as an economic forum, was scheduled to meet on Saturday and Sunday. A draft APEC joint communique did not mention North Korea, though it stressed the general importance of ensuring security to advance the prosperity of the region, saying the leaders are "determined to continue efforts to combat terrorism."

A final version of the declaration will be released after leaders including President Bush, Chinese President Hu Jintao, Russian President Vladimir Putin and Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe wrap up their weekend summit in Vietnam's capital Hanoi.

US Envoy Says NKorea Talks Could Come In Early December (AFP)

By Peter Harmsen

AFP, November 15, 2006

Envoys involved in six-party talks on dismantling North Korea's nuclear program are scrambling to set a date to resume negotiations next month, the chief US delegate said.

"We have been in very close contact with the Chinese lately, and I think we do want to try to fix the date very soon," Christopher Hill told reporters after meeting with his South Korean counterpart, Chung Yung-Woo, in Hanoi.

"We will probably use the next few weeks to be very busy and maybe begin the talks sometime in early December," added Hill, who went directly into a trilateral meeting with Chung and Japanese negotiator Kenichiro Sasae.

The flurry of diplomatic activity came on the sidelines of a week-long Asia Pacific gathering, bringing together key Pacific Rim countries including the five states involved in the talks with North Korea.

The North's nuclear program was expected to be one of the key issues addressed by ministers and leaders at the annual summit of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) forum in the Vietnamese capital.

The APEC gathering comes less than two weeks after Pyongyang agreed in secret negotiations in Beijing to return to the six-nation talks, which involve the two Koreas, China, Japan, Russia and the United States.

The negotiations, stalled a year ago when the North walked out over US action to freeze its accounts in a Macau bank, are aimed at convincing the regime of Kim Jong-Il to abandon its nuclear ambitions.

"We had a good discussion on how we might structure the next round of the six-party talks," Hill said of his talks with his South Korean counterpart.

"That will be the main subject of the trilateral meeting" with Sasae, he added.

"We all feel the process really needs to show progress and this is why we need to plan this next round very carefully."

North Korea sparked international concern in July when it test-fired seven ballistic missiles, and then stunned the world in October with its first atom bomb test which triggered UN sanctions against the reclusive communist regime.

The North is the only one of the six nations involved in the talks that is not a member of APEC.

The US negotiator said there was "great harmony" among the five nations as to how to handle the North Korean crisis.

When asked why envoys from China and Russia had not met the other three negotiators in Hanoi on Wednesday, a Japanese official said the five nations did not want Pyongyang to feel that they were "ganging up" on the regime.

"The final objective is not to antagonize North Korea, but for them to abandon their nuclear program," he said.

APEC leaders are to express "strong support for a diplomatic solution" to the crisis and "concern" over last month's atom bomb test, according to a draft joint communique obtained Wednesday by AFP.

The leaders will call for quick implementation of a September 2005 agreement under which North Korea agreed to scrap its nuclear program in exchange for energy and economic aid, and resumption of the six-party talks as soon as possible.

The Japanese official said APEC leaders were unlikely to issue a separate statement on North Korea, which would be seen as a more direct expression of concern than references to the crisis in a final joint communique.

"APEC is not a framework to have such a statement," he told AFP.

Bush Off To Asia To Talk Trade, Grapple With Korean Nuclear Crisis (AFP)

By P. Parameswaran

AFP, November 15, 2006

US President George W. Bush has left to nail down trade ties with Asia and grapple with the North Korean nuclear crisis on his first foreign trip since his party's drubbing in legislative elections.

The US leader will transit in Moscow, where he will hold a brief airport meeting with Russian President Vladimir Putin, before arriving in the staunch ally city state of Singapore on the first leg of his regional trip.

He would also visit Indonesia, the world's most populous Muslim nation, and Vietnam, where he would attend a summit of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) forum at the communist nation's capital Hanoi.

Bush would discuss with Putin, Chinese President Hu Jintao, Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe and other leaders of the 21-member APEC group issues ranging from a prospective Asia-Pacific free trade agreement to terrorism and nuclear proliferation.

"One of the things that the President likes about the APEC summit is when you get 21 leaders of economies together you get a lot of opportunities for discussion," a senior US official said ahead of the eight-day trip.

Aside from meetings with leaders of Singapore, Indonesia and Vietnam during his visit to these nations, Bush would hold one-on-one talks with his counterparts from China, Japan, South Korea, Russia and Australia on the sidelines of the APEC summit.

He would also hold a meeting with a group of all seven Southeast Asian leaders attending the APEC summit -- from Brunei, Indonesia, Malaysia, the Philippines, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam.

Steps aimed at ending North Korea's nuclear weapons drive and removing barriers to investment and trade are expected to be among key topics in both the APEC and bilateral meetings, US officials said.

For the first time, Bush and the other APEC leaders will discuss the feasibility of forging a free trade agreement among the 21 economies, which account for nearly half of world trade and generate 70 percent of global economic growth, the officials said.

The free trade plan comes amid a deadlock in talks to forge a new global trade accord.

Accompanied by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Bush will also have the opportunity at APEC to meet with four of the six players in multilateral talks aimed at ending North Korea's nuclear arms ambitions.

They would "discuss what we should try and accomplish when we do begin the next round of the six-party talks," US officials said.

Following its defiant missile launches and nuclear weapons tests, North Korea has agreed to return to talks with the United States, Russia, China, Japan and South Korea.

The six-party talks to resume in Beijing possibly next month is to explore an effective channel in which North Korea could abandon its atomic weapons in return for energy and other aid and diplomatic and security guarantees.

"You could not ask for better diplomacy since the detonation of the nuclear weapon in North Korea than what you've seen from the United States, China, Japan, and even, to a lesser extent, South Korea," said Kurt Cambell, a former senior Pentagon official.

Bush's national security advisor Steve Hadley said the rapidly growing Southeast Asian region was of "great importance" to the United States and that the US leader would seek to "reaffirm the centrality of the freedom agenda" and "continue to encourage efforts in the war on terror" as well as highlight "the principles of good governance, investment in people and economic freedom.

The United States is the biggest investor and top export market for the region.

But even before making his trip, Bush suffered a setback of sorts Tuesday when the House of Representative abandoned plans to vote again on a bill to grant "permanent normal trade relations" (PNTR) status to Vietnam.

The blow came a week after his Republican party was routed in legislative elections and lost control of Congress.

Bush had wanted to grant Vietnam PNTR on his maiden visit to the former battlefield enemy state.

A vote on the bill failed Monday and the House had wanted to make another attempt to pass it on Wednesday but an official said it had been postponed to possibly next month.

It is believed a number of labor unions were reported to have whipped up opposition to the planned legislation.

The Road To Damascus (NYT)

Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert, got what he wanted most out of his White House meeting with President Bush on Monday — a reiteration of America's uncompromising bargaining position on the Iranian nuclear issue. Tough talk is fine, but not enough. Washington could put greater pressure on Iran and perhaps advance another urgent Israeli concern, disarming Hezbollah, by dropping its resistance to high-level talks with Syria.

Whenever such talks are proposed, Mr. Bush and Mr. Olmert point out the many objectionable policies of Syria's president, Bashar al-Assad. That misses the point. Diplomacy is not simply a matter of rewarding countries that act the way Washington likes. It can also be a useful tool for trying to induce countries like Syria to behave more constructively.

With Iran now asserting that it has achieved international acceptance as a nuclear state and Syria's Lebanese allies again challenging the Beirut government, it is time to give direct diplomacy with Syria a serious try.

Chipping away at Lebanon's sovereignty or Israel's security to win Syria's good will would, of course, be a disastrous mistake. But without crossing those red lines it might be possible for Washington to wean Damascus away from its alliance of convenience with Tehran. Syria and Iran are not natural or inevitable allies. Washington's clumsy attempts to ostracize both regimes have managed to tighten their mutual embrace.

One crucial difference between them is that Iran is thumbing its nose at international diplomacy so it can continue to learn how to enrich bomb grade uranium, and Syria is not. That is a distinction Washington needs to recognize and exploit. A Syria detached from Iran and engaged by the United States could conceivably be enlisted in reviving the Arab-Israeli peace effort and containing the spreading chaos in Iraq. Syria's national interests in both areas at least partially intersect with those of the United States and Israel.

Mr. Olmert was right to sound the alarm about an Iran that continues to advance its nuclear capabilities while its president calls for Israel's destruction. For now, the most effective response would be a full-court diplomatic press, combined with an escalating menu of international sanctions until Iran agrees to halt uranium enrichment. With the threat from Iran so clear, this is no time to invent more reasons for not talking to Syria.

Iran's Leader Cites Nuclear Progress (NYT)

By William J. Broad and Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

Iran's president declared yesterday that his country's nuclear program was nearing an important milestone, even as international atomic inspectors reported that they had found unexplained traces of plutonium and that Tehran continued to be so uncooperative in answering questions that they had been unable to confirm earlier claims of progress.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's statement that Iran hoped soon to master the nuclear fuel cycle came as world powers, suspicious that Iran is seeking the means to make atom bombs, are trying to agree on a regimen of sanctions. Iran says it wants only to fuel reactors and generate electricity.

"I hope we can have our celebration of Iran's full nuclearization this year," Mr. Ahmadinejad said during a news conference in Tehran, apparently referring to a program that could do everything from extracting uranium ore from the ground to enriching it into reactor fuel. Iran's calendar ends in March.

In its latest report on the Iranian nuclear program, the International Atomic Energy Agency, based in Vienna, said Tehran was moving ahead with its efforts to purify uranium while refusing to answer basic questions about its atomic program.

For instance, the report said Iran had failed to provide full access to records needed to confirm its claims in June of having enriched uranium to a level of 5 percent, which is suitable for reactors.

The report also said inspectors had made no progress in resolving the origin of previously discovered traces of highly enriched uranium, which can fuel atomic bombs. In September, the agency disclosed the discovery of the particles on a container from a waste storage site at Karaj, not far from Tehran, but withheld judgment about where the material came from and whether it could be linked to a secret nuclear weapons program.

Finally, the report said inspectors had recently found traces of yet another unexplained particle — plutonium — on samples from containers at Karaj and was assessing a response from Tehran about its origin. Plutonium, like uranium, can fuel atom bombs. "Unless Iran addresses the long outstanding verification issues," the report concluded, the atomic agency "will remain unable to make further progress in its efforts to verify the absence of undeclared nuclear material and activities."

The report was sent to the 35 countries on the atomic agency's decision-making board before its regularly scheduled quarterly session in Vienna on Thursday and Friday of next week. It was distributed on a confidential basis yesterday but was quickly made available to reporters.

In Tehran, Mr. Ahmadinejad once again defied international demands to suspend uranium enrichment and reiterated Iran's ultimate enrichment goal — to expand its program to an industrial level with 60,000 centrifuges.

In a news conference with Iranian journalists, he also brushed off suggestions by other senior authorities that Iran might suspend the reactor-fuel program, saying there was no way Iran would turn back.

Mr. Ahmadinejad said Iran had prepared itself to confront possible sanctions. "Nothing has been passed against Iran yet, but we are ready for any condition," he said. "They will do their best, and so will we. In the end, the winner is whoever stands more firmly."

He said Iran was willing to hold talks with the United States if it changed its attitude. "We want to have good relations with all countries, but they have a certain attitude and think they own the world," he said. "Our people cannot tolerate that." He said he would soon send a message to the American people that would explain the viewpoint of Iranians.

So far, Iran has built two cascades of 164 centrifuges for uranium enrichment — the process of purification used to make nuclear reactor fuel and, at great purity, the core of an atom bomb. It has announced that it wants to have 3,000 centrifuges operating by March 2007.

Nuclear experts have estimated that it could take a plant of 3,000 centrifuges as little as nine months to make 55 pounds of highly enriched uranium — enough for anywhere from one to five small nuclear weapons, depending on the skill of the bomb makers.

Intelligence analysts say Iran could be anywhere from three to nine years away from having the ability to build an atom bomb.

IAEA Reports On Discovery At Iran Facility (WP/AP)

Associated Press

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

VIENNA, Nov. 14 -- New traces of plutonium and enriched uranium, potential material for atomic warheads, have been found at a nuclear waste facility in Iran, the International Atomic Energy Agency reported Tuesday, as Iran's president boasted that his country's nuclear fuel program would soon be completed.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, at a news conference in Tehran, asserted that the world had no choice but to "live with a nuclear Iran," but conceded that his country was "still in the first stages" of its uranium enrichment program.

He also said Iran would talk to the United States if it "corrects its behavior," but the White House said there would be no discussions until Tehran took a more constructive role in the region.

Ahmadinejad did not define the scope of any talks with the United States, nor did he say that Iraq or the nuclear dispute would be on the agenda of such discussions.

So far, Iran has been able to activate only two experimental enrichment plants that U.N. officials say have broken down frequently and have produced only small amounts of material suitable for nuclear fuel.

But Iran has progressed enough since resuming enrichment activities in February to provoke a U.N. Security Council demand that it freeze its program. Iran has refused, saying it intends to move toward large-scale uranium enrichment.

The IAEA board in February reported Iran to the Security Council, suggesting it had breached the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and might be trying to make nuclear weapons.

Tuesday's IAEA report, prepared for next week's meeting of the agency's 35-nation board, also faulted Iran for lack of cooperation.

The U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John R. Bolton, said Ahmadinejad's comments and the IAEA's latest discoveries "both demonstrate the urgency for the Security Council to act on Iran." He said sanctions were "obviously the only means to get Iran's attention."

A senior U.N. official familiar with the report cautioned against reading too much into the findings of traces of highly enriched uranium and plutonium, saying that Iran had explained both and that they could plausibly be classified as byproducts of peaceful nuclear activities.

The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the report publicly, said that although the uranium was enriched to a higher level than needed to generate power, it was below weapons grade.

Iran Says It Will Be 'fully Nuclear' Soon (FT)

By Gareth Smyth

Financial Times, November 15, 2006

Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad on Tuesday promised a "celebration of Iran's full nuclearisation" before the end of the Iranian year next March and said the US and its allies had "finally agreed to live with . . . an Iran possessing the nuclear fuel cycle".

Mr Ahmadi-Nejad did not explain his claims, which came at a news conference. But he was at pains to defend his record at home and abroad in the run-up to next month's municipal council elections when his government faces its first nationwide popularity test.

The US state department said Mr Ahmadi-Nejad's comments should represent "a cold jolt to the rest of the world". But a more sober picture of Iran's nuclear progress was painted by an International Atomic Energy Agency report on Iran obtained by the Financial Times.

The report, sent out on Tuesday to the governors of the nuclear watchdog, confirms that Iran is now principally using two "cascades" of 164 centrifuges apiece to enrich uranium. This means the country still falls well short of the 3,000 or so centrifuges that would be needed to enrich uranium on an industrial scale.

The report adds that between mid-August and the beginning of this month, Iran says it fed 34kg of feedstock into the centrifuges and that this was enriched to a level of 5 per cent – which is suitable for nuclear fuel but not for weapons grade material.

Mr Ahmadi-Nejad's news conference, to which the international media was not invited, concentrated on domestic issues as the president responded to criticisms he has faced in recent months, especially over rising prices and unemployment.

He claimed foreign investment in the non-oil sector had reached $7.2bn (€5.6bn, £3.8bn) in the first seven months of this year, up from $4.3bn in the whole of last year, and that the government had created 144,000 jobs in small industries.

But the president was also keen to assert Iran's success in developing its nuclear programme, as western powers struggle to even agree a draft sanctions resolution with Russia and China nine months after the issue was referred to the UN security council. Mr Ahmadi-Nejad said he would respond to requests from “many American people to talk to them” with a letter explaining Iran’s policies – even though he received no response when he wrote in May to President George W. Bush.

He may be seeking to gain political capital from the belief in Iran’s political class, especially among fundamentalists, that the balance of world power is shifting away from the US. He claimed the “the Iranian nation is the most popular in the world . . . with widening political influence”.

While Iranian officials welcomed the Republicans’ defeat in mid-term US elections, they have expressed caution as to whether it will lead to any substantive change in Washington’s policies towards Iran. But at the same time, officials have stressed that the chance of compromise remains.

Iran's Nuclear Program Progressing, U.N. Agency Says (LAT)

By Alissa J. Rubin

The Los Angeles Times, November 15, 2006

SANCERRE, FRANCE — Iran has slowly but steadily increased its ability to enrich uranium despite international calls to halt its nuclear activities, experts at the International Atomic Energy Agency say in a report released Tuesday.

The report, which became public before a meeting next week by the agency's board of governors, emphasizes that Iran's refusal to answer inspectors' questions about its nuclear activities makes it impossible for the IAEA "to confirm the peaceful nature of Iran's program."

The report also notes that traces of plutonium have been found on storage barrels at a waste facility, in addition to a previously reported finding of highly enriched uranium at the site.

Iran had kept its nuclear program secret for more than 18 years, until 2002, and many questions remain unanswered about whether its effort had, or continues to have, a military goal. Highly enriched uranium is the fissile material needed to make a nuclear bomb.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad did little to reassure world leaders Tuesday. He said at a news conference in Tehran that there would be "the big celebration of Iran's full nuclearization in the current year."

Iran's current calendar year ends March 20.

Iranian officials have said Tehran would have 3,000 centrifuges, used to enrich uranium, operating by the end of their calendar year. Ahmadinejad said Tuesday that the goal was eventually to have 60,000. "We are at the beginning of a wave," he said at the gathering, reported by the official Islamic Republic News Agency.

Although that goal is possible, it would appear to require a drastic acceleration in Iran's program.

The IAEA inspectors are reluctant to make any predictions about the speed with which Iran might move ahead.

The United Nations watchdog agency's inspectors have had increasingly limited information about Iran's nuclear operations since Tehran reduced their access to nuclear facilities early this year. The action came after the nuclear agency's board of governors reported Iran to the U.N. Security Council.

"The IAEA, which is the only reliable set of eye and ears, now is mostly blindfolded, their ears are plugged," said Mark Fitzpatrick, a senior analyst on nuclear nonproliferation at the International Institute for Strategic Studies.

"Iran has been tightening the blindfold, and that's dangerous, because without knowing the real status — how many centrifuges are breaking, how many they are assembling, how many they are manufacturing — the policymakers have to give credence to the worst-case scenarios, and they become wild guesses … and that's dangerous for Iran," Fitzpatrick said.

Information on how many centrifuges are breaking would allow the nuclear agency to gauge how well the groups of linked centrifuges, known as cascades, are working and to better assess Iran's progress.

Similarly the inspectors no longer have access to sites where Iran is fabricating or assembling the centrifuges, making it difficult to judge the accuracy of the Iranian claim that the country is poised to set up 3,000 centrifuges.

As is often the case, Ahmadinejad backtracked and moderated his predictions even before the end of Tuesday's news conference, answering a question: "We want to produce fuel after all. We have to keep going. We have a long way to go to 60,000" centrifuges.

The Bush administration and several European governments fear that Iran intends to use the enriched uranium to build bombs, despite Tehran's insistence that the material would only fuel civilian power stations.

The report and Ahmadinejad's comments came amid debate among permanent Security Council members about which sanctions to apply against Iran to pressure the Islamic state into halting its uranium enrichment activities. The European Union and the U.S. have backed a Security Council resolution that would prevent nuclear technology and related missile technology from being sold to Iran and limit visas for some Iranian officials and students. Russia and China, however, want to moderate the sanctions package.

Many people close to the discussions in European capitals and Washington believe there may be the possibility of a negotiated freeze in Iran's program that could stop Tehran before it becomes capable of producing weapons-grade material. However, that would entail guarantees by the U.S. that it would not seek to change the Iranian regime and a willingness by Washington to hold direct talks with Iran. At the moment both seem remote.

In the meantime, Iran has endeavored to make as much progress as possible toward achieving the full nuclear fuel cycle.

"Iran has been attempting to create facts on the ground for a year or two. They want to be able to say, 'We've already passed that technical milestone,' " said a U.S. diplomat familiar with Iran's program. "Today is another example of that — [Ahmadinejad is] simply trying to say, 'You can't stop us, we're still moving forward,' "

U.S. officials and European diplomats say they are skeptical that Iran could attain the capability to make nuclear weapons in the next couple of years, but Israeli officials believe Tehran already may be so far along that it will be hard to halt its program.

As expected, the nuclear agency's report confirms that Iran began operating a second cascade of 164 centrifuges Oct. 13. The report also notes that uranium gas has been fed into the first cascade only intermittently.

The two cascades are not linked, said senior officials familiar with the IAEA report. If they were linked, Iran could better enrich uranium, some experts said.

Iran Expands Nuclear Ambitions Drawing New US Criticism (AFP)

By Stuart Williams

AFP, November 15, 2006

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad announced ambitions to enrich uranium on a scale that the United States warned would give the Islamic republic the capacity to produce an atomic bomb.

Despite the threat of UN sanctions hanging over Iran for its refusal to suspend uranium enrichment, Ahmadinejad unveiled long-term plans to build 60,000 centrifuges for enrichment. It currently has only 328.

"We want to produce nuclear fuel and eventually we should go for 60,000 centrifuges. We should continue along this path. We are at the beginning of the wave," Ahmadinejad told a news conference.

Iran has previously said it is looking to install 3,000 centrifuges by March 2007, in itself a massive step from the two cascades of 164 centrifuges apiece it has currently at its Natanz plant to enrich uranium on a research scale.

The United States seized on Ahmadinejad's comments as a wake-up call for any doubters that Iran's real goal was the capacity to make an atomic bomb.

"That should be a cold jolt to the rest of the world," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

"What that leads to is an Iranian nuclear weapon, which would be an incredibly destabilizing event in the course of Middle East history."

Experts say that 50,000 centrifuges would normally be sufficient to produce 20 kilos (44 pounds) of weapons grade uranium in under a month, but Iran vehemently denies it wants the bomb, insisting its nuclear programme is for power generation only.

Enrichment is carried out in lines of centrifuges called cascades and is used to make the fuel for civilian nuclear reactors. But in highly enriched form, the uranium can be used to make a nuclear bomb.

Building tens of thousands of centrifuges would take Iran's enrichment programme from its current research level to one where it could produce nuclear fuel on an industrial scale.

DOJ_NMG_0094637

World powers wanted Iran to suspend enrichment as a prelude to full-scale negotiations over its atomic programme, a demand that has been repeatedly rejected by Iran.

"The question of a suspension has now been passed," Ahmadinejad said, shrugging off the prospect of UN sanctions against Iran over its failure to heed Security Council demands to agree one.

"If they put in place sanctions, a new financial order will be put in place."

The Iranian show of defiance comes at an awkward time for the US administration as it comes under mounting pressure to involve Iran and its regional ally Syria in talks on stabilising Iraq, after the drubbing its current policy received at the hands of voters in mid-term elections.

President George W. Bush's spokesman rejected suggestions of a growing gap with his key Iraq ally British Prime Minister Tony Blair on dialogue with Iran after the two leaders gave evidence to a study group rethinking policy on Iraq.

"You have mischaracterized his position," Tony Snow said. "Read his speech, and you'll see there is no difference between the governments."

The Iranian president said talks with the United States could only take place if it changed its "attitude" towards Iran.

"We would talk with the US government but on certain conditions, on the condition that it corrects its attitude," he said.

"And at that moment, we will talk with them as we talk with the others."

Ahmadinejad confidently announced he would soon send a personal message to the American people.

"I am in the process of preparing it," he said. "The message will elaborate upon the viewpoints of the Iranian nation, because many Americans asked me for it."

In its latest report on Iran's nuclear programme, a copy of which was obtained by AFP, the International Atomic Energy Agency said Iran was still not enriching uranium beyond the five percent level sufficient for use as reactor fuel.

From August 13 to November 2, Iran fed "a total of approximately 34 kilogrammes" (75 pounds) of feedstock uranium gas into centrifuges, producing a small amount of uranium enriched to low levels, the report said.

It did not detail how much uranium was produced but said enrichment levels seemed to be below five percent, nowhere near the 90 percent level needed to make atom bombs.

Ahmadinejad: Iran Open To Talk With U.S. (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini

AP, November 15, 2006

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Tuesday that Iran would talk to the United States if it "corrects its behavior," but the White House said there would be no discussions until Tehran took a more constructive role in the region.

Ahmadinejad's comment was the highest-level Iranian statement in recent months that the government is willing to talk to Washington, which it has long demonized as "the Great Satan." It also came a day after British Prime Minister Tony Blair advocated seeking Tehran's help in ending the violence in Iraq.

At a news conference, Ahmadinejad did not spell out any other conditions for U.S.-Iranian talks, but he accused the Bush administration of pursuing a foreign policy based on aggression, oppression, unilateralism and disrespect for other nations.

Ahmadinejad did not define the scope of any talks with the United States, nor did he say that Iraq or the nuclear dispute would be on the agenda of such discussions.

At the news conference, Ahmadinejad said: "We are after positive interaction with the whole world, excluding a country that we don't recognize" — a reference to Israel.

"We won't talk to the Zionist regime because it is a usurper and an illegitimate entity. But we will talk to the U.S. government under certain conditions. Should it correct its behavior, we will talk to them," the president said.

In Washington, White House National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe said: "I don't think this is about a U.S. attitude adjustment. The collective attitude of the world is that Iran needs to play a constructive role in the region, not meddle in Iraq and stop its enrichment activities."

The United States and the Iraqi government have long accused Iran of aiding the insurgency in Iraq — a charge Iran denies. Johndroe pointed out that Blair had said Monday that Iran must stop interfering in Iraq and cease uranium enrichment.

Iran has proposed talks with the United States about Iraq twice this year, first in March and then on Nov. 5. In the most recent proposal, Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini said Tehran would consider talks with the U.S. over regional issues, including Iraq, if Washington requested.

Weeks after the first proposal of talks, Iran withdrew the offer. When Tehran renewed the offer this month, analysts said that Iran was concerned about the escalating turmoil in Iraq and might also be seeking to slow Washington's push for sanctions over its nuclear program.

The United States welcomed the first offer of talks, but said the negotiations would be confined to Iraq.

On Tuesday, President Bush said his line on Iran was: "We are willing to come to the table with the European Union, as well as Russia and China to discuss a way forward" in relations.

Speaking to reporters at the White House, Bush said repeated the condition that he set weeks ago — that for talks, Iran must agree to verifiably suspend its uranium enrichment activities.

One option under discussion at one point by a bipartisan Iraq Study Group headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton was for greater cooperation with Iran and Syria.

Hamas Insists It Won't Recognize Israel (AP)

By Karin Laub

AP, November 15, 2006

Hamas insisted Tuesday it would not recognize Israel even after a unity government takes power in the Palestinian territories, complicating efforts to form a more moderate coalition that would clear the way for vital foreign aid.

The militant Islamic group suggested, however, that the emerging coalition would be free to stake out a different position, apparently hoping the ambiguity in its statements will allow it to preserve its anti-Israel ideology but loosen international sanctions that have crippled the Palestinian economy.

The tough talk came despite Hamas' promises to Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas that it would refrain from incendiary public statements during the delicate coalition talks.

Abbas was meeting with the leaders of Jordan and Egypt on Tuesday and Wednesday to win their blessing for what he hopes will be a broader package deal, including not only formation of a moderate government, but also a cease-fire with Israel and an Israel-Hamas prisoner swap.

On Wednesday, envoys of the so-called Quartet of Mideast mediators — the United States, the U.N., the European Union and Russia — were to meet in Cairo, in part to be briefed on the coalition talks. Abbas met the U.S. envoy, Assistant Secretary of State David Welch, on Tuesday night.

President Bush also called Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, a key peace meditator, to discuss the latest developments, Egypt's semi-official Middle East News Agency reported.

For Abbas' plan to work, Israel and the West must accept the premise that Hamas is largely ceding power by making room for a 24-member Cabinet of independent administrators — even though the Islamic militants get to appoint nine of the ministers and would retain considerable control.

The monthslong deadlock over whether the new government would recognize Israel is to be solved by a division of labor: Abbas and his Palestine Liberation Organization would lead peace talks with Israel, while the government of experts runs daily life in the Palestinian territories.

In such a constellation, the argument goes, the government does not need to take a position on whether to recognize Israel or renounce violence, because it deals with more mundane issues.

However, the international community has demanded such declarations in exchange for lifting its aid boycott.

So far, Israel and the West have withheld judgment on Abbas' efforts — and the latest Hamas comments might make it harder for the Palestinian leader to market a future agreement.

Moussa Abu Marzouk, a top official in Hamas' exiled leadership, said demands that the group recognize Israel are "illegal and illegitimate."

DOJ_NMG_0094639

However, Abu Marzouk and other spokesmen differentiated between Hamas and a new government. "It's not Hamas that will pronounce on this subject," he said.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the Palestinian political activity is an indication of Hamas' inability to govern. "It's a simple reflection of the reality that because of their policies, they have failed," he said.

Despite the latest damper, negotiators reported more progress Tuesday, saying they reached agreement on the division of Cabinet portfolios. Hamas would choose nine ministers, Fatah would appoint six, and four smaller factions would pick one each. Five more independent ministers would require the approval of Hamas and Fatah, negotiators said.

On Monday, the two sides reached agreement in principle on a new prime minister — U.S.-educated microbiologist Mohammed Shabir, former president of the Islamic University in Gaza City. Shabir, 60, has ties to both Hamas and Fatah.

One sticking point could be control over the Interior Ministry, in charge of key branches of the security forces. Hamas seeks guarantees that its Executive Force, a security branch it set up in recent months, will not be dismantled, but Abbas has not made any promises.

In Cairo on Tuesday night, Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit said the peace process could also be advanced if Israel and the Palestinians would agree to swap the Israeli corporal whom Hamas-allied militants kidnapped in June with some Palestinians detained in Israeli prisons.

US Confirms Meeting Of Mideast Peace Quartet (AFP)

AFP, November 15, 2006

The sponsors of the Middle East peace process will meet in Cairo Wednesday to discuss efforts to revive negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians, the State Department confirmed.

US Middle East envoy David Welch will represent Washington at the meeting with his counterparts from Russia, the European Union and the United Nations -- a grouping known as the Middle East "quartet," spokesman Sean McCormack said.

McCormack said the meeting did not signal a major initiative to break a months-long deadlock in peacemaking efforts but an opportunity to "take stock" of the situation.

He also said the meeting was arranged before last week's US elections in which opposition Democrats took control of Congress and immediately pressed President George W. Bush to reinvigorate his Middle East diplomacy.

"A lot of developments, a lot of different things are going on in the Middle East. We all thought this was an appropriate time for the envoys to get together," he said.

A key development to be discussed will be efforts by moderate Palestinian leader Mahmud Abbas to form a new power-sharing government that would sideline members of the radical Islamic movement Hamas, he said.

"This is all part of our diplomacy ... doing what we can here and there to try to make sure that if the Palestinians do produce a government that meets the standards of the quartet statement, then you do have a political horizon that you can potentially move forward," he said.

Welch is also expected to hold separate meetings with Egyptian officials before travelling to Amman for talks the Jordanians, McCormack said.

It was unclear whether Abbas, who was due in Cairo later Tuesday, would join any of the talks.

The meeting follows complaints by Arab countries that the quartet was not doing enough to revive peace talks between the Palestinians and Israelis and unease by Russia over its partners' handling of the deadlock.

Russian President Vladimir Putin called during a visit by Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak to Moscow earlier this month for regional countries to play a bigger role in the deliberations of the quartet.

Moscow has distanced itself from demands made by the quartet earlier this year for the current Islamist-led Palestinian government to renounce violence and recognize Israel and past peace deals.

The European Union and the United States suspended direct aid until the demands are met but Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov last month described them as "unrealistic."

DOJ_NMG_0094640

Abbas has been engaged in intensive talks with Islamist prime minister Ismail Haniya on forming a government of national unity acceptable to Western donors.

Arab League assistant secretary general Ahmed Ben Helli hit out at the quartet for not doing enough to rein in the deadly offensive launched by Israel after the capture of a soldier by Gaza-based militants in June.

"Unfortunately the quartet has been absent from every action we have taken. It's a body that has been set up but that is not fit for purpose," Ben Helli said.

He condemned what he described as the "silence" of the quartet in the face of the "Israeli crimes against the Palestinian people" and its "failure to assume its responsibility for relaunching the peace process."

The quartet drafted the roadmap peace plan which has made next to no progress since its launch in 2003.

Egypt Wanes As Power Broker (WSJ)

By Mariam Fam

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

CAIRO, Egypt -- As the White House considers recalibrating its Middle East strategy, an important ally's waning clout in the region underlines some of the challenges ahead: Egypt, which for decades has acted as peacemaker and behind-the-scenes political broker for the U.S. in the Arab world, has seen its status ebb as Mideast dynamics have been shifting.

The destabilization of Iraq, the ascent of the Palestinian militant group Hamas, last summer's war in Lebanon and Iran's resurgent influence have helped erode Cairo's traditional leading role in the region. Egypt remains a strong U.S. ally, but its diminished authority, coupled with internal stagnation, have weakened Egypt's capacity to help the U.S. navigate the region's dicey political waters.

Others, such as Qatar, which is trying to carve out a role as mediator and regional heavyweight, have emerged. And pressure has increased on the Bush administration to reach out directly to Syria and Iran, which it has snubbed despite their undeniable influence in the region's trouble spots. On Monday, President Bush met with members of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which may recommend engaging both those governments to help pacify Iraq.

"The Egyptian role has taken a back seat, to the benefit of other regional powers. The Israeli-Palestinian issue used to be an Egyptian-Jordanian issue, but now it is more influenced by Syria and Iran," said Emad Gad, a senior researcher at the al-Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies in Cairo.

Gehad Auda, a political scientist and an official in Egypt's ruling National Democratic Party, said that despite new challenges, Cairo remains a main force of stabilization in the region and, along with other moderate Arab governments, provides a counterweight to countries such as Syria and Iran. He added that Egyptian diplomacy draws on the country's network of relations to "exert subtle pressure" behind the scenes on various parties. "I believe that in the final analysis, the Egyptian role will come up on the winning side."

Egypt is hosting talks this week involving Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and representatives of the U.S., European Union, Russia and United Nations. In the past, Egypt proved invaluable in helping to secure Washington's goals, such as defusing Israeli-Arab tensions and drumming up Arab support for driving out Iraq after it invaded Kuwait in 1990.

Today, weeks of Egyptian efforts have failed thus far to secure the release of an Israeli soldier captured by Palestinian militants in June. Cairo's attempts to coax Syria away from Iran and back toward the Arab sphere have also come up short. Meanwhile, President Hosni Mubarak's harsh treatment of political opponents -- jailing activists and cracking down on protests -- has undermined President Bush's agenda of fostering democracy in the Mideast.

The U.S.-led toppling of Saddam Hussein in Iraq in 2003 was a watershed. Swapping this longtime Iranian nemesis for a Shiite Muslim-led government empowered the Shiite rulers in Tehran. The ensuing chaos also fostered a closer alliance between Iran and Syria, Iraqi neighbors that U.S. and Iraqi officials have accused of fueling Iraq's disorder. Meanwhile, the resurgent Shiite influence has sparked concern among Sunni Muslim Arab regimes, including stalwart U.S. allies Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Jordan.

Further chipping away at Egypt's clout was Hamas's January victory in elections that were encouraged by the Bush administration. This left rival Fatah, Egypt's close ally among the Palestinians, playing second fiddle in the territories. Keen to maintain its status as regional mediator, Egypt kept communication channels open with Hamas. But the Palestinian group is an outgrowth of the Muslim Brotherhood, an Islamist movement challenging the Mubarak regime at home, and Egypt so far has failed to persuade Hamas to recognize Israel, as demanded by the international community.

In Lebanon, meanwhile, the U.S. democracy push opened the door to Hezbollah, a militant Shiite organization that won enough legislative seats to join the ruling coalition in Beirut. In July, Hezbollah, which is backed by Syria and Iran, kidnapped two Israeli soldiers, igniting a monthlong battle.

To the detriment of established regional powers such as Egypt, the war made heroes of Hezbollah and its leader, Hassan Nasrallah, in the eyes of many Arabs and Muslims angry at Israel and the U.S. Egypt and other so-called moderate Arab regimes -- Jordan, Saudi Arabia and some Persian Gulf states -- alienated many of their people by appearing to be criticizing Hezbollah in the early days of the war.

All along, Egyptian and other Arab officials have argued that the Bush administration's hands-off approach to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, a flash point for many Arabs and Muslims, has exacerbated regional tensions.

Analysts say the Egyptian regime's domestic woes have also contributed to its diminished regional stature. Steps toward democratization -- such as liberalizing the economy, allowing multicandidate presidential elections and tolerating greater freedoms -- have all suffered setbacks. Since last year's presidential election won by Mr. Mubarak -- who has ruled for a quarter century -- authorities have cracked down on protests, arrested activists and bloggers and postponed municipal elections, apparently fearing further gains by the Muslim Brotherhood, which scored big in parliamentary elections last year.

U.S. officials say the Bush administration remains committed to promoting democracy. But many in Egypt say Washington has taken the pressure off the Mubarak regime out of concern that political openings will further strengthen Islamists.

Now, many Arabs hope Democratic control of the U.S. Congress and the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld will usher in changes to U.S. policies in Iraq and elsewhere. But while some sort of shift seems likely in Iraq, few think Arab calls to do more to revive talks between Israel and the Palestinians -- which many analysts deem crucial to strengthening U.S. allies such as Egypt -- will bear fruit soon.

"Realistically, this administration is losing time, and the time left will be devoted to Iraq," said Amr Hamzawy, a senior associate at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in Washington.

U.N. Says Somalis Helped Hezbollah Fighters (NYT)

By Robert F. Worth

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Nov. 14 — More than 700 Islamic militants from Somalia traveled to Lebanon in July to fight alongside Hezbollah in its war against Israel, a United Nations report says. The militia in Lebanon returned the favor by providing training and — through its patrons Iran and Syria — weapons to the Islamic alliance struggling for control of Somalia, it adds.

The report, which was disclosed by [a news service] on Monday, appears to be the first indication that foreign fighters assisted Hezbollah during the 34-day conflict, when Israel maintained a tight blockade on Lebanon.

The report also says Iran sought to trade arms for uranium from Somalia to further its nuclear ambitions, though it does not say whether Iran succeeded.

The 86-page report was issued by four experts monitoring violations of a 1992 United Nations arms embargo on Somalia, which was put in place after the country lapsed into civil war and remains in effect. The report is to be discussed Friday at the Security Council.

The panel does not say how the information was obtained. But the members had access to information from the intelligence agencies of the Security Council's 15 current members, including Britain, France, China, Russia and the United States, a United Nations official said.

Any involvement by Somalis would be surprising because Hezbollah's effectiveness is widely attributed to its deep familiarity with the region.

Hezbollah officials could not be reached Tuesday night for comment.

DOJ_NMG_0094642

An official at the Israeli mission to the United Nations said he had not seen the report, and was not aware of any Somali fighters having taken part in the conflict with Hezbollah. The official asked not to be identified, citing diplomatic protocol.

While the sources of the information remain unclear, the report is dense with details about arms shipments to the groups vying for power in Somalia.

It states that in mid-July, Aden Hashi Farah, a leader of the Somali Islamist alliance, personally selected about 720 combat-hardened fighters to travel to Lebanon and fight alongside Hezbollah.

At least 100 Somalis had returned by early September — with five Hezbollah members — while others stayed on in Lebanon for advanced military training, the report says. It is not clear how many may have been killed, though the report says some were wounded and later treated after their return to Somalia.

The fighters were paid a minimum of $2,000 for their service, the report says, and as much as $30,000 was to be given to the families of those killed, with money donated by "a number of supporting countries."

In addition to training some Somali militants, Hezbollah "arranged for additional support to be given" by Iran and Syria, including weapons, the report found. On July 27, 200 Somali fighters also traveled to Syria to be trained in guerrilla warfare, the report says.

It also indicates that Iran appears to have sought help in its quest for uranium in Dusa Mareb, the hometown of Sheik Hassan Dahir Aweys, the leader of the Islamist alliance in Somalia, which is known as the Council of Islamic Courts.

"At the time of the writing of this report, there were two Iranians in Dusa Mareb engaged on matters linked to the exploration of uranium in exchange for arms" for the Council of Islamic Courts, says the report, which is dated Oct. 16.

Those claims, if proved, could worsen global tensions over Iran's nuclear program. Iran ignored an Aug. 31 deadline to suspend its uranium enrichment, and the United States has been leading a United Nations effort to impose sanctions.

The United Nations report is focused mostly on the increasingly volatile situation in Somalia, where Islamists took control of the capital, Mogadishu, in June from warlords backed by the United States.

Not only has the volume of arms flowing into Somalia grown, according to the authors, but more sophisticated weapons like surface-to-air missiles are being brought in. The conflict could grow into a regional war, with Somalia's neighbors, Ethiopia and Eritrea, backing opposing sides.

The report also accuses Djibouti, Egypt, Iran, Libya, Saudi Arabia and Syria of supplying the Somali Islamists with arms, advisers and fighters. It says three nations — Ethiopia, Uganda and Yemen — are aligned with the so-called transitional government based in Baidoa, an inland city.

Asked about violations of the arms embargo, the report states, officials in those countries either denied any involvement or failed to answer.

The report recommends that the Security Council blockade Somalia. It also warns urgently against sending any peacekeepers to the country, saying such a force could become "the catalyst that sparks a serious military confrontation between the opposing sides."

U.N. Report Cites Outside Military Aid To Somalia's Islamic Forces (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Nov. 14 -- Iran, Syria, Libya, Egypt and the Hezbollah militia in Lebanon are providing arms, training and financing to Islamic militants as they seize political and military control in the East African state of Somalia, according to a confidential U.N. report.

The 86-page report, prepared by a panel of U.N. weapons and financial experts, warned that the conflict could reignite a war between Eritrea, the chief foreign sponsor of the Islamics, and Ethiopia, which is backing Somalia's weak transitional federal government.

The report asserts that a huge inflow of outside military assistance, in violation of a U.N. arms embargo, is contributing to the emergence of an alliance of militants called the Islamic Courts Union as the first Islamic government since the United States overthrew Afghanistan's Taliban in 2002. It warns that Somalia could become the site of insurgency tactics used in Iraq, including "suicide bombers, assassinations and other forms of terrorist and insurgent-type activities."

"The strongly sustained trend toward total military, economic and political dominance by the Islamic Courts Union in central and southern Somalia continues," according to the report by the U.N. Monitoring Group on Somalia, which will be presented to the Security Council this week. "They are currently the most powerful force in Somalia."

The report was obtained Tuesday by The Washington Post; it was first reported Monday by [a news service]. The report's authors recommend that the Security Council tighten a U.N. arms embargo, impose sanctions on Somali individuals and businesses buying weapons, and launch an international diplomatic effort to dissuade states from arming the combatants.

The developments in Somalia represent a setback for the United States, which had sought to prevent the militants from taking power. But the report provided no evidence to suggest that the United States provided clandestine support to anti-Islamic forces, as officials in Somalia's interim government have alleged.

It did, however, underscore the degree to which the United States' chief Middle East rivals, Iran and Syria, and its allies, Saudi Arabia and Egypt, are prepared to challenge U.S. interests in East Africa.

The U.N. team detailed three Iranian consignments of arms, ammunition, medical supplies and doctors to the Islamic fighters since summer. The report says one July shipment included land mines, 1,000 machine guns and M-79 rocket launchers, and 45 shoulder-fired surface-to-air missiles. The report also says two Iranian nationals were negotiating the possibility of selling more weapons for access to Somalia's uranium deposits.

The report asserts that Syria has trained 200 Somali fighters in guerrilla warfare tactics and that Libya has provided arms and advanced military training to another 100. Libya also allegedly provided $1 million to finance future training missions and to pay salaries.

Iran and Syria denied in separate letters to the U.N. team that they had shipped weapons to Somalia or trained Somali forces. The U.N. team did not receive a response from the Libyan government. Representatives from the Islamic Courts Union said the allegations that they had received illegal arms shipments are "baseless."

To shore up support for their cause, Somalia's Islamic fighters provided military support in the summer to Hezbollah, sending 720 of its most experienced fighters to help battle Israeli forces, according to the report. The fighters were promised $2,000 in payments to their families for serving, and as much as $30,000 if they fell in battle.

In exchange for their backing, Hezbollah allegedly provided advanced training to Somali fighters and sent five Hezbollah advisers to Somalia. It also allegedly solicited support for the movement from Iran and Syria.

The report cites a case in which Egypt agreed to train Somalia's Islamic militants. And it accuses Saudi Arabia of providing several shipments of food and medicine to Islamic combatants. Egypt denied the allegation; Saudi Arabia has yet to fully respond to the charges.

The report asserts that the most flagrant violations of the U.N. arms embargo have been committed by Eritrea and Ethiopia, which have sent dozens of weapons shipments and thousands of combat troops into Somalia on behalf of their proxies. It also charged that Uganda and Yemen had joined Ethiopia in supporting Somalia's losing Transitional Federal Government.

Hezbollah Decries Lebanese Cabinet (WP/AP)

Associated Press

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

BEIRUT, Nov. 14 -- Hezbollah's leader said the radical Shiite Muslim group would continue efforts to replace the Lebanese government, saying the Western-backed cabinet had lost all credibility after six ministers resigned, according to published reports.

Hassan Nasrallah, who has threatened to stage demonstrations if Hezbollah's demand for a national unity government is ignored, also assured citizens that there would be no new civil war as a result of mounting political tensions among the country's rival factions.

Nasrallah's remarks came a day after the government, defying the objections of President Emile Lahoud and the resignations of six ministers, approved a U.N. plan for an international tribunal to try suspected killers of former prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri, who died in a car bombing in February 2005 that has been widely blamed on Syria.

Lebanon's New Crisis (WP)

THE RECKLESS attack on Israel by the Lebanese Hezbollah movement this summer led to the devastation of the southern third of the country. About 1,200 Lebanese died, including many civilians whom Hezbollah deliberately placed in the middle of the fighting, and some 15,000 homes were destroyed. Now Hezbollah's leader, Hasan Nasrallah, has launched an even more dangerous campaign. Through political bluff and the threat of violence, he is attempting to stage a coup against the democratically elected Lebanese government. The pro-Western administration of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, which lacks Hezbollah's ruthlessness or military strength, has been resisting. But without help from the outside world, Lebanon could soon experience the reversal of its popular Cedar Revolution of 2005 or even a return to civil war.

As was the case in the summer war with Israel, Hezbollah's new offensive is backed by Iran and Syria and serves those governments' agendas as well as its own. The Shiite Islamic party is demanding that it be given enough seats in Mr. Siniora's cabinet to provide it with a veto over all major decisions. That would allow it to block the implementation of U.N. Security Council Resolution 1701, which calls for Hezbollah's disarmament. It could also impede the formation of an international tribunal by the Security Council and Lebanon to try the perpetrators of the February 2005 assassination of former prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri. Senior Syrian officials, including some of the closest collaborators of President Bashar al-Assad, are among those implicated. Not coincidentally, the six Lebanese ministers already allied with Hezbollah and its allies resigned in the past few days, just as the cabinet was preparing to vote on a preliminary agreement on the tribunal.

To its credit, the Siniora government rejected Hezbollah's intimidation, and the 18 remaining ministers approved the tribunal unanimously. But the crisis is far from over. Hezbollah is threatening to begin street demonstrations that could easily lead to violence. That would serve the interests of the increasingly radical Iran-Syria axis, which is attempting to prevent the spread of democracy in the Middle East, drive out the West and ultimately destroy Israel.

The response to this vicious campaign should be the same concerted multilateral action that followed Mr. Hariri's assassination last year and that forced Syria to withdraw its army from Lebanon. First the Security Council should act swiftly to establish the tribunal and begin criminal proceedings. It should also consider other actions against Syria, including sanctions, if Syria continues trying to block the formation of the tribunal and sponsoring political violence in Lebanon. At the same time, Security Council action against Iran for its refusal to suspend its nuclear program is long overdue; governments that are holding it up, beginning with Russia, must be forced to choose between supporting sanctions and breaking off strategic cooperation with the West. Until Iran and Syria are made to pay a price for their attempts to radicalize the Middle East, they will have no incentive to rein in clients such as Hezbollah.

Arab Gunmen Kill Hundreds Of Villagers In Chad (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

DAKAR, Senegal, Nov. 14 — Hundreds of Chadians have been killed by roving groups of Arab gunmen in dozens of villages over the past 10 days, according to aid workers and human rights officials along Chad's troubled border with Sudan.

At least 220 people have been killed, and dozens of wounded people have overwhelmed small, poorly equipped local hospitals, the United Nations said Tuesday. Chad's government has declared a state of emergency over the attacks and has accused Sudan, its neighbor to the east, of fomenting a crisis in Chad.

"By exporting its Darfur conflict to Chad, Sudan wants to weaken Chad by making different Chadian communities fight each other," Hourmadji Moussa Doumgor, a government spokesman, told The Associated Press on Monday. "All this is to prepare the ground for a large-scale war."

For more than two years, Chad and Sudan have traded accusations about support for insurgents across their shared border. Sudan is fighting non-Arab rebel groups in the western region of Darfur that seek greater autonomy, while Chad is fighting rebels seeking to overthrow the government of President Idriss Déby.

The conflict in Darfur, which pits the non-Arab tribes against the Arab-dominated government, has been marked by brutal intertribal violence in which the Sudanese government has armed Arab militias to fight the non-Arab insurgents. At least 200,000 people have died, and more than two million have been driven from their homes. That ethnic warfare has spilled over into Chad, inspiring copycat violence among Chadian Arabs and cross-border raids on villages by Sudanese militias.

The recent violence has been particularly brutal. One man's eyes were gouged out with bayonets, said David Buchbinder, a researcher with Human Rights Watch who is traveling in the region affected by the attacks. Two women were burned alive in their hut, he said.

"It is extremely horrific violence," Mr. Buchbinder said. "It is as if it is driven by hatred. It is a coordinated action over a large part of eastern Chad, and not always with theft as a motive. Sometimes the motive is only to kill."

The attacks represent a sharp escalation of the violence in the volatile region around Darfur and threaten to further destabilize one of the most dangerous and lawless corners of the world.

The attacks appear to be the work of Arab militias from both sides of the Chad-Sudan border, and because they are occurring deep inside Chad, about 60 miles from the border, the violence is particularly ominous.

While the initial clashes between non-Arab villagers and Arab raiders appeared to involve mainly local tribes, the fresh set of attacks appears to be linked directly to the fighting in Darfur and involves a mix of Chadian and Sudanese Arabs. But even that distinction is largely academic — the porous border has little meaning for most villagers, who move back and forth freely.

The United Nations Security Council has approved a United Nations peacekeeping force to stanch the violence spreading out of Darfur and replace the largely ineffective and undermanned African Union force currently working there. But Sudan has adamantly refused to allow the new force to deploy. The United Nations plans to convene a high-level meeting on Thursday in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, the headquarters of the African Union, to discuss ways to end the violence.

U.S.-EU Airbus Rift Grows (WSJ)

By John W. Miller

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

BRUSSELS -- Adding to growing commercial woes at European aircraft maker Airbus, the U.S. is set to file a revised complaint as soon as today at the World Trade Organization against subsidies that European governments give the company, U.S. trade officials said.

With a previous U.S. complaint just months from expiring, European Union trade officials had hoped to negotiate a deal with the U.S. and avoid a WTO case, which could restrict EU politicians from offering further public aid to Airbus. Avoiding a court case now looks unlikely.

The U.S. decision is just the latest in a series of setbacks for Airbus, which has recently been wracked by management changes and order cancellations caused by development delays that are causing the company to lose market share in the $50 billion industry to its U.S. rival, Boeing Co.

The EU yesterday said it would respond by moving ahead with its own WTO complaint against U.S. government subsidies given to Boeing.

"Once the U.S. launched the WTO action, we were left with no choice," said Peter Power, a spokesman for Peter Mandelson, the EU trade commissioner.

The essentials of the dispute haven't changed since 2004, when the U.S. argued that Airbus had unfairly used some $20 billion in subsidies to overtake Boeing as the world's leading civil-aircraft maker by market share.

The so-called launch aid had been allowed by a 1992 agreement between the U.S. and the EU, because Airbus was smaller then and needed a boost.

Once it passed Boeing in global market share, the U.S. argued two years ago, Airbus was no longer entitled to that kind of government help.

DOJ_NMG_0094646

The U.S. filed complaints at the WTO in 2005 and 2006. Each time, the EU counterattacked with complaints of its own, saying that the U.S. had given Boeing more than $20 billion in government help.

Those four cases, two on each side, were suspended in February so that trade representatives could try to hammer out a new version of the 1992 agreement that would allow subsidies on both sides.

EU officials say the U.S. move to restart the case this week has taken them by surprise and ends the de facto truce.

Airbus, a unit of European Aeronautic Defence & Space Co., has suffered financial and order-book losses this year after announcing delays in development of its two big new aircraft, the double-deck A380 and the A350 XWB, a response to Boeing's fuel-efficient 787 Dreamliner.

Airbus's troubles have been compounded by a management shake-up.

French Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin told a French newspaper yesterday that his government would offer €80 million, or about $102 million, to Airbus suppliers threatened by the rollout delays.

A U.S. official said that wasn't a concern for the U.S., as many of the suppliers also work for Boeing. He added, however, the U.S. is concerned about direct aid to Airbus.

"A line needs to be drawn in the sand now," said Charlie Miller, a spokesman for Boeing. "Airbus is financially strong and does not need additional launch aid."

"The good news is that the WTO process finally will demonstrate that Boeing is guilty of receiving billions and billions of government money for commercial aircraft," said Clay McConnell, an Airbus spokesman. "On the other hand, the only tangible result of the process is likely that a lot of trade lawyers will get rich."

The EU has until February to respond to the U.S. complaint. A panel of three WTO judges will start meeting in March and would likely issue a judgment next September.

The EU says it will file its legal arguments around the beginning of next year.

Leading Democrat Calls For 'open Skies' Rethink (FT)

By Doug Cameron In Chicago And Eoin Callan In Washington

Financial Times, November 15, 2006

The new Democratic leadership in Congress on Tuesday called for a rethink of plans to give overseas investors more say in the running of US airlines, dealing a potentially critical blow to efforts to forge a new transportation deal with the European Union.

The tentative transatlantic "open skies" pact agreed a year ago has been left in limbo by fierce opposition in Congress to the parallel investment reforms, led by James Oberstar, the ranking Democrat on the House transportation and infrastructure committee.

Mr Oberstar is set to take over the chairmanship of the committee in January, and reaffirmed his opposition on Tuesday to the proposed changes first detailed by the administration a year ago.

The Department of Transportation wants to ease restrictions on the involvement of overseas investors in the running of US airlines, though statutory restrictions on ownership levels would remain unchanged.

"We need to go back and think it over," Mr Oberstar said of the plan as he outlined his priorities at a briefing in Washington on Tuesday, suggesting there would be no progress ahead of a meeting of EU transport ministers next month.

The administration has already missed two self-imposed deadlines for presenting its planned rule change to European ministers, delaying any open-skies deal until at least the middle of next year.

Their approval is viewed as a pre-requisite for supporting the two-stage open skies deal, which would liberalise transatlantic routes and trigger co-operation on competition, safety and security matters.

Mr Oberstar did not refer to open skies, but suggested the two issues should not be linked. "I don't know why it became so important [to the EU]," he said of the investment proposal.

The DoT has insisted there are no plans to drop the proposed rule change. Mary Peters, the new transportation secretary, has not made any public comments on either open skies or the investment rules, though senior DoT officials had planned a renewed push to answer critics of the investment reform.

DOJ_NMG_0094647

While the DoT revised its original plan in April, the changes failed to defuse opposition in hte Republican-led Congress. The House of Representatives has already voted by two to one in favour of language backed by Mr Oberstar that would block the department from introducing the changes. The Senate Appropriations Committee has also backed blocking manoeuevres.

Opponents also included US labour unions and Continental Airlines, which claimed the rules threatened jobs and posed a threat to national security as foreign investors might be more reluctant to transport US troops on their aircraft.

An earlier attempt to secure a new EU-US deal collapsed in 2004 when it was rejected by European transport ministers.

UK Demands Halliburton Drop KBR Float (FT)

By James Boxell

Financial Times, November 15, 2006

Britain has made a last-minute demand that Halliburton, the US oil services group, withdraw the imminent flotation of its KBR subsidiary or face being stripped of its ownership of the Devonport naval dockyard.

Halliburton had intended to price the offering of KBR on Tuesday night, with its market debut scheduled for Wednesday. However, as reported in the Financial Times last week, Lord Drayson, the British defence procurement minister, has been seeking urgent guarantees from Halliburton about the future financial viability of KBR before giving his support to the float.

KBR has been hoping to raise more than $470m (£248m) from selling a 17 per cent stake, which would value the company at about $2.8bn.

The Halliburton arm, which is known for its logistics contracts with the US military in Iraq, owns 51 per cent of the Devonport ship and submarine maintenance yard in Plymouth, western Europe's largest naval dockyard complex.

In the first nine months of the year, KBR made almost half of its operating profits from Devonport.

The yard is responsible for refitting and refuelling the British nuclear submarine fleet and its ownership is highly sensitive. It employs about 4,500 people directly in Plymouth, making it the biggest private sector employer in Devon and Cornwall.

Halliburton was not available for comment on Tuesday night. However, one person close to the process said the float was likely to be priced today, in spite of the UK government warning.

In an emergency filing to the US Securities and Exchange Commission on Tuesday morning, just ahead of the proposed float, Halliburton said: "On November 13, the Ministry of Defence asked us to withdraw this offering pending the MoD's financial analysis of KBR on a stand-alone basis.

"The MoD also advised us that if we proceed with this offering without satisfying the MoD, the MoD will have little option but to take steps to cause the MoD to use its power to safeguard the essential security interests of the United Kingdom with respect to the Devonport Royal Dockyard."

In its filing, KBR said the loss of Devonport could have a "material adverse effect on our future prospects, business, results of operations and cash".

As well as KBR, Devonport Management Limited, the company that bought Devonport from the MoD in 1997, is also partly owned by Balfour Beatty and Weir Group of the UK.

If the MoD deems it in the essential security interests of the UK, it can either make DML's interest in Devonport "non-voting" or possibly remove DML directors. It can also at any time assume control and dispose of DML's interest at a fair value, determined by an independent accountancy firm.

Halliburton's KBR Delays IPO After U.K. Shipyard Warning (WSJ)

By Russell Gold And Steve Gelsi

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

Halliburton Co. delayed the initial public offering of its KBR Inc. engineering and government-contracting unit by one day after the British government warned it could take back control of a major shipyard that generates significant profit for the unit.

In a letter this week, the British Ministry of Defence sought to delay the IPO to determine whether the United Kingdom's strategic interests would be preserved by a stand-alone KBR. An underwriter of the stock offering said KBR officials said the letter was a result of a misunderstanding with the British government that would be resolved quickly.

Halliburton, an oil-field-services provider, and KBR declined to comment.

KBR, formerly Kellogg, Brown & Root, is the majority owner of the Devonport Royal Dockyard, the largest dock complex in Western Europe, and has contracts to refuel the British government's nuclear-submarine fleet. The company, which was initially scheduled to price last night for trading today, is now slated to price today for trading tomorrow, say underwriters.

IPO analysts said they were uncertain what effect the U.K.'s demands would have on the pricing of the deal, which aims to sell 27.84 million shares at $15 to $17 a share. The fact that KBR chose to file an updated prospectus with the new warning, rather than withdraw the offering, indicates the company is determined to go ahead with the IPO despite the U.K.'s concerns; the offering before the amended filing also appeared to be attracting strong investor interest, they said.

The shipyard has been a profitable operation for KBR. Through the first nine months of this year, KBR generated $57 million in operating income from the shipyard. Over the same period, KBR posted operating income of $125 million.

Halliburton plans to separate KBR, first by offering a 20% stake through the IPO and then through a tax-free spinoff in coming months.

According to a KBR financial filing, the British government has sought information about the company's financial stability as a separate company. If Halliburton proceeds with the IPO, the government could take control of the shipyard and reimburse KBR for the fair-market value of the assets. If the British government takes such steps, the minority owners of the shipyard could exercise their rights to buy out KBR.

KBR owns 51% of the complex. London-based Balfour Beatty PLC and Glasgow-based Weir Group PLC, both international engineering firms, own the remainder equally. Both companies declined to comment on the matter.

A spokeswoman for the British Ministry of Defence said, "We are disappointed that they've chosen to go ahead without allowing us the time for the analysis." The spokeswoman said the government retained the ability to take back control of the dockyard when it sold the dockyard. Halliburton bought a majority stake in the shipyard in 1997 and has had a contract to operate it since 1987.

KBR is best known for its work as the U.S. government's largest contractor in Iraq. A global construction and contracting firm, it also builds energy facilities around the world. Halliburton has been discussing separating KBR since 2004, although plans were delayed earlier this year because of what the company said was a bad market for IPOs.

South African Parliament Approves Gay Marriages (NYT)

By Sharon Lafraniere

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

JOHANNESBURG, Nov. 14 — South Africa's Parliament overwhelmingly voted today to legalize same-sex marriages, making the nation the first in Africa and the fifth in the world to remove legal barriers to gay and lesbian unions, according to activists.

The legislature voted after the nation's highest court ruled that South Africa's marriages statutes violated the constitution's guarantee of equal rights. The court gave the government a year to amend the legal definition of marriage. That deadline expires in two weeks.

Melanie Judge, program manager for OUT, a gay rights advocacy group, noted that the Netherlands, Belgium, Spain and Canada were the only other countries to allow same-sex marriages nationwide. In most African nations, she said, homosexuality is still treated as a crime. Some penalties are stiffer than those for rape or murder..

Ms. Judge credited South Africa's liberal constitution with forcing change.

"This has been a litmus test of our constitutional values," she said in a telephone interview. "What does equality really mean? What does it look like? Equality does not exist on a sliding scale."

Religious groups and traditional leaders strenuously opposed the measure, arguing that if necessary the constitution should be amended to outlaw same-sex unions. But the ruling African National Congress virtually demanded that lawmakers support the bill.

Despite deep divisions within the party, the measure passed 230 to 41. It must now be approved by the Council of Provinces, a quasi-federal chamber, and be signed the president to become law.

Vytjie Mentor, the party's caucus chairman, told the South African newspaper The Sunday Independent earlier this month that he expected legislators belonging to the African National Congress to vote for the measure, regardless of their personal views.

There is "no such thing as a free vote or a vote of conscience," he said. "How do you give someone permission to discriminate in the name of the A.N.C.? How do you allow for someone to vote against the constitution and the policies of the A.N.C., which is antidiscrimination?"

The new law allows both heterosexual and same-sex couples to register their unions either as marriages or civil partnerships. But in a concession to critics, it also allows civil officers to refuse to marry same-sex couples on the basis on conscience. Ms. Judge, the gay rights advocate, predicted that provision will be challenged in court.

"We can't be in the situation where civil officers can decide who they want to marry and who they don't want to marry," she said. "They aren't able to refuse to marry a black person and a white person. This is unconstitutional."

Gay Marriage Endorsed In S. Africa (WP/AP)

By Clare Nullis, Associated Press

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

CAPE TOWN, South Africa, Nov. 14 -- The South African Parliament on Tuesday overwhelmingly approved legislation recognizing gay marriages -- a first for a continent where homosexuality is largely taboo.

By a vote of 230 to 41 with three abstentions, the National Assembly passed the Civil Union Bill, a compromise that resulted from months of heated public discussion. Both traditionalists and gay rights advocates have criticized the measure, and there have been warnings that it might be unconstitutional.

Veterans of the ruling African National Congress heralded the bill for extending basic freedoms to everyone and equated it with liberation from the shackles of apartheid.

"When we attained our democracy, we sought to distinguish ourselves from an unjust painful past, by declaring that never again shall it be that any South African will be discriminated against on the basis of color, creed, culture and sex," Home Affairs Minister Nosiviwe Mapisa-Nqakula told the National Assembly.

A Christian lawmaker, Kenneth Meshoe, said Tuesday was the "saddest day in our 12 years of democracy" and warned that South Africa "was provoking God's anger."

His comments reflected the majority view on a deeply conservative continent. Homosexuality is illegal in Zimbabwe, Kenya, Uganda, Nigeria, Tanzania, Ghana and most other sub-Saharan countries. Some countries also are debating constitutional amendments to ban same-sex marriages. Even in South Africa, gay men and lesbians are often attacked because of their sexual orientation.

The outcome of Tuesday's vote was expected, given the ANC's huge majority in the National Assembly. The bill now has to go to the National Council of Provinces, where the vote is expected to be a formality, before being signed into law by President Thabo Mbeki.

The bill provides for the "voluntary union of two persons, which is solemnized and registered by either a marriage or civil union." It does not specify whether the partnerships are heterosexual or homosexual.

But it also says a marriage officer need not perform a ceremony for a same-sex couple if doing so would conflict with his or her "conscience, religion and belief."

South Africa recognized the rights of gay people in the constitution adopted after apartheid ended in 1994 -- the first in the world to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.

The bill was drawn up in order to comply with a Constitutional Court ruling in December 2005 that said existing marriage legislation was unconstitutional for discriminating against same-sex couples.

Guns And Butter Cuba's Military Puts Business On Front Lines (WSJ)

By José De Córdoba

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0094650

At the height of the Cold War, Cuba's soldiers became a legend on the island when they punched through enemy lines, defeating South Africa's army in Angola. Today Cuban generals are applying capitalist tactics to try to improve bottom lines in businesses that range from growing beans to running hotels and airlines.

Cuba's Revolutionary Armed Forces rent rooms to tourists through Gaviota SA, the island's fastest-growing hotel conglomerate. They sell premium cigars, peddle consumer goods through an island-wide retail chain and serve lobster dinners at the Divina Pastora restaurant in Havana's landmark Morro Castle. The military also has a say in allotting nickel mines and leasing offshore lots for oil exploration. The University of Miami's Institute for Cuban and Cuban-American Studies estimates that soldiers control more than 60% of the island's economy.

The military's economic role will likely become even more critical after the death of Cuba's ailing 80-year-old leader, Fidel Castro, who is widely believed to be dying of cancer. Although Mr. Castro has steadfastly opposed economic reforms during his 47-year communist regime, his younger brother and anointed successor, Raúl, has shown a deep interest in free-market experiments in the past. As defense minister since the 1959 revolution, he has frequently looked to the military as his laboratory.

With Raúl and the military at the helm of the economy, Cuba could be poised to follow what islanders call the "Chinese model" of liberalization. That means carefully experimenting with market incentives in one of the world's few remaining communist economies, while trying to retain tight political control. It's far from clear that a Raúl Castro government could accomplish a Chinese-style transformation. For one thing, China isn't located just 90 miles from the U.S. and a wealthy community of exiles looking to reshape their home country along American lines. And the military could move to extend monopolistic control -- and opportunities for corruption -- after Fidel's death, squelching any competition.

But the seeds of economic reform in Cuba may be planted more firmly than many suspect. One piece of evidence: Raúl has traveled to China a number of times to study Beijing's economic policies and in 2003 he invited the leading economic adviser to then Chinese premier Zhu Rongji, who played a leading role in opening up China to foreign trade and investment, to give a series of lectures in Cuba. Fidel Castro, who deeply opposes reforms, was a notable no-show, says Domingo Amuchastegui, a former Cuban intelligence officer who now lives in the U.S. and keeps close tabs on political developments on the island.

In the 1990s, Raúl sent officers, who had previously trained at prestigious Soviet military schools, to learn hotel management in Spain, and accounting in Europe, Latin America, Asia and Canada, says Mr. Amuchastegui. For a time, business books such as "In Search of Excellence" by Tom Peters and Robert H. Waterman became required reading for ambitious officers looking to advance in the ranks, says Eugenio Yañez, an economist who taught management to army officers at Havana's Superior Institute of Economic Direction.

Raúl, now 75, also adopted capitalist-style accounting and management incentives to run military-owned factories that made everything from uniforms to bullets. In some cases, workers were given incentive pay. Modest by Western standards, these reforms, called "perfeccionamiento empresarial" -- loosely translated as "entrepreneurial improvement" -- were nevertheless cutting-edge for Cuba.

For most of his career, Raúl Castro was considered a tough, even brutal, communist whose hand, as he put it, "didn't tremble" in 1989 when he ordered the execution of a former close colleague deemed a danger to the regime. Some analysts don't think he has changed much since then. "He's a Stalinist," says Jaime Suchlicki a Cuba analyst at the University of Miami, who predicts Raúl will resort to more repression after Fidel dies.

In recent weeks, speculation has grown about Fidel's health problems. The longtime dictator temporarily relinquished power on July 31 to Raúl after announcing he had undergone surgery for intestinal bleeding. After rumors of his death swirled in Havana, the Cuban government released a video on Oct. 28 showing a gaunt and aged Castro in a track suit. U.S. officials believe Mr. Castro has some sort of stomach or colon cancer. With his brother incapacitated, Raúl has taken a blustery communist line. "When the U.S. says there should be a transition in Cuba, they mean a shameful return to the neocolonial garbage of capitalism they imposed on this country for 60 years," Raúl told an audience of government union leaders in September.

But many Cuba watchers believe those statements are meant to give political cover to Raúl, who has become more pragmatic as he has aged, and has been searching for ways to improve Cuba's dismal economic performance, especially after the Soviet Union ended its subsidies in 1990. Between 1989 and 1993, Cuba's gross domestic product fell 35%, while the island's foreign trade slumped by 75%, says Carmelo Mesa-Lago, professor emeritus of economy at University of Pittsburgh.

As living standards plummeted, Havana residents ate many of the city's cats. An epidemic of optic neuropathy, caused by deficiencies in nutrition and resulting in temporary blindness, struck down some 35,000 Cubans. For Raúl, economic security became a critical part of national security. "Beans are more important than cannon," he told troops in 1994.

Desperate to cut costs, Raúl slashed the military from about 300,000 troops in 1990 to some 45,000 today, according to Frank O. Mora, a Cuban military expert at the National Defense University in Washington. To revive the economy, he pushed innovations such as farmers markets and self-employment for plumbers, hairdressers and other small-time entrepreneurs.

At the time, Fidel Castro reluctantly allowed the changes, because Cuba had little alternative. The Castro brothers appointed military and intelligence officers, who were their most trusted and unswervingly loyal supporters, to court foreign capital. Col. Gustavo Loret de Mola, an electrical engineer by training, was named deputy minister of communications and negotiated Cuba's first cellphone deal, with a Mexican company, in 1991, says his son, Camilo Loret de Mola. He helped the military recruit foreign tenants for Soviet-built bases that were turned into duty-free zones.

The experiments sometimes flopped. In 1998, the younger Mr. Loret de Mola says he persuaded a Spanish entrepreneur to start a travel agency and hydroponics vegetable farm inside the cavernous helicopter hangar at a former submarine base in the port of Mariel. The businessman only managed to send a few flights of cucumbers and tomatoes on Aerogaviota, an airline owned by the Cuban armed forces, before the farm went out of business. "When he had workers to harvest the vegetables, he couldn't get a plane, when he could get a plane, he couldn't get workers," says Mr. Loret de Mola, who now sells insurance in Miami.

By 2000, some 1,400 state companies out of about 3,000 were being evaluated for or being run under "perfeccionamiento" management techniques, according to Philip Peters, a former U.S. diplomat who is now a director of the Lexington Institute, an Arlington, Va., think tank. A manager of a tire plant told Mr. Peters in 2001 that using such techniques had tripled profits in just two years. While far from a free-market reform, Mr. Peters believes that the military has laid the groundwork for further-reaching reforms in the future.

Another success: The military found foreign joint-venture partners for Cuba's moribund citrus industry, which almost collapsed after losing its markets in the Soviet block. Today, citrus is an important export. Cuba's most important citrus company is a joint venture with Grupo BM, an Israeli firm that operates a 115,000-acre farm that grows grapefruit using state-of-the-art drip irrigation techniques.

An International Monetary Fund study in 2000 said the limited reforms pushed by Raúl were "instrumental" in helping turn the economy around in the mid-1990s. But then Fidel Castro clamped down on reforms, arguing that they were sullying the revolution. Now, Cuba relies on about $2 billion annually in fuel subsidies provided by Venezuela's populist president Hugo Chávez, and hundreds of millions of dollars of Chinese investment in Cuban nickel mines.

With reforms out of fashion, Cuba since 2004 has canceled business and management courses funded by the European Union, Sweden and Canada, which together trained more than 1,300 high-ranking Cuban officials in capitalist management techniques. Free-trade zones emptied, while the number of self-employed Cubans as well as foreign joint ventures fell sharply.

But the military's own economic empire has continued to grow. Today, the military's web of companies are run by the Grupo de Administración Empresarial SA, or the Business Administration Group. Known by its Spanish acronym Gaesa, the group is headed by Deputy Defense Minister Gen. Julio Casas Regueiro. The group's deputy head is Col. Luis Alberto Rodríguez, Raúl Castro's son-in-law. The group is run from offices on the fourth floor of Cuba's defense ministry, according to Mr. Mora of the National Defense University.

Gaesa's most important business is Gaviota, the tourism company. Gaviota, which means "sea gull," began by turning officers' clubs and navy bases into resorts. Now it has about 8,500 rooms out of Cuba's total of 40,000 hotel rooms. Many of its hotels are luxury four- and five-star establishments managed by companies such as Spain's Sol Melia and France's Club Med.

Gaviota also owns the domestic airline, Aerogaviota, which uses Cuban air-force pilots who fly refurbished Soviet transport airplanes. The company even organizes tours for military enthusiasts who want to visit the island's colonial forts and the no-man's land surrounding the U.S. naval base in Guantanamo, says retired Col. Hal Klepak, Canada's former military attaché in Havana, who has written a book on the Cuban military. Gaviota also rents cars, runs marinas, manages gourmet restaurants and operates an attraction that allows tourists to swim with dolphins, according to a recent study by the Spanish Institute of International Trade.

Generals also occupy top management slots in the country's economic ministries. Gen. Ulises Rosales del Toro, who was named Cuba's sugar czar in 1997, shut down two-thirds of Cuba's 156 antique sugar mills in 2002 and is still trying to revive production, which reached a 100-year historic low of 1.3 million tons this year. Other generals run the civil aviation, fishing, telecommunications and transportation ministries. A colonel is in charge of Habanos SA, a joint venture with the Spanish firm Altadis, which markets the country's famous cigars abroad. Another colonel runs the tourism ministry.

The military has the power to cut bureaucratic red tape that stifles other Cuban state entities that want to engage in business, says Mark Entwistle, a former Canadian ambassador to Havana who now advises foreign companies in Cuba. In 2004, he says that a Canadian business that wanted to grow soybeans on the island was having a hard time getting permission through the ministry of agriculture. But once the Canadians began dealing directly with the military, the red tape vanished. "The military has a whole unit devoted to doing joint ventures in agriculture," says Mr. Entwistle. "There was zero ideological content, it was 100% business."

Giving the armed forces a critical role in running the economy has helped the Castro brothers reward their supporters and gives them a stake in the preservation of the regime. But it has also introduced a corrupting influence in the military that could worsen if the military's role expands further in a post-Fidel Cuba. A number of high-ranking "entrepreneur soldiers" have already been dismissed and sometimes jailed for corruption.

The military also faces potential dissension within its ranks: Soldiers involved with foreign joint ventures, who live far better than others in the military, are viewed by many officers with distrust and envy, analysts say.

Another problem sign is what Ricardo Pascoe, a former Mexican ambassador in Havana, calls the rise of the "juniors" -- the sons of high-ranking military officers who often live abroad and enjoy privileges undreamed of by ordinary Cubans. During his time in Havana from 2001 to 2003, Mr. Pascoe says, many Mexican businessmen complained to him that the "juniors" charged commissions for contracts through their fathers.

Mr. Mora of the National Defense University believes that if unchecked the "juniors" could become the kernel of semicriminal mafias that could dominate much of the economy if Cuba liberalizes its economy. Instead of China becoming the model for Cuba, he says, Raúl Castro could inadvertently turn Cuba into a Caribbean version of oligarchic, post-Communist Russia.

Mexico Passes Resolution On Deportation (AP)

By Julie Watson

AP, November 15, 2006

Mexico's Congress was swayed Tuesday by a 7-year-old boy on a mission to save his mom.

Second-grader Saul Arellano, a U.S. citizen, appeared in Mexico's 500-member Chamber of Deputies to plead for help in lobbying Washington to stop the deportation of his mother, an illegal immigrant who has taken refuge in a Chicago church. His efforts paid off with a resolution calling on the U.S. Congress to suspend the deportation of Elvira Arellano and any other illegal immigrant parents of U.S. citizens.

If the U.S. agrees, it would "create a precedent that will benefit more than 4.9 million children who have been born in the United States and whose parents live under the threat of deportation," said Mexican congressman Jose Jacques, who lived in the United States for 33 years and has an American daughter and granddaughter.

Flashing cameras and swarms of reporters surrounded the boy as he entered the chamber. Lawmakers rose from their seats to shake his hand. But instead of stepping to the podium, he was swept into a side room, where he hid his face and ducked under a table.

"I think being so small he was kind of freaked," family friend Jesus Carlin said.

Saul then took the microphone and spoke to reporters in Spanish, describing what he wanted from Mexico's lawmakers: "I want them to tell President Bush to end the deportations so that my mother and other families can stay together in the United States."

DOJ_NMG_0094653

U.S. officials say there is no right to sanctuary in a church under U.S. law, and nothing to prevent them from arresting Elvira Arellano, who has lived at the church since Aug. 15, the day she was supposed to surrender for deportation. So far, they have not moved to seize her.

Saul and his mother live on the second floor of the church, where a small bedroom is crowded with the boy's toys and schoolbooks. They have a miniature pinscher, Daisy, to keep them company.

Arellano, 31, said she was nervous about sending her son to Mexico, and Saul was afraid she would be deported while he was away. "I told him to be calm, everything would be fine and I would be here waiting for him," she told The Associated Press in Chicago.

President Vicente Fox, who leaves office Dec. 1, failed during his six-year term to persuade the U.S. Congress to approve a migration accord allowing thousands of Mexicans to work legally in the United States. While Bush personally supports a temporary guest-worker program, Republicans in Congress opted to strengthen border security instead.

Arellano said she should not have to choose between leaving her son or taking away his rightful opportunities as an American. But conservative columnists and anti-illegal immigration activists say Arellano put herself and her son in this difficult spot by repeatedly breaking the law.

Arellano illegally crossed into the United States in 1997 and was quickly sent back. She returned within days, living for three years in Oregon before moving to Chicago in 2000. Her current troubles began when she was arrested at O'Hare International Airport, where she worked as a cleaning woman. Convicted of working under a false Social Security number, she served three years probation before being ordered to appear at the immigration office in Chicago.

Fox's spokesman Ruben Aguilar acknowledges that Arellano broke U.S. law, but "we think there exist certain elements of a humanitarian nature that should be taken into account to avoid splitting up the family."

Bring In The Green Cat (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

Chongming, China

I've been a regular visitor to China since 1990, and here's what strikes me most: Each year that I've come here, China's people seem to speak with greater ease and breathe with greater difficulty.

Yes, you can now have amazingly frank talks with officials and journalists here. But when I walked out of my room the morning after I arrived in Shanghai, the air was so smoky — from the burning of farm fields after the harvest — that for a moment I honestly thought my hotel was on fire.

And that's why, for the first time, it's starting to feel to me like China is reaching its environmental limits. If it doesn't radically change to greener, more sustainable modes of design, transport, production and power generation, the Chinese miracle is going to turn into an eco-nightmare.

For some three decades now, China's economy has grown at around 10 percent per year, based on low-cost labor and little regard for the waste it pumps into its rivers and the air. When a country grows that fast, year after year, it can start to think that the laws of nature don't apply to it.

Guess again. China has been doing the environmental equivalent of jumping from an airplane and thinking that it's flying, argued Rob Watson, an expert on China's environment who heads the green building services firm EcoTech International. "After you jump out of a plane, for about five miles you can actually feel like you're flying," he added. But then reality hits. "It's not the fall that kills you — it's the sudden stop at the end, and China may be approaching that sudden stop. ... When you stress a system to a certain point, it just stops working."

China's top leaders understand the crisis. But their response is complicated by so many Chinese flooding from the countryside to cities. In their view, political stability depends on finding those people jobs, and jobs depend on growth, and growth depends on China continuing to be the low-cost producer of everything — environment be damned.

But China can't do what the West did: grow now, clean up later. Because the unprecedented pace and scale of its growth are going to make later too late. The China Daily reported this week that at least 24 million acres of cultivated land in China — one-tenth of the country's total arable land — is now polluted, posing a "grave threat" to China's food safety. More than half its rivers are also polluted, which is why less than 9 percent of "drinkable water" met government standards for bacteria in 243 rural supply stations recently tested. Many wells have excessive nitrates that can cause diabetes or kidney damage. No wonder some high-tech workers are starting to avoid China, because they don't want to live in a dirty cloud.

Chinese officials fear that if they move to U.S.-level green production and environmental cleanup, "China will not be such a low-cost producer anymore, and that will affect jobs," noted Dan Rosen, an expert on China's economy and head of China Strategic Advisory. But what they are missing is that going green is not just a problem, but an opportunity. Pollution represents waste and inefficiency. Green companies are always more efficient, adds Mr. Watson, and China has a chance to become a major innovator of low-cost green solutions. When U.S. companies went green, they consistently overestimated the costs and underestimated the savings.

The other day, I sailed with Mr. Rosen from Shanghai up the Yangtze Delta to Chongming Island, the world's largest alluvial island. There, Shanghai is trying to expand, by building the first eco-metropolis in China, based on eco-tourism, farming, wind and solar power. When you see the parklands created there, or when you stand in the protected wetlands and watch the water buffalo lounging in the mud, while peasants collect crabs, you can almost believe that China can change course.

But then, off in the distance, you see this massive bridge that is about to connect Chongming to central Shanghai, and you wonder what will happen to all the green plans here when all the overloaded trucks and consumers start rushing in. If Chongming is just a green ornament attached to Shanghai, it will never survive. If it is a model for a whole new kind of development, it, and China, have a chance.

Deng Xiaoping once famously said of China's economy: "Black cat, white cat, all that matters is that it catches mice" — i.e., forget about communist ideology, all that matters is that China grows. Not anymore, said Mr. Rosen. "Now the cat better be green, otherwise it is going to die before it catches the mouse."

'I Am Not Guilty' (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

On Monday in a Bangladesh courtroom, a judge read the following charge to a defendant: "By praising the Jews and Christians, by attempting to travel to Israel and by predicting the so-called rise of Islamist militancy in the country and expressing such through writings inside the country and abroad, you have tried to damage the image and relations of Bangladesh with the outside world. For which, charges under section 295-A, 120-A, 124-A, 105-A and 108-A are brought against you. Are you guilty or not?"

Answered the defendant: "I am not guilty."

The defendant is journalist Salah Uddin Shoaib Choudhury. As editor of the Weekly Blitz, Mr. Choudhury wrote articles friendly to Israel and critical of Islamic militants, and sought to travel to Israel in 2003 for a writers' conference. He never made it. Instead, he was detained at the airport in Dhaka, imprisoned in solitary confinement and without trial for 17 months and denied medical treatment for glaucoma.

Mr. Choudhury was finally released in early 2005, largely thanks to pressure from Illinois Representative Mark Kirk. But the campaign against him, official and otherwise, never abated. The offices of his newspaper were bombed and later overrun by a mob. The government continued to press the charges. If convicted, Mr. Choudhury could be hanged.

The good news is that Congress is paying attention: Yesterday, Mr. Kirk and New York Democrat Nita Lowey introduced a resolution demanding the charges be dropped. That should get the attention of a government that receives $64 million a year in American aid. The government of Bangladesh might also consider that the harm it claims Mr. Choudhury's journalism has done to its national "image" has, in fact, been wholly self-inflicted.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Justice Department's Brief On Detention Policy Draws Ire (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

Critics of U.S. detention policies warned yesterday that a brief legal document filed by the Justice Department this week raises the possibility that any of the millions of immigrants living in the United States could be subject to indefinite detention if they are accused of ties to terrorist groups.

In a six-page motion filed in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit in Richmond, Justice Department lawyers argue that an anti-terrorism law approved by Congress last month allows the government to detain any foreign national declared to be an enemy combatant, even if he is arrested and imprisoned inside the United States.

The government argues that a legal challenge by alleged al-Qaeda sleeper agent Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri should be dismissed because the former Bradley University graduate student has no standing in regular civilian courts. Under the new law, the Military Commissions Act, the Pentagon plans to place Marri into its new military trial system as soon as his criminal case is dismissed, according to the filing.

In the past, foreign nationals arrested in the United States have generally had the right to challenge their imprisonment for immigration violations or other alleged crimes in U.S. civilian courts. In the Marri case, the Justice Department essentially argues for an exception for those arrested as enemy combatants, legal experts said.

"It's been the case since the nation's founding that immigrants have a constitutional right to test their detention in a court," said one of Marri's attorneys, Jonathan Hafetz, of the Brennan Center for Justice at the New York University School of Law. "What it means is that any of the millions of immigrants in the United States could be arrested, taken from their homes and thrown in a military jail and denied their right to go to court."

Justice spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said in a statement that Marri attended an al-Qaeda training camp, met with the alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, and entered the country "to serve as an al Qaeda sleeper agent and to explore methods of disrupting the U.S. financial system.

"Enemy combatants are not entitled to preferential treatment merely because they have succeeded in entering our borders with the intent to harm American citizens or interests," Roehrkasse said.

Marri, a Qatari national, has been in a military brig in South Carolina since he was accused in June 2003 of being an al-Qaeda "sleeper" agent sent to the United States to stage attacks after the Sept. 11 attacks. Marri has filed a petition in federal court alleging that he is being jailed unlawfully and deprived of rights of due process. That claim was rejected by a district court and is on appeal.

Justice lawyers argue in their court filing that Marri "has been properly detained as an enemy combatant" and has not produced any evidence rebutting the government's allegations against him. The government makes no mention in the filing that Marri was arrested and imprisoned inside the territorial United States.

The distinction could prove important, because legal experts on both sides of the issue agree that the location of Marri's arrest and detention gives him an important legal advantage over detainees arrested overseas. About 435 such detainees are confined at the military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

"It was pretty clear that they'd try to get his complaint dismissed," said Robert Chesney, a specialist in national security law at Wake Forest University. "What's different about al-Marri is that he's not just an enemy combatant at Gitmo; he's an enemy combatant captured and held in the U.S. . . . He may have a much stronger constitutional argument."

The provision of the military commissions act that stripped detainees of access to U.S. courts was approved by Congress last month and aimed primarily at Guantanamo Bay detainees, many of whom had filed legal challenges to their prolonged confinement. The new law provides for trials of enemy combatants before military panels instead of civilian judges or juries.

Douglas Kmiec, a Pepperdine University law professor who was a Justice Department official during the Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush administrations, said the Justice brief signals that this administration believes Congress has given it clear authority to declare foreign nationals as enemy combatants, wherever they are captured.

"It not only opens up the universe of people who may be subjected to these specialized procedures, but it does it emphatically with Congress's approval," Kmiec said. "It remains to be seen whether that changes the judicial dynamic."

Spin And Consequences (NYT)

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

When President Bush announced in September that he was transferring 14 men suspected of heinous acts of terrorism to Guantánamo Bay, his aim was baldly political — to stampede Congress into passing a profoundly flawed law that set up military tribunals to try "illegal enemy combatants" and absolved U.S. officials of liability for illegally detaining and torturing prisoners.

But that cynical White House move may also have unintentionally provided the loose thread to unravel the secrecy and lawlessness that have cloaked the administration's handling of terrorism suspects.

For more than two years, the Central Intelligence Agency and the Justice Department have vigorously battled efforts to force the administration to account for the network of secret C.I.A. camps at which specially designated prisoners are hidden away. It has resisted a lawsuit by the American Civil Liberties Union that seeks the release of documents relating to prisoner policies, including the C.I.A. prisons. Government lawyers have argued that even admitting that some documents existed would endanger national security.

But when Mr. Bush announced that he was sending the 14 prisoners to Guantánamo for trial, he effectively confirmed the existence of the secret C.I.A. prisons. Later, in the debate over the Military Commissions Act of 2006, Mr. Bush said that Congress had to absolve C.I.A. agents of any legal responsibility for their actions so he could order them to go on interrogating prisoners.

That was a major blow to the C.I.A.'s legal strategy. After all, if the president could talk about the prisons and interrogations to suit his political interests, why couldn't they be discussed in court?

The Justice Department quietly reversed field after Mr. Bush's announcement, and it informed the A.C.L.U. in a letter last week that two of the documents the group has been seeking do, in fact, exist — although it is still refusing to release them.

One of those documents is a presidential order signed by Mr. Bush authorizing the C.I.A. to set up prisons outside the United States to house terrorism suspects. The other is a 2002 memo from the Justice Department outlining what sorts of "aggressive interrogation techniques" may be used against those prisoners. That phrase, we now know, is Bush administration code for acts that the rest of the world regards as abuse and even torture.

The government now has to file a detailed argument by the end of this month explaining why it believes these documents should not be made public.

Courts are sympathetic to legitimate claims of national security when it comes to intelligence and military operations. But the Bush administration has abused the courts' — and the nation's — trust in the indiscriminate way it has tried to hide its policies behind a supposed shield of national security. At the very least, it should now be much harder for government lawyers to do that.

It would be even better if the courts ultimately compelled the release of these and other documents. Americans have a right to know what standards their president has been applying to the treatment of prisoners. The nation's image is at stake, as well as the safety of every man and woman who is fighting Mr. Bush's so-called war on terror.

SuperMax Prison Is Super Lax, Court Cases Allege (CNN)

CNN.com, November 15, 2006

FLORENCE, Colorado (CNN) -- Two California court cases are raising questions about whether prisoners in the nation's toughest prison, SuperMax, are continuing to commit crimes by smuggling coded messages out of the high-security institution.

Officially known as Administrative Maximum (ADX) in Florence, Colorado, SuperMax is home to convicted terrorists such as Olympic bomber Eric Rudolph, Unabomber Ted Kaczynski and Ramzi Yousef, who led the first World Trade Center attack.

Even though he is serving a life term, Mexican Mafia leader Ruben "Nite Owl" Castro was indicted recently on conspiracy charges that accuse him of continuing to run 18th Street Gang drug sales on the streets of Los Angeles from his SuperMax cell.

Two leaders of the Aryan Brotherhood prison gang are to be sentenced next week in federal court in Santa Ana, California. They were convicted on conspiracy charges including instigating a murderous race war at another prison through a message smuggled out of SuperMax.

A report by the Justice Department's inspector general found the Bureau of Prisons "is unable to effectively monitor the mail of terrorist and other high-risk inmates in order to detect and prevent terrorism and criminal activities."

While that finding, issued in October, was aimed at the entire federal prison system, the report said SuperMax failed to monitor at least half of each month's inmate phone calls for the last year checked.

The prison employees' union and local officials say the guard force at SuperMax is well below the number employed when the prison opened a dozen years ago, and it has sunk below the minimum manpower levels established a year ago.

The warden at SuperMax and top prisons officials in Washington declined CNN requests for an interview.

Colorado State Democratic Rep. Buffie McFadyen, whose Pueblo district includes SuperMax, said budget problems for the prison system have left the top-security facility short-changed and short-staffed.

Terrorists inside the prison could be plotting another attack without anyone knowing it, McFadyen said.

"Absolutely. Could happen, could happen," she said. "And that should be frightening for any citizen in the United States of America."

The two Aryan Brotherhood leaders, Barry Mills and Tyler Bingham, were convicted of smuggling out a message in invisible ink calling for a racial war against blacks at a prison in Pennsylvania.

Federal prosecutor Terri K. Flynn said of the message, "It was written in grapefruit juice. And pretty much, you write it in a Q-tip or toothpick, and then the back of it is heated up, and the message becomes visible."

Prosecutors asked for the death sentence for Mills and Bingham, but the jury deadlocked on that part of the case, and so both face automatic sentences next week of life without parole.

Mills already is serving a life sentence on a previous conviction.

So is Castro, who was convicted in another drug conspiracy case more than a decade ago. The latest federal indictment says he used coded letters, phone calls and his girlfriend's help to get messages out of SuperMax and that he supervised the collection of kickbacks on drug sales in his gang's territory just west of downtown Los Angeles.

No date has been set for his trial.

A recent ruling by a federal arbitrator said because of manpower problems at SuperMax, entire cell blocks were left without inside staffing for full shifts on a number of occasions. The doors are electronically controlled, however, and there is constant remote-control camera surveillance.

In addition, the arbitrator found, "Inmate cells were no longer being searched on a regular basis due to lack of staff."

The inspector general's report said, at times, the special investigators who are supposed to read inmate mail at SuperMax were pulled from their duties to fill vacancies in the cell block staffing.

The Justice Department inquiry was initiated when Spanish authorities found a SuperMax inmate, Mohammed Salameh, who rented the Ryder truck used in the first World Trade Center bombing in 1993, had been sending letters to a terror cell with links to suspects in the deadly 2004 Madrid train bombings.

Since then, SuperMax staffing has continued to drop, the prison union says. A decision on prison system funding is pending in Congress' current lame-duck session.

ACLU: Warrantless Surveillance Program Threatens Democracy (AP)

AP, November 15, 2006

CINCINNATI - Warrantless wiretaps that the government says are necessary to fight terrorism pose a threat to American democracy, the American Civil Liberties Union said in court papers filed Tuesday.

The ACLU is asking the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to reinstate a lower court decision that said the Bush administration's warrantless surveillance program is unconstitutional.

President Bush has said the program is needed to detect terrorists. Opponents argue it oversteps constitutional boundaries on free speech, privacy and executive powers.

"The government's sweeping theory of executive power would allow the president to violate any law passed by Congress," the ACLU said. "This theory presents a profound threat to our democratic system.

"The government complains that the district court overreached, but it is the government's theory that is radical, not the district court's rejection of it."

The government argued in its brief filed last month that the surveillance program is necessary to protect the nation from an ongoing national security threat.

U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit ruled Aug. 17 that the program violates the rights to free speech and privacy and the separation of powers.

A three-judge panel of the Cincinnati-based appeals court ruled Oct. 4 that the administration could keep the program in place while it appeals Taylor's decision.

DOJ_NMG_0094661

The surveillance program monitors international phone calls and e-mails to or from the United States involving people suspected by the government of having terrorist links. A secret court has been set up to grant warrants for such surveillance, but the government says it can't always wait for a court to act.

The ACLU filed a lawsuit in January seeking to stop the program on behalf of journalists, scholars and lawyers claiming it has made it difficult for them to do their jobs because they believe many of their overseas contacts are likely targets.

"The terrorist surveillance program is a critical tool that ensures we have in place an early warning system to detect and prevent a terrorist attack," said Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller.

"In the ongoing conflict with al-Qaida and its allies, the president has the primary duty under the Constitution to protect the American people. As we stated in our appeal, the Constitution gives the president the full authority necessary to carry out that solemn duty, and we believe the program is lawful and protects civil liberties."

Al-Arian Appeals Ruling That Forces His Testimony (AP)

AP, November 15, 2006

TAMPA -- A former Tampa college professor who pleaded guilty to aiding a Palestinian terrorist group has appealed a federal judge's ruling that forces him to testify before a grand jury in Virginia.

Attorneys for former University of South Florida professor Sami Al-Arian contend that the terms of his plea agreement freed him from further cooperation with the government.

They asked the 11th Circuit Court of Appeals on Monday to overturn a ruling by a Tampa federal judge forcing Al-Arian to testify in the grand jury investigation of the International Institute of Islamic Thought in Herndon, Va., which funded Al-Arian's Palestinian think tank in Tampa.

Al-Arian pleaded guilty in April to one count of aiding the Palestinian Islamic Jihad with nonviolent activities and was sentenced to 57 months in prison. Prosecutors had accused him of being an active member of the PIJ, but a six month trial last year failed to produce a guilty verdict.

When called before the grand jury in Alexandria, Va., on Oct. 19, Al-Arian refused to answer questions, prompting a prosecutor to suggest that a contempt order should be issued that could extend Al-Arian's prison sentence by 18 months.

Federal Judge Sentences Cuban Exiles On Weapons Charges (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, November 15, 2006

Two longtime anti-Castro activists convicted of plotting to possess illegal weapons were sentenced to between three and four years in prison Tuesday in Fort Lauderdale federal court.

Santiago Alvarez, a wealthy Miami developer who has supported Cuban exile causes, must serve about four years in prison and pay a $10,000 fine. His colleague, Osvaldo Mitat, must serve three years but does not have to pay any fine.

Both men, who pleaded guilty in September on the eve of their high-stakes trial, avoided the possibility of imprisonment for the rest of their lives.

Alvarez, 65, and Mitat, 64, had cut plea deals on one count of conspiring to possess illegal weapons. The other charges, including possessing illegal weapons, were dropped. Those offenses, coupled with the conspiracy count, carried a maximum of 20 years in prison.

U.S. District Judge James Cohn, who imposed the sentences, had rejected bids by the pair's legal team to move the men's trial to Miami federal court and also opposed an 11th-hour proposal to include Cuban Americans from Miami-Dade County in the Broward County jury pool.

Cuban exile leaders, who view the two men as patriots in the long struggle to topple Cuba leader Fidel Castro, criticized those decisions and lamented the plea deals.

Both men, who have been in custody for one year, were accused of conspiring to stash machine guns, firearms, a silencer and a grenade launcher in a Broward apartment complex that belonged to Alvarez. Both were ordered to forfeit those weapons as part of their sentencings.

U.S. government agents first learned about Alvarez in May 2005 when he helped Cuban exile militant Luis Posada Carriles emerge from hiding before his arrest for entering the country illegally. Posada, who has been implicated in various alleged terror attacks against Cuba, is still in federal custody in Texas.

The government's star witness in the Alvarez-Mitat prosecution was going to be an FBI informant identified as Gilberto Abascal. He allegedly transported the weapons from the Broward apartment building to Mitat in Miami -- tipping off agents from Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the FBI.

The defendants' lawyers claimed Abascal was a spy for the Cuban government and the FBI. At trial, they had planned to show that Abascal set up his former friends, Alvarez and Mitat.

Federal prosecutors Jacqueline Arango and Randy Hummel had planned to blunt attacks on their witness by proving to jurors that the two defendants conspired to hide weapons in a storage facility at the Lauderhill complex.

Although they never accused the men of planning to use those firearms in an attack against the Cuban government, the prosecutors intended to introduce evidence that showed Alvarez had financed a failed 2001 incursion against Castro, among other paramilitary activities.

The defendants' high-powered legal team -- Robert Josefsberg, Kendall Coffey, Ben Kuehne, Arturo Hernandez and Peter Prieto -- was negotiating the plea deal with prosecutors until just before trial.

That deal, however, had been on the table for months. It took the threat of trial for both sides to reach a meeting of the minds.

Prominent Cuban Exile Gets Almost 4 Years In Prison In Arms Case (FLSUNSEN)

By Vanessa Blum, Sun-sentinel.com

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, November 15, 2006

FORT LAUDERDALE -- Prominent Cuban exile Santiago Alvarez was sentenced on Monday to almost four years in federal prison in a weapons case.

Alvarez recently admitted he illegally stashed weapons at a Lauderhill apartment complex and attempted to move them after federal authorities appeared at his office with a search warrant.

In addition to the 46 months prison sentence, U.S. District Court Judge James Cohn also ordered Alvarez, 65, to serve two years of probation and pay a $10,000 fine.

Alvarez's long-time pal and co-defendant, Osvaldo Mitat, 64, was sentenced to 3 years, 1 month in federal prison in the case to be followed by two years of probation. Mitat had also pleaded guilty in the case.

Defense attorneys argued that the two men in the case were patriots, not crooks.

But Cohn answered, "This court recognizes the ultimate objective and goal of Mr. Alvarez and Mr. Mitat has always been a free and democratic Cuba. This court does not question the altruistic motive here. However … we are a nation of laws."

Alvarez, a real-estate developer, and co-defendant Osvaldo Mitat recently pleaded guilty to a single conspiracy charge stemming from the Nov. 18 seizure of a white fishing cooler containing machine guns, numerous firearms with serial numbers removed, an unregistered silencer and a grenade launcher.

Prosecutors contended Alvarez and Mitat both staunch anti-Castro Cuban exiles, maintained caches of weapons, including one in the Bahamas, to use in attacks on Cuba.

According to a factual summary of the case agreed to Monday by both sides: Federal agents executed a search warrant on Alvarez's Hialeah office Nov. 18, after intercepting a parcel addressed to Alvarez containing counterfeit Guatemalan identification documents. As the search continued, Alvarez asked an employee to transport a cooler containing weapons from the Lauderhill apartment to a location in Miami, where Mitat would pick it up.

The employee, who was an FBI informant, tipped off agents to the exchange. Authorities arrested Mitat as he took possession of the weapons and arrested Alvarez later.

Before his arrest, Alvarez was best known for his support of Cuban militant Luis Posada Carilles. Cuban and Venezuelan authorities accuse Posada of orchestrating the bombing of a Cuban airliner in 1976 that killed 73 people.

When Posada mysteriously arrived in Miami in 2005 after years in hiding, Alvarez acted as his chief spokesman and defender. Posada is in federal custody in El Paso, Texas, where he has been held since his arrest on immigration charges.

Anti-Castro Activist Gets 4 Years (AP)

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. — A Cuban-American activist was sentenced Tuesday to nearly four years in prison for hiding military-style weapons in what prosecutors said was to be an attempt to overthrow the Cuban government.

U.S. District Judge James Cohn imposed a 46-month term on wealthy developer Santiago Alvarez, a key benefactor of jailed Cuban militant Luis Posada Carriles, for conspiring to possess arms including machine guns and a grenade launcher.

Osvaldo Mitat, an Alvarez employee, was sentenced to 37 months on the same count. Both will get credit for the year they have served.

Alvarez, 65, and Mitat, 64, pleaded guilty in September in a plea deal that included dismissal of five other criminal charges. They were arrested a year ago after an informant tipped off the FBI that a large marine cooler full of weapons was being moved from apartments in Broward County owned by Alvarez to Mitat in Miami.

A search at an apartment complex revealed more weapons and thousands of rounds of ammunition. Another arms cache was found in the Bahamas, including C-4 plastic explosives, that prosecutors said was linked to Alvarez.

Defense lawyers said attempts by exiles to bring freedom to Cuba were comparable to risks taken by heroes of the American Revolution and communist resistance figures such as Poland's Lech Walesa.

"That's why they did what they did. They are great patriots," attorney Robert Josefsberg said.

Cohn said that he recognized the men's goal was "a free and democratic Cuba" but that the serious nature of the crime demanded punishment.

"Nobody questions the underlying motives here," Cohn said. "However, as we all know, we are a nation of laws. Sanctions must be imposed."

Alvarez is a longtime associate of Posada, a former CIA operative accused by Cuba and Venezuela of masterminding the 1976 bombing of a Cuban airliner that killed 73 people. A judge has ruled that Posada, now in immigration custody in Texas, must be deported to a country other than those two, but the U.S. cannot find one willing to take him.

U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta of Miami, who is also Cuban-American, declined to comment.

Bring The Cuban Terrorist To Justice (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 15, 2006

IT IS TIME TO BRING Cuban terrorist Luis Posada Carriles to justice. Dithering on the part of the U.S. is leaving the nation open to charges of hypocrisy in the war on terror — specifically, to the charge that some forms of terrorism are more acceptable than others.

The 78-year-old Posada is lionized by hard-line anti-Castro Cuban exiles in Miami. He stands accused of conspiring to blow up a Cuban airliner in 1976, causing 73 deaths. He denies involvement, but newly declassified documents place him at planning sessions for the attack.

Posada has boasted of bombing hotels in Havana that resulted in one death and 11 injuries. In 2000, a Panamanian jury convicted Posada and three other terrorists of plotting to assassinate Cuban President Fidel Castro, and they were jailed. Outgoing Panamanian President Mireya Moscoso, however, pardoned the four — some believe as a favor to the White House.

A naturalized Venezuelan citizen, Posada was arrested in spring 2005 for entering the U.S. illegally. An immigration judge has since blocked his deportation to stand trial in either Venezuela or Cuba because of concerns about the fairness of any proceeding in those countries. The Bush administration now faces a choice between trying Posada in this country or setting him free in February.

Letting him walk would clearly be an outrage, and trying him in a U.S. courtroom after refusing to hand him over to Venezuela would create a perception problem across Latin America. The State Department has approached a few countries to take Posada, but all have refused.

It isn't clear whether Spain is one of these nations, but the Socialist government of Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero should be encouraged to resolve this impasse. Madrid is a credible interlocutor between Washington and Latin America, and Spanish courts have a recent tradition — thanks in large measure to crusading magistrate Baltasar Garzon, who pursued former Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet, among others — of aggressively taking on cases of universal jurisdiction.

Washington should broker a deal that allows Posada to be tried in a third country whose principled neutrality is not questioned in this case — even if it means upsetting some Cuban Americans in Miami or putting up with some embarrassing revelations about CIA activity among the exile community.

The alternative is for the U.S. insistence that nations band together to fight the war on terror to sound hypocritically self-serving.

12 Detainees Sue Rumsfeld In Germany, Citing Abuse (NYT)

By Mark Landler

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

FRANKFURT, Nov. 14 — A week after President Bush announced that Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld would resign, lawyers asked a German prosecutor to investigate Mr. Rumsfeld and other American officials for suspected war crimes stemming from the treatment of prisoners in military jails in Iraq and Cuba.

The lawsuit filed in Karlsruhe on Tuesday cites 11 other current and former American officials, including Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, who it says helped formulate legal reasoning legitimizing the use of torture.

The suit, filed by civil-rights legal groups on behalf of 12 detainees — 11 Iraqis and a Saudi — asserts that they were subjected to beatings, sleep deprivation, withholding of food and sexual humiliation.

With lawyers all but admitting they do not expect to see Mr. Rumsfeld hauled before a German court, the suit is as much about politics as it is about law. They hope to make an example of the man who helped engineer the war policy in Iraq, hounding him into private life with suits filed in other countries if Germany does not pursue the case.

"Even if we never put Rumsfeld on trial in a German court, he will be harassed and publicly stamped as a torturer," said Wolfgang Kaleck, a Berlin lawyer who filed the complaint along with the Center for Constitutional Rights, an American group, and other legal organizations.

Mr. Kaleck acknowledged that Germany would be reluctant to prosecute top American officials. But he described a protracted legal procedure, during which he said Mr. Rumsfeld might encounter trouble traveling to Germany or other European Union countries. The lawyers picked Germany in part because German law has the principle of universal jurisdiction, under which courts are entitled to prosecute people for war crimes regardless of where the crimes were committed.

The Pentagon is in the process of reviewing the filing, said a spokeswoman, Cynthia O. Smith. "We have no reason to believe the suit has merit," she said, adding that the allegations of abuse at the Abu Ghraib prison in Baghdad and at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, had been reviewed by Congress and the courts.

The German prosecutor's office confirmed it had received the document and said it would begin reviewing it.

This is the second time lawyers have asked German prosecutors to investigate Mr. Rumsfeld in connection with accusations of war crimes. Prosecutors turned down a request in February 2005, saying the case would be better handled by United States prosecutors.

The lawyers contend that almost two years later, the United States has done nothing to investigate the role of senior Bush administration officials in the treatment of prisoners who are suspected terrorists.

Moreover, they contend, the Military Commissions Act, passed in September, will make it harder to prosecute American officials at home if charged with violating the Geneva Conventions because it is intended to provide retroactive immunity dating to the Sept. 11 attacks.

"We've had two years of complete inaction by the Bush administration," said Kenneth Roth, the executive director of Human Rights Watch, which has expressed support for the case. "They've been very good at prosecuting lower-level officials, but done nothing to investigate high-level officials."

Among the others charged in the suit are John C. Yoo and Jay S. Bybee, two former Justice department lawyers who were integral in drafting the administration's legal arguments for treatment of suspected terrorists. It also cites George J. Tenet, the former director of the Central Intelligence Agency.

Janis L. Karpinski, who as a brigadier general commanded the military police unit at Abu Ghraib and was relieved of her command and demoted to colonel after the abuses came to light, has offered to testify. Ms. Karpinski, who was a defendant in the first lawsuit and has since left the Army Reserve, traveled to Berlin to offer to stand as a witness.

While the first lawsuit focused on Abu Ghraib, this one includes as a plaintiff Mohammed al-Qahtani, a Saudi who was arrested in Afghanistan months after American officials said he tried to meet some of the Sept. 11 hijackers. A lawyer for Mr. Qahtani, who is being held at Guantánamo Bay, says he was subjected to abuse authorized by Mr. Rumsfeld.

The lawyers said they also chose to file the suit in Germany for practical reasons. Several military officials implicated in the mistreatment at Abu Ghraib returned to bases in Germany and, if still here, could testify.

The lawsuit comes at an awkward time for Chancellor Angela Merkel, who has been trying to improve German-American relations.

Prosecuting high-level officials for war crimes in foreign countries has a patchy record, legal experts say. A Spanish judge was unable to win the extradition of Gen. Augusto Pinochet, the former Chilean dictator, to face trial for crimes against humanity. But General Pinochet was held in London, and upon return to Chile, he found himself under legal siege.

Henry A. Kissinger, a former secretary of state, has been sought for questioning by overseas courts about involvement with Latin American dictatorships in the 1970s.

"If I were Rumsfeld's travel agent, I would advise him to choose some other part of 'old Europe,' " said Detlev F. Vagts, emeritus professor of international law at Harvard Law School, referring to Mr. Rumsfeld's now famous poke at two wayward American allies, Germany and France. "There is some danger out there."

War Crimes Probe Sought For Rumsfeld (AP)

By Stephen Graham

Lawyers for inmates of Iraq's Abu Ghraib prison and Guantanamo Bay asked German prosecutors Tuesday to open a war crimes investigation of outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and other U.S. officials for their alleged roles in abuse at the detention centers.

Although the lawyers who filed the lawsuit acknowledged while there was little chance of seeing Rumsfeld in a German jail, the point was simply to increase the pressure on top brass they say are culpable. German federal prosecutors said they would examine the case.

"We are not expecting that Rumsfeld will appear in a court, but we are hoping investigators will begin looking into the case," said Wolfgang Kaleck, a German lawyer involved in the suit.

The 220-page lawsuit, which also names 13 other U.S. officials, was sent to federal prosecutors under a German law that allows the prosecution of war crimes regardless of where they were committed. It alleges that Rumsfeld personally ordered and condoned torture.

Bryan Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman, said U.S. officials had not seen the complaint, but said media reports suggested it was "frivolous."

"Abu Ghraib is something that the U.S. government has investigated very thoroughly," Whitman said, noting more than a dozen probes as well as congressional hearings. "The appropriate individuals have been held accountable."

Former U.S. Army Brig. Gen. Janis Karpinski, the one-time commander of all U.S. military prisons in Iraq, said she would testify against her superiors because only a handful of low-ranking soldiers have been convicted in the abuse at Baghdad's Abu Ghraib prison.

Karpinski, who was relieved of her command and demoted to colonel last year, said she wanted to "be a voice for my soldiers."

"They were tried and convicted in the world court before they ever set foot in any courtroom ... while people who are far more culpable and responsible have walked away blameless," Karpinski said during a presentation of the case in Berlin.

There have been 11 convictions and about a dozen courts-martial in the United States related to Abu Ghraib.

The suit is brought on behalf of 12 alleged torture victims — 11 Iraqis held at Abu Ghraib and Mohamad al-Qahtani, a Saudi being held at the U.S. military prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, who has been identified by the U.S. as a would-be participant in the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

Captured in December 2001 along the Afghanistan-Pakistan border, al-Qahtani would not crack under normal questioning, so Rumsfeld approved harsher methods, according to the testimony before Congress.

After FBI agents raised concerns, military investigators began reviewing the case and in July 2005 said they confirmed abusive and degrading treatment that included forcing al-Qahtani to wear a bra, dance with another man, stand naked in front of women, and behave like a dog. Still, the Pentagon determined "no torture occurred."

German prosecutors already declined to investigate a more limited lawsuit in 2005, arguing that it was up to the U.S. to hold any inquiry and that there were no indications U.S. authorities or courts would refrain from doing so.

Since then, there have been "no efforts in the United States to go up the chain of command — they've basically been given impunity from any investigation or prosecution," said Michael Ratner, president of New York's Center for Constitutional Rights, which is behind the litigation.

The attorneys think they have a better case this time, armed with documents from 2005 congressional hearings on the al-Qahtani case. They argue that Rumsfeld's resignation last week means prosecutors may be under less political pressure to avoid the case.

In addition to Rumsfeld, the suit names Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, former CIA director George Tenet, former commander of all U.S. forces in Iraq Lt. Gen. Ricardo Sanchez and eight others, alleging they either ordered, aided, or failed to prevent war crimes.

The lawyers said the case could not be brought with the International Criminal Court, because the United States is not a member, and could not be pursued through the U.N. because the U.S. has veto power.

Kaleck said the suit's backers would appeal if prosecutors refuse to take up the case, and raised the prospect of further attempts in other European countries.

Qaeda Leaders Losing Sway Over Militants, Study Finds (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 14 — As radical Islam spreads globally through online forums and chat rooms, a group of obscure Arab religious thinkers may come to exert more influence over the jihadist movement than Osama bin Laden and other well-known leaders of Al Qaeda, a research group at the United States Military Academy has concluded.

In a study billed as the "first systematic mapping" of an ideology sometimes called jihadism, the Combating Terrorism Center at West Point has found that Mr. bin Laden and his deputy, Ayman al-Zawahri, have had a relatively minor influence on the movement's intellectual foundation. Among the network's ideologists, they have come to be seen more as propagandists than strategic thinkers.

And while the two Qaeda leaders have released a flurry of video and audio messages to their followers over the past year, the study found that the scholarly work of a group of Saudi and Jordanian clerics — most notably Abu Muhammad al-Maqdisi, a Jordanian — seems more likely to influence the next generation of Islamic militants.

As a result, the authors found, the death or capture of Mr. bin Laden and Mr. Zawahri would do little to slow the spread of jihadist ideology.

"It would be a blow in terms of the emotional impact, but in terms of the larger movement that the foot soldiers are being recruited into, it wouldn't put much of a dent into it at all," said William McCants, the chief author of the new report, "The Militant Ideology Atlas."

The 382-page report, a kind of who's who of the global jihadist movement, examines the most influential and widely read texts among the thousands of tracts in Al Qaeda's online library, known as the Tawhed.

With the dismantling of the Qaeda hierarchy that existed on Sept. 11, 2001, and the diffusion of the jihadist movement into smaller, more localized cells, the Tawhed has gained new significance in helping to shape militant thought.

American officials say they fear that the next generation of terrorist attacks could be carried out not by militants trained in Al Qaeda camps but by fighters influenced by radical texts posted online.

"The radicalization process is occurring more quickly, more widely and more anonymously in the Internet age, raising the likelihood of surprise attacks by unknown groups whose members and supporters may be difficult to pinpoint," concluded a National Intelligence Estimate on global terrorism completed this year.

With the American military reorganizing to fight what could be a battle for decades against radical militants, the military academy has become one of the Pentagon's centers of research on counterterrorism and jihadist ideology. Although situated at West Point, the Combating Terrorism Center is an independent research group financed by private sources and the government.

The report found that radical Islam, sometimes called Salafism, is so deeply embedded in the Arab world that Salafis now constitute a "majority or significant portion" of the Muslim population in the Middle East and North Africa.

"Western governments have neither the local credibility nor the cultural expertise necessary to diminish the popularity of Salafism," the study found.

The report said most Salafis are not jihadis who are committed to violence, and some outside experts said the spread of radical ideology in cyberspace could lead to opportunities for Western efforts to exploit divisions within the movement.

Bruce Hoffman, a terrorism expert at Georgetown University and a senior fellow at the Combating Terrorism Center, said it was far too early to presume that Mr. bin Laden and Mr. Zawahri had lost all influence over a movement they helped build. At the same time, he said, the two men have recently been issuing what amount to policy statements that are unlikely to inspire legions of new followers.

"Bin Laden's message is well known," he said. "It is the deeper arguments that are bringing people into the movement."

Comerica To Close Muslim Charity's Accounts (AP)

AP, November 15, 2006

DETROIT (AP) — Comerica Bank plans to terminate on Wednesday the accounts of a Muslim charity in Southfield that was the focus of a federal raid two months ago, according to letters the bank sent charity officials.

The charity has checking accounts and uses Comerica services such as online banking. The organization has circulated millions of dollars through Comerica Bank over the past decade, said Life for Relief employee Mohammed Alomari.

Kathy Pitton, a vice president with Comerica Bank, told the Detroit Free Press that the bank has the right to terminate any bank account with or without cause.

FBI agents assigned to a terrorism task force searched Life's Southfield offices on Sept. 18, seizing computer servers, donor records and other financial documents. They also searched the homes of the charity's chief executive, an ex-employee and two board members.

The FBI would not say what agents were looking for, but charity officials have said it might be related to relief work the group did in Iraq.

Three days after the raid, Life for Relief officials received a letter from Karen Davis at Comerica Bank, telling them "we are terminating our relationship with you."

"The reaction from the bank was cold," charity attorney Shereef Akeel said. "It's like a friend you know for many years who turns their back on you."

No charges have been brought in the case. Life has sought to reassure the Detroit area's Muslim community that it is legal to donate money to the organization, which was founded in 1992 by Iraqi immigrants.

PATRIOT ACT:

California Couple's Passion Brings On The Heat In N.C (RN&O)

By Andrea Weigl

Raleigh News & Observer, November 15, 2006

A California couple whose in-flight friskiness on the way to the Triangle was a bit much for the other passengers are facing federal charges for harassing the flight attendant who asked them to stop.

Carl Warren Persing and Dawn Elizabeth Sewell are scheduled to go to trial Dec. 11 at the federal courthouse in Wilmington for their behavior during a Sept. 15 flight. The indictment states that "the defendants repeatedly engaged in overt sexual activity in the cabin of the plane to such an extent that the flight attendant had to direct them to stop."

But Persing and Sewell wouldn't halt their public displays of affection, and Persing threatened the flight attendant who made the request and refused to serve them alcohol, according to the court records.

Efforts to reach Persing, of Lakewood, Calif., and Sewell, of Huntington Beach, Calif., were unsuccessful. Their defense lawyers did not return messages Monday.

It is unclear how often disruptive passengers are charged with crimes. The Federal Aviation Administration tracks only incidents involving unruly passengers that are reported by the flight crew and are not referred to law enforcement. There were 79 incidents this year as of Sept. 20 -- in comparison to last year's total of 203.

FBI special agent Michael Sutton wrote in an affidavit that Persing and Sewell were on a Southwest Airlines flight from Los Angeles to Raleigh-Durham International Airport with a stop in Phoenix. On the first leg of the trip, Persing and Sewell sat in separate rows, and Persing was served one alcoholic drink. From Phoenix to RDU, the pair sat next to each other.

While the plane was on the ground in Phoenix, the couple was kissing, embracing and "acting in a manner that made other passengers uncomfortable," Sutton wrote in his affidavit.

"Persing was observed nuzzling or kissing Sewell on the neck, and around the collarbone in the vicinity of her breast," Sutton wrote. Persing was also observed with his face pressed against Sewell's lap.

At first, the couple complied with a request from a flight attendant to stop their behavior. But they soon resumed during the flight. When asked again, according to Sutton's affidavit, Persing told the flight attendant: "I'm going to give you one warning to get out of my face."

Things deteriorated from there, according to Sutton's affidavit: The flight attendant refused to serve them alcohol. Persing called the flight attendant "a punk." Persing kept asking for alcohol. Sewell told the flight attendants that she worked for a lawyer and it was illegal not to serve alcohol to them. The flight attendant told them to stop asking for alcohol. Persing said, "You and I are gonna have some serious confrontation when we get off this plane."

When the couple got off the plane, law enforcement officials were waiting.

California Couple Faces Federal Charges For "Overt Sexual Activity" On Plane Flight (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, November 15, 2006

(AP) - RALEIGH, North Carolina-A California couple are facing federal charges after allegedly refusing to stop "overt sexual activity" on a flight to Raleigh.

Carl Warren Persing, of Lakewood, California, and Dawn Elizabeth Sewell, of Huntington Beach, California, were indicted on charges of interfering with flight crew members during their Sept. 15 Southwest Airlines flight from Los Angeles.

According to court documents, flight attendants saw Persing and Sewell kissing, embracing and "acting in a manner that made other passengers uncomfortable" while the plane was stopped in Phoenix.

A flight attendant asked them to stop. They obeyed initially but resumed the behavior during the flight from Phoenix to Raleigh, authorities said.

When the flight attendant again requested them to stop, Persing allegedly told the flight attendant: "I'm going to give you one warning to get out of my face."

Persing and Sewell continued the verbal harassment after a flight attendant refused to serve Persing alcohol, according to court documents.

Law enforcement officials were waiting for the couple when they arrived at Raleigh-Durham International Airport. Messages left by The Associated Press for Persing and Sewell's attorneys were not returned.

Mid-flight Sexual Play Lands US Couple Afoul Of Anti-terrorism Law (AFP)

AFP, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON (AFP) - A couple's ill-concealed sexual play aboard a Southwest Airlines flight from Los Angeles got them charged with violating the Patriot Act, intended for terrorist acts, and could land them in jail for 20 years.

According to their indictment, Carl Persing and Dawn Sewell were allegedly snuggling and kissing inappropriately, "making other passengers uncomfortable," when a flight attendant asked them to stop.

"Persing was observed nuzzling or kissing Sewell on the neck, and ... with his face pressed against Sewell's vaginal area. During these actions, Sewell was observed smiling," reads the indictment filed by the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

On a second warning from the flight attendant, Persing snapped back threatening the flight attendant with "serious consequences" if he did not leave them alone.

The comment was enough to have the couple, both in their early 40s, arrested when the plane reached its destination in Raleigh, North Carolina, and charged with obstructing a flight attendant and with criminal association.

They have been placed under legal surveillance until their trial on February 5. If found guilty, they both could be sent to jail for up to 20 years.

Persing's lawyer William Peregoy said his client was not feeling well when he placed his head on his companion's lap, and that he only threatened the flight attendant with reporting him to his superiors on landing.

Pentagon Classifieds (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

Ah, autumn. The crunch of leaves underfoot. Pigskin in the air. The quickening rhythm of Xerox machines pumping out r?sum?s. And nowhere in the administration are they pumping faster than at the Pentagon and the national security apparatus.

The buzz a couple of months back was that Gen. James Jones, chief of the European command, may be moving up to take over Centcom when Gen. John Abizaid retires at the end of this year. Then Abizaid, a civilian, would be able to be named director of national intelligence. The incumbent, John Negroponte, was said to be unhappy and itching to move to a diplomatic post, perhaps as deputy secretary of state.

Let's pause here to, in the best Rummy style, ask and answer our own questions: Why would Negroponte ever give up a Cabinet post for a deputyship? The answer: The diplo world is home, because he has served as ambassador to Honduras, Iraq, the Philippines and the United Nations. Also, being deputy to Secretary Condoleezza Rice wouldn't be so bad, because at heart she's a sharing person. Her former deputy, Robert Zoellick, had a huge portfolio, including China, Latin America, Southeast Asia and Sudan.

Anyway, that was said to be the plan until Jones decided he couldn't work with Donald Rumsfeld and declined the Centcom job. But the buzz has circled back now that Rumsfeld is headed out the door, although this time it's Lt. Gen. David Petraeus who's supposedly in the slot to replace Abizaid at year's end. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, now the No. 2 in Baghdad, is to replace Gen. George Casey when Casey returns to the Pentagon next year to become Army chief of staff.Bolton's 'Acting' Ability

The confirmation of John Bolton to be U.N. ambassador appears to be dead, but it's not over yet. There's still talk that the White House may try to copy the Clinton administration's sleight of hand of keeping unconfirmed Justice Department civil rights chief Bill Lann Lee on as an unconfirmed acting chief.

In this variation, Bolton would be put in a U.N. job that doesn't require confirmation. Then he would be named acting ambassador. But there's doubt that this could be squared with the language of the Federal Vacancies Reform Act.

If the U.N. move won't fly, there's talk that Bolton could become deputy national security adviser if J.D. Crouch decides to move.

Senate To Take Up Biological Threats (WP)

By Renae Merle

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

The Senate is moving to take up legislation as soon as this week revamping a struggling multibillion-dollar effort to counter bioterrorism threats with a national stockpile of new vaccines and other drugs.

The legislation creates a central authority within the Health and Human Services Department to manage the effort, sets aside an additional $1 billion for research and gives the federal government the flexibility to provide cash infusions to the small firms doing most of the work.

Supporters of the bill, which is more than a year in the making, are cautiously optimistic that it will pass. Sen. Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), who is slated to take over as majority leader, listed it among his priorities for Congress's lame-duck session.

"From a policy standpoint, there is nobody shooting at it," said Sen. Richard Burr (R-N.C.), one of the bill's sponsors.

If passed, the legislation would have to be reconciled with the House version, which was passed in September. The initiative is intended to salvage the Bush administration's Project BioShield, a $5.6 billion program to counter biological and radioactive weapons.

The two-year effort has been marked by delays and operational problems. Some companies, for example, have floundered as they conducted research and testing because the bulk of government payments typically do not arrive until firms are ready to produce approved drugs.

Meanwhile, Project BioShield's most significant investment, a nearly $1 billion effort by VaxGen Inc. to develop an anthrax vaccine, is in limbo after the Food and Drug Administration refused to let the company conduct human tests and Health and Human Services threatened to end the company's contract.

Project BioShield "didn't work because a majority of the companies choose not to participate and the ones that did, they were not financed through the valley of death," Burr said.

The new legislation aims to correct those problems, but it still may face some questions. Sen. Patty Murray (D-Wash.), who said she supports the intent of the bill, nonetheless raised safety concerns.

"We need to debate compensating those who may suffer adversely from new vaccines or treatments and expand protections for high risk populations like children, pregnant women, and the elderly," Murray said in a statement.

Under the current proposal, the bill would create the Biomedical Advanced Research and Development Authority to oversee the effort. The bill also attempts to pump more government money into the private market sooner. Under current law, participating companies are not paid until they deliver the drugs, even though Health and Human Services has the authority to give companies a 10 percent prepayment, which would have to be repaid if the company failed to deliver the product. But the agency has never exercised that option.

The legislation would speed up the development cycle by allowing Health and Human Services to pay companies up to 5 percent of the value of their contract when they reach certain milestones, providing them with a welcome cash infusion. The Senate version would also allocate $1 billion over three years for research not funded by a Project BioShield contract or the National Institutes of Health. The House version of the legislation sets aside $160 million per year for two years.

"The federal government is now their venture capital partner," Burr said.

Lance Ignon, VaxGen's vice president for corporate affairs, applauded the notion of the government playing a larger role in sharing the financial risk. Under the current program, "we have all of the financial risk," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0094670

The change would not be a "panacea" in VaxGen's case, he said, but could be helpful to the company and the industry in general.

"The success of our nation's bio-defense effort will rest in large measure on the ability to form true partnerships between government and industry based on mutual respect," Ignon said. That includes an "understanding of the almost inevitable setbacks one encounters in drug development."

A National Priority (WP)

EVEN BEFORE Sept. 11, 2001, emergency care specialists at Washington Hospital Center had been developing plans to better deal with the medical consequences of horrific events such as terrorism, disasters and epidemics. The result -- an emergency facility able to cope with catastrophe -- will become a reality only if Congress funds a project that is vital to the Washington area and important to the entire country.

To its credit, the Senate, with the support of the Bush administration, has included $15 million in a 2007 appropriations bill to start the project's construction. Called ER One, the facility would in normal times provide badly needed emergency treatment to people in the District and the surrounding region and, in the event of a mass disaster, could expand its treatment areas to handle 10 times the regular number of patients. Equally important, the facility was designed to take into account new medical challenges posed by terrorism and emerging diseases. An outbreak of smallpox, the impact of a "dirty bomb" or contagion from severe acute respiratory syndrome (SARS) are more than just theoretical possibilities for a hospital that treated the victims of the Sept. 11 attack on the Pentagon as well as the 2001 anthrax scare.

The importance of the facility to the Washington area -- home to the federal government and by any measure at high risk for attack -- is clear. Five years after Sept. 11, the area is simply not prepared as it should be to handle disaster. The facility also would serve as a prototype, providing valuable resources and lessons in emergency care. Already, health-care professionals from other parts of the country have incorporated concepts from ER One into their own operations.

Now is the time of reckoning for the project. Washington Hospital Center, which provides more acute care than any other hospital in the region, is operating out of badly outmoded and cramped emergency facilities. If federal money is not forthcoming, hospital officials said, they will have no choice but to build a facility with the money on hand. Eventually, $100 million will be needed for ER One, with the hospital providing some $25 million. Some House members are concerned that state formula funding would be used to pay the federal share, and there's a chance Congress will leave town without reaching any spending agreement.

In many respects, planners of ER One imagined the unimaginable as they developed specialized equipment and patient protocols. What's really unimaginable is not acting now to secure the nation's capital.

FEMA Emergency Homes Go To Waste (LAT)

By Ann M. Simmons

The Los Angeles Times, November 15, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — Hundreds of modular homes purchased by the Federal Emergency Management Agency for people left homeless by hurricanes Katrina and Rita were damaged beyond repair while in storage because they were not properly protected, according to a government report.

Units worth a total ranging from $3 million to $4 million will have to be written off, Homeland Security Inspector General Richard L. Skinner writes in a report to FEMA Director R. David Paulison.

Most of the homes were at an Army depot in Texarkana, Texas, where intense heat and rain had destroyed tarps covering the units. Cardboard containers holding toilets and fittings had deteriorated in the weather and caused the frames and wood of some components to warp, Skinner wrote.

In the future, FEMA should "only order modular housing units if their potential uses have been clearly identified and storage sites are available that provide adequate protection," Skinner advised.

"Given that some modular home units are designed to be assembled soon after they are received … many modular home units are questionable choices for emergency housing," the report said.

But in his annual performance plan for 2007, which was released Monday, Skinner said that because of the lack of alternative housing in the Gulf Coast region, some transitional housing sites might end up becoming permanent.

And since some of these communities were plagued by violence, drugs and gang activity, the situation was "a recipe for human tragedy and a brewing public relations nightmare" for FEMA and Homeland Security.

Aaron Walker, a FEMA spokesman, said the agency took evaluations and proposals of the inspector general "very seriously" and, with the help of congressional funds, FEMA was investigating "alternative temporary housing solutions."

Life Is Complicated At Louisiana School (NYT)

By Jeré Longman

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

PORT SULPHUR, La., Nov. 14 — A handshake seemed inadequate after such a startling turnaround for South Plaquemines High School, so fullback Keven Smith kissed Coach Cyril Crutchfield on the cheek. Then he kissed quarterback Ridge Turner. Other players poured a cooler of water over Crutchfield's head, and fans hoisted him on their shoulders. Far from home, they staked claim to the victor's territory by chanting: "Whose field? Crutchfield!"

Defeat seemed inevitable as the Class 2A playoffs opened last Friday night, with South Plaquemines trailing by 27-6 in the first quarter and by 34-12 in the third. But the team rallied in a downpour as Turner rushed for three touchdowns and threw for a pair. As lightning spidered across the sky ahead of a cold front, the Hurricanes stunned host Pickering High, 40-36, in the piney woods of central Louisiana.

It was a rousing victory for newly formed South Plaquemines and a testament to the resiliency of its students and supporters from the hurricane-shattered communities of Port Sulphur, Buras and Boothville-Venice in lower Plaquemines Parish.

"Call everybody!" screamed Andria Barthelemy, whose son, Lorne, is a seventh-grade lineman. "Call the White House!"

Yet nothing is uncomplicated these days for the residents of lower Plaquemines. On the six-hour ride home, the team stopped at a McDonald's to celebrate, only to discover that someone had apparently broken into the visitors' locker room during the game and had stolen cash, a DVD player, even one player's sneakers.

Fourteen months earlier, Hurricane Katrina had destroyed the players' homes, their possessions, their former schools and their football seasons. Now someone had swiped their spending money. In what seemed a perverse joke, Smith said a $20 bill had been removed from his wallet and replaced with a single dollar.

"With the baby coming, I need all the money I can get," said Smith, whose girlfriend is pregnant.

South Plaquemines (5-6) will play Clinton (9-2) on Friday in the Round of 16 here at home, for only the second time this season. Some fans have scheduled the day off from work. Tailgating will start in early afternoon. But sometime over the next four weeks, the season will end and playoff euphoria will be replaced anew by uncertainty in the halting recovery from Katrina.

More than a year after the storm, Smith still lives in a 7-by-27-foot FEMA trailer with seven other relatives. He sleeps in a bed with his father. His mother sleeps on a fold-out sofa, while his sister and her four children take the bunk beds and a mattress fashioned from cushions and the kitchen table.

When he needs privacy to study, Smith leaves the trailer to read by the dome lights of his father's pickup truck.

"Peace and quiet, that's something you don't really get in the house," Smith said.

Otherwise, he said, he does not venture outside much in the FEMA trailer park in Oakville, 30 miles from school.

"Nothing but trouble outside," Smith said. "Drugs. I don't get down with that."

Before the hurricane, his family lived in a trailer in rural Boothville, a hub of the fishing and oil and gas industries. His grandmother, an uncle and several aunts lived in the same enclave. School was a five-minute walk, and he could hunt rabbits in the backyard. His father, Norman, a crane operator, owned a trawler and shrimped in his spare time.

"The boat was the wife; I was the girlfriend," Smith's mother, Veronia Jones-Smith, a custodian, said with a laugh.

The family has secured a loan from the Small Business Administration to buy a double-wide trailer and hopes to return to Boothville by January. Even so, Keven said he worried about his parents, who have high blood pressure. He worries especially about his mother and the stress of caring for grandchildren, ages 13, 11, 6 and 4, in such a cramped space.

"I tell her to calm down; she's about to catch a heart attack," Smith said.

At 18, he will soon have his own child-rearing responsibilities. His girlfriend, Whitney Allen, 16, is due to give birth in January to a son he plans to name Keven Jr. He and Allen met after Katrina, having evacuated to Lafayette, La., two teenagers running from the storm into unintended consequence.

"Sometimes I feel old," Smith said.

This is not how he expected to spend his senior season, putting baby beds and strollers on layaway, saving money that his mother gives him for football trips and hunting for dollar-store bargains on diapers and baby clothes.

"I love my son and he's not even here yet," Smith said. And yet, he added: "Sometimes, at home, I'll be thinking, What if I hadn't gotten her pregnant? I wonder how different it would be. Or would it be different?"

His first response, he said, was shock: "What am I going to do with a son?" His parents were disappointed, he said, but "not mad enough to put me out."

Instead, they told him, "It's time to be a man and take care of your responsibility."

Smith began speaking with Julie Butler, who teaches classes in adult responsibility at South Plaquemines. Teenage pregnancy is a problem here, school officials said, where many students are from low socioeconomic backgrounds. At least four girls are pregnant or have given birth recently, officials said. Smith's best friend on the team, Warren Mayes, a senior defensive end, is the father of a 10-month-old son.

"The educational level of many parents is no higher than high school, so education isn't stressed," Butler said. "Kids are raising kids, who are raising kids. With Keven, I'm hoping he'll break the cycle."

She has assisted Smith as he seeks financial aid for college or trade school. He hopes to become a licensed practical nurse and, eventually, a registered nurse. He said he planned to propose to Allen, who attends high school in New Orleans, on Jan. 3, their first anniversary. College football is a dream likely deferred, perhaps now beyond his reach. He is not even sure if he will play basketball at South Plaquemines.

"If my responsibilities tell me otherwise, I've got to do otherwise," he said.

His senior football season has been one of jarring interruption. During the opener, Smith talked back after Crutchfield reprimanded him and was suspended for a week. Smith then quit the team. He said he looked for a job to prepare for the birth of his son. After sitting out four games, though, he began to miss football and his teammates, who were struggling through a 1-4 start.

"I thought I had let my dawgs down," Smith said of his teammates. "I felt they needed me."

His mother told him not to worry about a job right away. Even with the complications of pending fatherhood, she wanted him to enjoy his senior year. "We'll work it out," she said.

Smith apologized to Crutchfield, and the coach reinstated him.

"He was so respectful; it really touched me," Crutchfield said.

Upon his return, Smith switched from defensive end to fullback, and at 5 feet 6 inches and 210 pounds, he proved to be a powerful runner. If Jerome Bettis, retired from the Pittsburgh Steelers, was the Bus, then Smith was the Minibus. Then he got a pair of flat tires.

After scoring three touchdowns in the league championship game on Oct. 20, Smith sprained his left ankle. A week later, in the regular-season finale, he was hit in the end zone as he scored and flipped the ball to the referee, straining a tendon in his right ankle. He has been slow to recover. South Plaquemines lacks an athletic trainer, and the nearest orthopedic clinic is 40 miles away in New Orleans.

Last Friday, Smith had his ankles taped and swallowed a few pain-relief pills, but he began the playoff game on the bench. "I can't cut," he said glumly.

With South Plaquemines trailing by 27-12 at halftime, he decided to test his tender ankles. "The adrenaline's flowing," Smith said as he jogged onto the field. "I don't feel anything."

He carried the ball several times, bulling ahead for a first down, but his mobility was restricted and he returned to the sideline. Inexorably, the Hurricanes began their revival. Turner threw for a 26-yard touchdown, then zigzagged into the end zone from 17 yards and 19 yards, drawing South Plaquemines to 34-32 early in the fourth quarter.

Lightning lighted the sky like an X-ray, thunder crackled and fat drops of rain began to splatter, sending fans running for cover at a concession stand. The South Plaquemines players began running, too, but they were whooping and hollering and bounding expectantly along the sideline.

Once a ruinous threat, bad weather was now a playoff talisman. Four days earlier, a rainstorm inspired the most spirited practice of the season. Yet another storm arrived during this improbable comeback.

"Hurricane weather!" Smith and others yelled.

"Wash 'em out, 'Canes, wash 'em out!" the cheerleaders chanted.

With 6 minutes 12 seconds remaining, South Plaquemines took a tenuous 40-34 lead on a pinballing 2-yard run by James Brown. Later, guard Dwayne Ancar came out with a throbbing headache and lay facedown on a runway near the stadium track. While others shouted encouragement, he found the gathering noise excruciating and screamed, "Shut up, I have a migraine!"

The slippery ball kept wriggling free from players on both teams. Pinned near their end zone, the Hurricanes took a deliberate safety. Pickering threatened but fumbled again, and South Plaquemines secured the ball and the victory.

"A hurricane hit tonight!" someone shouted in the jubilant locker room. "Category 5," linebacker Trey Stewart said. The season will soon end, and, ultimately, education, not football, will most likely map the future of teenage fathers like Smith, Butler said. With only a high school diploma, she said, Smith and others risk tumbling into welfare or getting a base-pay job with the parish, $14,000 to $17,000 a year, hardly enough to raise a family.

"Keven's a bright kid, one that makes you glad to come to work," Butler said. "He knows what he doesn't want to happen. As long as he believes in himself as much as we believe in him, he will make it. Sometimes, it's hard for kids to look up at the big picture when they're always looking down, trying to get over one hurdle or the next."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Initiates Iraq Policy Review Separate From Baker Group's (WP)

By Robin Wright

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

President Bush formally launched a sweeping internal review of Iraq policy yesterday, pulling together studies underway by various government agencies, according to U.S. officials.

The initiative, begun after Bush met at the White House with his foreign policy team, parallels the effort by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group to salvage U.S. policy in Iraq, develop an exit strategy and protect long-term U.S. interests in the region. The two reviews are not competitive, administration officials said, although the White House wants to complete the process before mid-December, about the time the Iraq Study Group's final report is expected.

The White House's decision changes the dynamics of what happens next to U.S. policy deliberations. The administration will have its own working document as well as recommendations from an independent bipartisan commission to consider as it struggles to prevent further deterioration in Iraq.

"The president has asked all his national security agencies to assess the situation in Iraq, review the options and recommend the best way forward. The ISG report will be duly considered, and we look forward to their recommendations, as the president has always said," a White House official said, speaking on the condition of anonymity because the new initiative has not been announced. "The president indicated Monday that he is interested in hearing interesting ideas both within his administration and from the Baker-Hamilton commission."

The White House review could give the administration alternatives so that it feels less pressure to fully implement the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group report, foreign policy experts said.

Bush made the decision after his national security team held secret meetings Friday and Saturday to discuss the disparate efforts inside the administration and the implications for Iraq after the Republican defeat in the midterm elections. Further informal meetings were held Monday before yesterday's decision, officials said.

The administration said its review is not a response to the imminent report of the study group, which is led by James A. Baker III, who was secretary of state under George H.W. Bush, and Lee H. Hamilton, a Democrat and former chairman of what is now the House International Relations Committee. The group wrapped up months of hearings yesterday by interviewing three Democratic policymakers: former secretary of state Warren Christopher, former national security adviser Samuel R. "Sandy" Berger and former U.N. ambassador Richard C. Holbrooke. The panel's members, gathered at the White House, also spoke yesterday by videoconference with British Prime Minister Tony Blair.

Blair, in London, told the panel that the most decisive steps the United States can take to end Iraq's violence would be working for an end to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and helping Iraq's fragile government improve its army, end sectarianism within its security forces and distribute revenue more fairly across the country, according to Blair's spokesman.

The panel of five Democrats and five Republicans is to hold one more meeting today before drafters begin pulling together the first version of a report, according to a spokesman for the U.S. Institute of Peace, which is running the commission. The panel may meet again to review and discuss the draft. The goal is broad consensus.

The administration's new review "was not done in response to the ISG, but it came about as a result of everybody looking at facts on the ground," a State Department official said. But the administration is basically trying to do in one month what the ISG has done over eight months.

The review will knit together separate efforts that have been underway at the State Department and the Pentagon over the past six weeks, U.S. officials said. It will also include reports by the CIA and the National Security Council. National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley will oversee the expedited review and integrate the various papers, officials said.

In a measure of the suddenness and importance of the review, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice this week postponed a long-planned trip to an Asia-Pacific conference in Vietnam to take part in discussions about Iraq.

Rice has been doing "a lot of thinking" about the issue over the past two months, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said yesterday. "The primary focus is on the State Department's role in Iraq and are we pursuing the proper policies, are we seeking the right objectives, are we using the right means to achieve those objectives, following the right strategies and right tactics?" he told reporters.

Rice's trip to Baghdad last month was a turning point in her thinking, officials said.

One component of the larger effort is likely to be a military review initiated in mid-September by Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the joint chiefs of staff. His assessment of U.S. anti-terrorism efforts, with a core focus on Iraq, includes 16 top commanders meeting daily to brainstorm on questions such as "Where are we going? What are we trying to do? Are we going to get there this way?" according to a joint staff spokesperson.

"Nothing is off the table. They are looking at the whole spectrum of less forces, more forces," a senior defense official said. But the military is keeping close control over its review, which "is completely separate from the Iraq Study Group and not connected with any political effort that might also be going on. This is the chairman's. . . . There is no intent for it to be folded in or incorporated in someone else's bigger product," the joint staff spokesperson said.

The administration's policy review comes almost a year after it issued a 38-page "National Strategy for Victory in Iraq," released with much fanfare Nov. 30, 2005. It outlined the "eight pillars" for victory, which included defeating terrorists, moving toward military self-reliance, improving the rule of law, increasing international support and strengthening the economy.

Iraq Panel Unlikely To End Debate On War (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

Filed at 3:03 p.m. ET

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Bitterly divided on Iraq, lawmakers in both parties are eagerly awaiting recommendations from an advisory group led by Republican and Bush family friend James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton.

But even if the bipartisan Iraq Study Group is able to forge a consensus on how to deal with Iraq -- a prospect that remains unclear -- the panel is unlikely to offer a solution so groundbreaking it will stave off a brewing partisan feud.

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., who is in line to be the chairman next year of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said Monday the Bush administration didn't see that "we're getting deeper and deeper into a hole" in Iraq.

Two options under discussion at one point by the study group -- greater cooperation with Iran and Syria, and a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops -- would require a major policy shift by the Bush administration.

Republicans oppose setting any type of timetable for withdrawal from Iraq, and the United States has no diplomatic ties with Iran.

The panel's members, gathered at the White House, spoke Tuesday with British Prime Minister Tony Blair by videoconference from London.

Blair told them the most decisive steps the U.S. could take to end the violence in Iraq would be to work for an end to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and to help the Iraqi government improve its army, end sectarianism in its security forces and distribute revenue more fairly across the country.

Ending the Israeli-Palestinian dispute would remove an issue that extremists in the region exploit and boost pressure on Iran and Syria to help staunch the bloodshed in Iraq, Blair said.

Blair's comments were described in London by his spokesman, who spoke on condition of anonymity in keeping with government policy.

The Iraq study panel, established by Congress in March, is not expected to unveil its findings until some time after Thanksgiving. According to a Democratic aide, Baker told a senator he won't issue any plan unless the group finds consensus.

The panel consists of five Democrats and five Republicans, each prominent members in their political camps and holding their own ideas on how Iraq should be settled.

Yet Baker's group has become the beacon of hope for lawmakers who want to resolve the Iraq war before the 2008 presidential elections. Polls of voters in last week's midterm elections, which returned Democrats to power in the next Congress, found a majority -- about six in 10 -- disapproved of the war in Iraq. Two-thirds of independent voters said they disapproved of the war.

Later Tuesday, the study group was to meet at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars in Washington with foreign policy advisers from the Clinton administration, including Sandy Berger, Clinton's national security adviser; Richard Holbrooke, former ambassador to the U.N.; and Warren Christopher, former secretary of state.

On Monday, Blair said Iran and Syria's aid should be solicited to help stem the violence in Iraq. Resolving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and stabilizing Lebanon also would help to unite the region behind peace, he said.

Bush's chief of staff, Josh Bolten, said the White House would consider opening talks with Syria and Iran if Baker and Hamilton recommended it.

Baker's group also has been briefed by Democrats on their plan to begin pulling out some troops right away. Levin and other Democrats agree this is a necessary first step to put political pressure on the Iraqis.

Aside from that initial step, Democrats remain divided on what should happen next, how many troops should leave and how many should stay.

DOJ_NMG_0094675

Several Republicans staunchly oppose setting any timetable because they say Iraq could collapse into chaos. Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., said shortly before the Nov. 7 elections that the Bush administration had led Iraq to the verge of chaos. On Monday, Graham reiterated his position that more troops, not fewer troops, are needed to settle the violence there.

"That should be our goal in the coming months, to provide a better security situation on the ground," Graham said, echoing a comment by Bush.

"I believe it is very important ... for people making suggestions to recognize that the best military options depend upon the conditions on the ground," the president said.

Sens. John Warner, R-Va., who is chairman of the Armed Services Committee, and Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, also warned against any timetable.

Rice Says 'No Magic Bullet' To Fix Iraq (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, November 15, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Tuesday "there is no magic bullet" solution to the mounting problems in Iraq, and she indicated no new willingness to ask for help from U.S. adversaries in the Middle East.

"It is not an issue of whether you talk to somebody," Rice said. "I will talk to anybody, anywhere, anytime, under the right circumstances if I think we can make progress. I am not afraid to talk to anyone."

Members of the Republican foreign policy establishment and some U.S. allies have suggested that the Bush administration was shortsighted to refuse wider dialogue with Iran, which holds huge influence over its Shiite neighbor Iraq, and in cutting off most diplomacy with Syria.

Rice spoke en route a Pacific Rim economic meeting in Vietnam. Although last month's North Korean nuclear test will be a focus of diplomatic meetings during the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit in Hanoi, Rice suggested that a much-anticipated new round of talks with Pyongyang may not come quickly.

The North agreed in principle to return to arms control negotiations following its symbolic test, but there is no firm date for the session. The six-nation talks are aimed at shuttering Pyongyang's nuclear program.

"We need to take our time this time and make sure when we go to the table at the six-party talks there is a reasonable chance of a successful outcome," Rice said.

In Hanoi, the top U.S. nuclear envoy said Wednesday that talks with North Korea will succeed only if the reclusive communist regime lives up to commitments it made last year to abandon nuclear weapons in exchange for aid and security guarantees.

Christopher Hill met with his counterparts from South Korea and Japan on the sidelines the APEC summit to seek a common strategy ahead of the resumption of the long-stalled talks.

The six-party talks — involving the U.S., Japan, China, Russia and both Koreas — stalled a year ago when North Korea boycotted over U.S.-imposed financial restrictions. The North agreed to return to the talks after it shocked the world by testing a nuclear device on Oct. 9, a move that triggered U.N. sanctions.

South Korea has said the talks could resume by mid-December. The U.S. administration has ruled out a first meeting in November but said it hoped for a session in December.

"We are very disappointed that (North Korea) stayed away from the talks for about a year now," Hill said.

"I think we've all made very clear that we don't accept North Korea as a nuclear state," he added.

South Korean nuclear envoy Chun Yung-woo said, "There should not be talks for the sake of talks." The comments were some of the strongest Chun has made about the North.

A week after Republicans lost control of Congress in large part because of public dissatisfaction with the Iraq war, the Bush administration is reevaluating military and diplomatic strategy and making contingency plans if the situation gets worse.

Rice spent nearly two full days this week huddled with advisers on Iraq and talking to a bipartisan panel whose recommendations are due next month. The panel may recommend the kind of engagement with Iran and Syria that Rice and President Bush have so far ruled out.

"I don't think that there are any magic bullets about Iraq," Rice told reporters aboard her plane. "This is a complicated place, they are in a difficult time."

Gunmen dressed as police commandos kidnapped scores of staff and visitors at an education ministry office Tuesday in one of the biggest mass abductions since the start of the U.S. occupation in 2003. Five senior police officers — including the neighborhood police chief — were arrested.

At least 82 people were killed or found dead in murders, bombings and clashes nationwide, part of a tide of sectarian killings that the democratically elected Iraq government and their American protectors have been unable to slow.

Rice said improvement will require greater responsibility from Iraqis for their own security and "better help from Iraq's neighbors." She gave no specifics about changes in U.S. policy or participation that may be in the offing.

The Iraq study panel, established by Congress in March, has become a beacon of hope for lawmakers who want to resolve the Iraq war before the 2008 presidential elections. Polls of voters in last week's midterm elections, which returned Democrats to power in the next Congress, found a majority — about six in 10 — disapproved of the war. Two-thirds of independent voters said they disapproved of the war.

The panel is also expected to give political cover to the administration if it pursues a significant shift, such as side-by-side cooperation with Iran and Syria or a phased withdrawal of U.S. forces.

The panel, co-chaired by Republican and Bush family friend James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton, heard Tuesday from British Prime Minister Tony Blair.

Blair, the Bush administration's staunchest ally in the war, advocates seeking Iran's help in ending the violence in Iraq. Aides say he also wants to encourage dialogue with Syria.

Bush's chief of staff, Josh Bolten, said this week that the White House would consider opening talks with Syria and Iran if Baker and Hamilton recommended it.

Get Out Now? Not So Fast, Experts Say (NYT)

By Michale R. Gordon

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 14 — One of the most resonant arguments in the debate over Iraq holds that the United States can move forward by pulling its troops back, as part of a phased withdrawal. If American troops begin to leave and the remaining forces assume a more limited role, the argument holds, it will galvanize the Iraqi government to assume more responsibility for securing and rebuilding Iraq.

This is the case now being argued by many Democrats, most notably Senator Carl Levin of Michigan, the incoming chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, who asserts that the withdrawal of American troops from Iraq should begin within four to six months.

But this argument is being challenged by a number of military officers, experts and former generals, including some who have been among the most vehement critics of the Bush administration's Iraq policies.

Anthony C. Zinni, the former head of the United States Central Command and one of the retired generals who called for the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, argued that any substantial reduction of American forces over the next several months would be more likely to accelerate the slide to civil war than stop it.

"The logic of this is you put pressure on Maliki and force him to stand up to this," General Zinni said in an interview, referring to Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, the Iraqi prime minister. "Well, you can't put pressure on a wounded guy. There is a premise that the Iraqis are not doing enough now, that there is a capability that they have not employed or used. I am not so sure they are capable of stopping sectarian violence."

Instead of taking troops out, General Zinni said, it would make more sense to consider deploying additional American forces over the next six months to "regain momentum" as part of a broader effort to stabilize Iraq that would create more jobs, foster political reconciliation and develop more effective Iraqi security forces.

The debate over American troop levels in Iraq was raging well before the establishment in March of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group led by James A. Baker III, a former secretary of state, and Lee H. Hamilton, a former congressman. Initially, it centered on Mr. Rumsfeld's stewardship at the Pentagon and whether the United States had deployed sufficient forces and taken the requisite nation-building steps to defeat, or at least contain, a virulent insurgency.

But as the character of the Iraq conflict has changed over the past year, so has the debate. The primary worry for American commanders now is preventing the bloody cycle of drive-by shootings, kidnappings and bombings from spiraling into an all-out civil war.

With more American than Iraqi soldiers in Baghdad, there has been mounting frustration on the part of American officials over the failure of the Iraqi government to send sufficient reinforcements to the Iraqi capital, to establish a genuine "unity government" and to effectively challenge the power of the militias, some of whom have infiltrated the very Iraqi Army and police units that the American military is working with.

In essence, the current debate turns on whether Iraqi leaders would be susceptible to the sort of blunt American pressure entailed by troop reductions. Arguing that such pressure was necessary, Senator Levin joined forces with another Democrat, Senator Jack Reed of Rhode Island, to offer an amendment in June calling for a phased reduction of American troops, a measure he stressed has been supported by all of the potential Democratic presidential candidates. The proposal is less sweeping than most other Democratic proposals, which have called for the withdrawal of all American forces over a fixed time frame. Senator Levin's plan has assumed more political importance following the Democratic gains in the midterm elections.

"There is no purely military solution here," Mr. Levin said in an interview. "They have got to reach a political compromise in Iraq. The leaders have got to make concessions involving power sharing and resource sharing or else this insurgency and the violence continues to spiral."

While Mr. Levin's plan calls for beginning troop reductions over the next six months, it does not stipulate a time-frame for completing the withdrawal, or spell out precisely how many troops should be removed in the initial phase. The plan, however, does call for shifting the American military role to more limited missions like protecting the American Embassy, training the Iraqi forces and engaging in counterterrorist operations against cells of Al Qaeda.

"The point of the proposal is to force the Iraqis to take hold of the situation politically," Mr. Levin said.

But some current and retired military officers say the situation in Baghdad and other parts of Iraq is too precarious to start thinning out the number of American troops. In addition, they worry that some Shiite leaders would see the reduction of American troops as an opportunity to unleash their militias against the Sunnis and engage in wholesale ethnic cleansing to consolidate their control of the capital.

John Batiste, a retired Army major general who also joined in the call for Mr. Rumsfeld's resignation, described the Congressional proposals for troop withdrawals as "terribly naïve."

"There are lots of things that have to happen to set them up for success," General Batiste, who commanded a division in Iraq, said in an interview, describing the Iraqi government. "Until they happen, it does not matter what we tell Maliki."

Before considering troop reductions, General Batiste said, the United States needs to take an array of steps, including fresh efforts to alleviate unemployment in Iraq, secure its long and porous borders, enlist more cooperation from tribal sheiks, step up the effort to train Iraq's security forces, engage Iraq's neighbors and weaken, or if necessary, crush the militias.

Indeed, General Batiste has recently written that pending the training of an effective Iraqi force, it may be necessary to deploy tens of thousands of additional "coalition troops." General Batiste said he hoped that Arab and other foreign nations could be encouraged to send troops.

Some military experts said that while the American military is stretched thin, the number of American troops in Iraq could be increased temporarily — by perhaps 10,000 or more, in addition to the 150,000 or so already there — by prolonging combat tours.

Kenneth M. Pollack, an expert at the Brookings Institution who served on the staff of the National Security Council during the Clinton administration, also argued that a push for troop reductions would backfire by contributing to the disorder in Iraq.

"If we start pulling out troops and the violence gets worse and the control of the militias increases and people become confirmed in their suspicion that the United States is not going to be there to prevent civil war, they are to going to start making decisions today to prepare for the eventuality of civil war tomorrow," he said. "That is how civil wars start."

Poll: Most Doubt Dems Have Plan For Iraq (AP-Y)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, November 15, 2006

More Americans rank Iraq as the top priority of the new Democratic-controlled Congress, but nearly three out of five say the party does not have a plan to deal with the war.

In the aftermath of an anti-Republican wave, the latest Associated Press-Ipsos poll showed lingering uncertainty about the country's direction and the ability of Democrats and President Bush to work together. Underscoring the country's political divisions, Democrats expressed more confidence and optimism than Republicans.

The poll was conducted Nov. 10-12 as the public adjusted to Washington's new division of labor, with President Bush in the White House and Democrats holding the reins of Congress for the first time in 12 years.

While voters in Election Day surveys said corruption and scandal in Congress was one of the most important factors in their vote, the postelection poll showed that 37 percent of all adults said the war in Iraq should be at the top of the congressional agenda during the next two years. The issue of terrorism, the second most mentioned priority, was ranked highest by 15 percent of those polled.

Though voters apparently embraced the Democratic mantra of changing course in Iraq, a majority of the public did not detect a clear Democratic blueprint for ending the war. Fifty-seven percent of all adults in the AP-Ipsos poll said Democrats do not have a plan for Iraq; 29 percent said they do. The poll of 1,002 adults has a margin of error of 3 percentage points.

That finding strikes at the heart of a Democratic dilemma. The party has been of one voice in criticizing President Bush's strategy for the war but has been more equivocal on how to move in a different direction.

DOJ_NMG_0094678

Democrats such as Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts and Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania want a fixed deadline to pull all troops out of the country. Other Democrats, including some party leaders, have voiced support for a staggered withdrawal that demands greater responsibility from the Iraqis.

The public's perception was reinforced during the campaign, when President Bush time and again told voters that the Democrats had little to offer on the war.

"Everyone agrees that we're going to have to begin redeployment," Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., said of the Democratic position. Skelton, in line to become chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, has proposed withdrawing a U.S. brigade for every three Iraqi combat brigades rated fully capable. Skelton opposes setting a timetable for withdrawal but said at least one U.S. battalion or brigade should pull out promptly.

"It should send a clear message to the Iraqi government, the Iraqi people and the American people that we're not there to stay," he said.

No doubt, the election results have put Democrats in something of a box, said Stephen Biddle, a defense policy expert at the Council of Foreign Relations.

"It's a very, very awkward thing to run a war from the Congress," he said. "The public wants them to do something. And they don't want to go into 2008 and be accused of being the do-nothing 110th Congress."

In separate interviews, some voters appeared sympathetic.

John Rodon, a retiree from Green Bay, Wis., said the situation in Iraq is "a big mistake" and voted for a Democrat for Congress. He doubted, however, that the Democrats would solve the war.

"I don't think anybody has an answer for this," he said.

Francis Curran, a 43-year-old carpenter from Jupiter, Fla., said he thinks Democrats would approach Iraq with a better lens.

"You can't solve that problem without involving the other players in the region. I think Democrats might be more willing to at least not call (Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad) the Axis of Evil," Curran said. "I don't know if the president would go with this, but this administration has to involve other nations in that region."

For now, Democrats appear willing to wait for the recommendations of a bipartisan Iraq study group led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton. The group's findings are expected within the next few weeks. The Senate Democratic leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, also wants a bipartisan congressional summit to debate Iraq.

"Iraq has to be done on a bipartisan basis," Reid said Tuesday. "This is not a time for threatening the president with anything. We're going to see how we can work with him to change course in Iraq."

Though uncertain about the Democrats' plan for Iraq, many Americans are upbeat about Democratic control of Congress. For every 10 adults surveyed, four said the country will be better off, three said it would not make much difference and two said the country will be worse off. Most Democrats shared that optimism. Republicans tended to be pessimistic or anticipated no discernible change.

Overall, Americans tended to hold Bush responsible for Republicans losses last week. Forty-five percent of adults surveyed said Bush deserves all or a great deal of the blame. But only 22 percent of Republican voters attributed the losses to Bush.

Americans were split when asked if the president and Democrats in Congress could work together. Forty-seven percent said they were confident that two could cooperate and 51 percent said they were not.

In the wake of the election, Democrats as well as the president and his Republican allies have emphasized the need for bipartisanship on the war and on a number of other legislative fronts. Democrats and Bush have said they see an opportunity to pass comprehensive legislation on immigration that had been blocked in the House.

Blair Advises Baker's Panel (WT/AP)

By David Stringer

The Washington Times, November 15, 2006

LONDON -- British Prime Minister Tony Blair told the U.S. advisory group reviewing strategy on Iraq yesterday that a push for peace across the Middle East and help for Baghdad to root out sectarianism in its security forces were key to stemming bloodshed, his official spokesman said.

The British leader made his remarks to the bipartisan panel headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III as both Syria and Iran said they would not rule out talks with the United States on the future of Iraq -- reportedly a key recommendation being considered by the Baker group.

But Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Tehran was willing to talk only if the United States "corrects its behavior" in the region, a suggestion quickly shot down by the White House.

"I don't think this is about a U.S. attitude adjustment," said White House National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe. "The collective attitude of the world is that Iran needs to play a constructive role in the region, not meddle in Iraq, and to stop its [nuclear] activities."

The United States accuses both Syria and Iran of fueling insurgent forces challenging the U.S.-backed government in Iraq and of supporting terrorist groups in Lebanon and the Palestinian territories that have attacked Israel.

But yesterday's diplomatic back-and-forth showed how much the report by Mr. Baker's Iraq Study Group, now expected before the end of the year, is already driving the U.S. and Middle East policy debate, with both allies and adversaries bracing for a major U.S. course change on Iraq.

Speaking privately via video link to the Baker commission, Mr. Blair set no timetable for the withdrawal of British or other coalition troops from Iraq, his spokesman said, but had stressed the importance of what he called in a speech Monday a "whole Middle East strategy" to counter militancy across the region.

The British prime minister, President Bush's closest ally on Iraq, emphasized the importance of a resolution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, which he said was "important in its own right, but also to take away the issue that was most exploited by extremist elements around the region."

Mr. Blair's spokesman briefed reporters on background after the session.

Mr. Blair said a positive strategy for the Israeli-Palestinian conflict would help Britain and the United States win the support of moderate Muslims and increase pressure on Iran and Syria to work for peace, the spokesman said.

Mr. Blair told the panel that "the only way to deal with Iran" was to "take away their ability to exploit Muslim opinion and to confront both it and Syria with the strategic choice of whether to be supportive of the solution, or face isolation."

Responding to press speculation that the Baker panel will urge direct U.S. contacts with both Syria and Iran, a leading official Syrian newspaper said in an editorial yesterday that Damascus "is ready for dialogue with the United States to achieve security and stability" in Iraq.

"The ball is in their court," the editorial said.

Mr. Ahmadinejad's comments were the highest-level statement to date from Tehran that it would consider direct engagement with the Bush administration on Iraq, though the hard-line Iranian leader gave few clues on how U.S. policy would have to change.

In a Tehran press conference, Mr. Ahmadinejad accused the Bush administration of pursuing a foreign policy of aggression and unilateralism, but said Iran's Islamic republic was prepared to talk to any country except Israel.

"Should the United States correct its behavior, we will talk to them," Mr. Ahmadinejad said.

US Denies Rift With Blair On Syria, Iran (AFP)

By Stephen Collinson

AFP, November 15, 2006

The White House has rushed to deny claims of a diplomatic rift with its closest European ally Britain, after Prime Minister Tony Blair mooted a "partnership" with US foes Iran and Syria.

As the impact of a major foreign policy address by the British leader started to sink in, the White House bristled Tuesday at suggestions Blair had struck out from Washington, issuing a fact sheet to debunk the claim.

Blair on Monday laid out a "whole Middle East strategy" involving a push for a solution to the Israeli-Palestinian crisis, a plan for Iraq and a "strategic" choice of cooperation or isolation to be offered to Iran.

On Tuesday, the British premier testified by video link-up to the US Iraq Study Group, probing possible new strategies on the war and called for a "strategic choice" for Iran and Syria, his office said.

His remarks were seen by some observers in both countries as an attempt to influence US policy in the Middle East, at a time when changes in Iraq strategy are being contemplated following the Republican defeat in mid-term elections.

President George W. Bush's spokesman Tony Snow however told AFP on Tuesday that suggestions in the British and US media that Blair's remarks signalled cracks between Downing Street and the White House were mischaracterizations.

"Read his speech, and you'll see there is no difference between the governments," Snow said.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack acknowledged Britain and the United States had historically slightly differed towards Iran -- but did not see "a particularly new policy statement" in Blair's speech.

The White House drew particular reference to Blair's comment that "there is a fundamental misunderstanding that this is about changing policy on Syria and Iran."

DOJ_NMG_0094680

The White House fact sheet unflatteringly compared coverage of Blair's speech by US-based reporters on The New York Times and The Washington Post and their colleagues in London.

London-based reporters for the two US newspapers wrote that Blair took pains to ensure his remarks were not seen as a dramatic new policy shift.

But the fact sheet noted colleagues on the same papers in the United States had wrongly seen Blair's speech as a policy shift on Iran and Syria, stating: "Prime Minister Blair's Policy Is Not New And Is Similar To President Bush's Policy."

In his speech Monday, Blair said the West should "offer Iran a clear strategic choice: they help the Middle East peace process not hinder it; they stop supporting terrorism in Lebanon or Iraq; they abide by, not flout, their international obligations.

"In that case, a new partnership is possible. Or alternatively they face the consequences of not doing so: isolation," he said, adding that Tehran must also stop its nuclear enrichment drive.

On Monday, Bush said in a joint appearance with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert that talks with Iran were only possible if Tehran halted its nuclear program in line with an already stated international initiative.

A Downing Street spokeswoman told AFP on Tuesday that Blair also had told the US Iraq Study Group in the videoconference that any solution in Iraq must be part of a broader Middle East strategy which would also include a plan to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, however, refused late Tuesday to make a link between the lack of progress in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and the unrest in Iraq.

"I think we have to be careful not to say well, if there is an Israeli/Palestinian breakthrough, that will help in Iraq. Iraq is involved in its own struggles," Rice told reporters on her way to an Asia-Pacific summit in Vietnam.

Blair's speech on Monday puzzled some observers, evidenced by several different interpretations on offer in different newspapers on both sides of the Atlantic.

Nile Gardiner, a policy analyst at the Heritage Foundation think tank, which has close links to the Bush administration, said the speech was a "major shift in British policy" and an attempt to influence the US Iraq Study Group.

"Over here, I think the speech hasn't really sunk in, but it will do in the next few days," he said.

Pouring Chardonnay Diplomacy (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

Washington

The foreign affairs fur is flying.

I'm not talking about the catfight between two strong-willed, expensively dressed Democratic pols married to California gazillionaires, with Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi trying to yank Jane Harman from heading the House Intelligence Committee.

I'm talking about the catfight between the Idealists and the Realists.

After an election that spurned ideology, and the triumphant return of the Bush 41 pragmatists James Baker and Robert Gates, the self-proclaimed Idealists are reduced to hissing from the sidelines.

The Vulcans and neocons had grandiose plans to restore trumpets, morality and spine to foreign policy, to establish America as a hyperpower with a duty to export democracy — by force and on its own, if necessary. But now the grandiose experiment of Iraq is in a sulfurous shambles, and the Realpolitik crowd is back cleaning up.

In The Wall Street Journal, Michael Rubin of the American Enterprise Institute railed against the evils of "chardonnay diplomacy," recalling that in 1983, Donald Rumsfeld, President Reagan's Middle East envoy, met with Saddam Hussein in Baghdad, hoping to restore relations out of a concern over growing Iranian influence. He didn't bother to mention Saddam's use of chemical weapons.

"Mr. Gates was the C.I.A.'s deputy director for intelligence at the time of Mr. Rumsfeld's infamous handshake, deputy director of central intelligence when Saddam gassed the Kurds, and deputy national security adviser when Saddam crushed the Shiite uprising," Mr. Rubin wrote. "Mr. Baker was as central."

Rummy, he said, "worked to right past wrongs." By contrast, the neocons fear, Mr. Gates and Mr. Baker are back winking at dictators. Already they're talking about cozying up to the evil leaders of Iran and Syria and perhaps dreaming of more concessions to the Palestinians. (Israel and its supporters among Christian evangelicals are having conniptions.)

The Idealists who loved Ronald Reagan's evocation of Thomas Paine — "We have it in our power to begin the world over again" — are right that Americans yearn for a moral foreign policy. It was sickening in 1989 to see Brent Scowcroft — another realist back in fashion — offering a cozy supper toast to Chinese leaders only six months after Tiananmen Square, and getting Poppy to lecture Ukrainians not to break the iron grip of Moscow.

It was sickening, after Bush père sold the Persian Gulf war as a moral mission, to see the 41 team decide at the end not to intervene to stop Saddam from slaughtering thousands of innocent Shiites and Kurds who rose up as the president had asked.

It was sickening when the first Bush administration decided to do nothing about the genocidal Serbian war on Bosnia in 1992. As Secretary of State Baker frostily explained, "We do not have a dog in that fight." Justifying the administration's tough stance toward Israel, the Velvet Hammer made another notorious comment. "(Expletive deleted) the Jews," he told a colleague privately. "They didn't vote for us anyway."

But while the Idealists have a point, they also have a problem. Their moral war in Iraq was sold four years ago with two big lies: that Saddam had W.M.D. and that the Iraqis were yearning for democracy. And it has continued in a fog of deception about imaginary progress. It is immoral to put troops' lives at risk because one is doctrinaire, to make people die for a failure of flexibility.

America's bungled occupation and naïve assumptions unleashed sectarian bloodletting that could ultimately, as The Times's John Burns wrote, "match the mass killing that characterized Mr. Hussein's psychopathic years in power" and embolden authoritarian Arab leaders.

Bush junior cast himself as the Reagan heir. But as President Reagan showed in Lebanon, when he pulled out troops after 241 servicemen were blown up, and in Reykjavik negotiating with Mikhail Gorbachev on nuclear arms, he was incredibly flexible — an effective contrast with his inflexible rhetoric. He pursued openings and even radical diplomacy. If the Gipper was wood, the Decider is stone.

Voters rejected W.'s black-and-white, good-and-evil, incompetent foreign policy last week. The president got the message that some shades of gray were desirable and brought in the family fixer with the bright green ties, who is perfectly positioned to come up with a solution that will fly in Washington and flop in Baghdad.

As the theologian Reinhold Niebuhr taught, morality without realism is naïvité or worse, and realism without morality is cynicism or worse. Morality should open your eyes, not close them.

Baker Ex Machina (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

In ancient Roman drama, when the plot got too convoluted to be resolved by mere humans, one of the gods would be hoisted over the stage to dispense wisdom and avert tragedy. The practice was known by a Latin term, deus ex machina, or "god from a machine." In our times, it is called the "Baker-Hamilton commission."

I am all for smoke and mirrors, and gods descending from cranes, if that will help the United States regain some strategic initiative in the Middle East. And already, the Iraq Study Group seems to be having that effect. Before it has said a word, the group is generating a sense of possibility. Politicians across the Middle East are wondering how to game the new American initiative. That is what diplomacy does -- it creates space for maneuver. It also, almost by definition, creates expectations that cannot be realized.

The first step President Bush should take is to institutionalize the momentum created by the Iraq Study Group process by naming its co-chairman, James A. Baker III, as a special Middle East emissary. The former secretary of state has given the term "wheeler-dealer" a good name. He's the only American diplomat I can think of who might cause Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to check for his wallet.

But within the next few weeks, Baker and the other gods must come down from the rafters and confront the all-too-human players on the stage. If the tipsters are right, the commission will recommend a regional dialogue that involves Iraq's neighbors -- including Iran and Syria -- along with a new effort to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Let's focus on Iran. Baker met in September with Iran's ambassador to the United Nations, Javad Zarif, and heard a detailed explanation of why Iran is wary about such talks. The Iranian envoy is said to have explained that Tehran shares America's interest in calming the situation in Iraq and that contrary to U.S. fears, it doesn't seek a Shiite victory in the Iraqi civil war. The Iranians say they don't want a partition of Iraq either. Tehran wants a unified, democratic Iraq -- with its Shiite allies in the driver's seat, to be sure, but with Sunnis content enough that they stop fighting.

Iran is suspicious of a U.S. policy that seeks Iranian help even as it encourages regime change in Tehran. "You don't negotiate with someone who wants to overthrow you," one Iranian official told me. Iran's ruling mullahs are said to worry on a deeper level that in talking with America, the Islamic republic would lose its legitimacy. There's an abiding suspicion that such a dialogue would bring only "humiliation and intimidation," as one Iranian official puts it.

How to bridge this gap? There's actually a precise formula that was laid out by Iranian diplomats in early 2003, while they were conducting back-channel talks about Afghanistan and Iraq with the United States. Those conversations, mediated by the Swiss ambassador in Tehran, produced an Iranian document outlining the path to a broad "dialogue in mutual respect."

The Iranians thought they were amending a document drafted by Richard Armitage, the deputy secretary of state at the time. Armitage tells me he has no recollection of such a proposal, but its provenance matters less than the fact that the Iranians found it an acceptable framework. The document they bounced back to the United States summarized "Iranian aims," headed by a "halt in U.S. hostile behavior," "abolishment of all sanctions" and joint efforts to achieve a democratic Iraq. The Iranians accepted that U.S. aims in the negotiations would include assurances that Iran wouldn't develop nuclear weapons and recognition of Israel under a two-state solution to the Palestinian problem.

This 2003 dialogue collapsed largely because of an Iranian demand for "pursuit of anti-Iranian terrorists" from the Mujaheddin-e Khalq organization who were in Iraq. Absurdly, the Pentagon balked because of a fantasy that the group could help foment revolution in Iran. The Iranians may now say that the 2003 dialogue for "mutual respect" is off the table, but Baker should find out -- by going to Tehran.

Iran will demand a price for any help it offers in Iraq. So will Syria, which is already positioning its proxies for restoration of Syrian influence in Lebanon. There will be a temptation to overreach, as the Syrians clearly are doing, and the prices demanded may be too steep for America to pay. But the essence of a negotiation is that, in the pursuit of mutual interest, the parties narrow their demands to ones that are achievable. This is the kind of conversation America should be having and -- god-from-a-machine willing -- it may begin soon.

Can Iran Help Stabilize Iraq? (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, November 15, 2006

BAGHDAD

Iran has been here before, called upon by arch-foe America to assist in a neighborhood security problem. After 9/11, Iran helped the US extensively in Afghanistan to overthrow the Taliban and establish a new government.

It anticipated better relations in exchange for its assistance. But it was soon dubbed a member of the "Axis of Evil" by President Bush in his 2002 State of the Union address.

The outcome of that flicker of cooperation may increase Iran's wariness if it yet again receives a request from the US for help, this time in Iraq.

"This led the Iranians to conclude the US was intent on overthrowing their regime, and would not be affected by cooperative behavior," says Barnett Rubin, of New York University.

Bringing Iran - and Syria - into a regional process to stabilize Iraq is being touted both by British Prime Minister Tony Blair and the Iraq Study Group, the US commission studying options that both Republicans and Democrats hope will provide a framework for facesaving change in Iraq.

But the calculus has changed since the 2003 Iraq invasion. As the US has become more mired in the war, Iran has gained confidence that it was unlikely to face US-engineered "regime change." Iran still has numerous reasons to engage, but the price-tag may be higher.

"We're going into this with a handicap of having weakened ourselves over the past three years, and trying to negotiate over Iraq at a time when Iraq itself is in the worst situation it could be," says Vali Nasr, a professor of national security at the Naval Postgraduate School in Monterey, Calif.

"You are dealing with an Iran that is much more defiant, and much more over-confident," he adds. "Therefore Iranians may not be looking to build relations with the US ... but see it as an opportunity to pull US-Iran relations back from the brink."

The soft-spoken and reform-minded president Iran had in 2001 has also been replaced by arch-conservative Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who has spoken vociferously at every opportunity to reinvigorate the ideals of the 1979 Islamic revolution, a key pillar of which was the slogan: "Death to the Great Satan."

"It is obviously in the national interest of Iran to have a stable Iraq," says Mr. Rubin, who advised UN negotiating teams on Afghanistan in 2001. "The question is whether the Bush administration is willing to overcome its ideological depiction of Iran as part of the axis of evil...[and] Ahmadinejad is willing to be pragmatic...despite his ideological commitments."

Mr. Ahmadinejad said Tuesday that Iran's position remained that it would speak to the US, but only if American officials change their "attitude" toward the Islamic Republic, and "correct[s] their behavior." He said he was preparing a message to Americans.

Foreign Minister Manoucher Mottaki also offered little hint at Iran's response Tuesday, saying it would consider any offer. The day before, officials gloated over the Republican defeat, saying they hoped it would yield a "180 degree" policy change.

But beneath the heated rhetoric, Iran and the US have both sent signals for months that they are ready to engage in some way.

Even Iran's supreme religious leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, approved talks about Iraq earlier this year that Washington had authorized the US ambassador in Baghdad to conduct.

Iran wants all issues on the table, from its controversial nuclear program and resumption of US-Iran ties, to Iranian support for Hizbullah in Lebanon and Palestinian militants.

The US, so far, has demanded strict limits on topics. It has also insisted that Iran suspend nuclear enrichment activities before any talks can begin.

But such a hard line was taken before Democratic victories in Congress, and the replacement of Defense chief Donald Rumsfeld with Robert Gates, who has made clear in the past his desire to see US-Iran engagement. And before Hizbullah, with Iranian help and blessings, delivered what Tehran and Beirut declared a "victory" against Israel in fighting during July and August.

"You can say there is a cautious optimism [in Tehran] that something is going to happen," says Nasser Hadian-Jazy, a political scientist at Tehran University. That hopefulness prevails even though the 2001 Afghanistan example makes Iran "far more careful about what they give and what they want."

"It should not be a cosmetic relationship, addressing issues in a superficial way, by the US telling Iran: 'You do this; you do that"; that's not going to work," says Professor Hadian-Jazy. "This takes real strategic thinking on both sides."

That means coping with inevitable clashes: Israel is concerned that Washington is giving Iran too much of the regional pie, and local Sunni nations are likely to complain that Shiite Iran's influence will rise further.

But Iran also has much to offer, if it plays a role similar to the one it played in Afghanistan. US officials routinely complain that Iran is destabilizing Iraq. Iranians say Iran has decided not to - so far.

"[Iran] has already built a very important infrastructure in Iraq - military, security - but they have not yet used these resources," says Hadian-Jazy. "It is rather a guarantee against possible US military action. They want US decision-makers to think twice before taking action."

Those dangers have long been understood in Washington and London. Prime Minister Blair talked with the Iraq Study Group Tuesday by video-link. In a speech Monday night - in which he berated Iran for putting "obstacles in the path to peace, paint us ... as the aggressors" - he said that Iran should be part of the solution.

"A major part of the answer to Iraq lies not in Iraq itself but outside it, in the whole of the region where the same forces are at work, where the roots of this global terrorism are to be found, where the extremism flourishes," Mr. Blair said. Iran had to play a positive role, and suspend its nuclear enrichment program, he said, or "face the consequences of not doing so - isolation."

But such isolation would cause perhaps greater consequences for Mr. Bush and Blair, because of the influential role Iran could potentially play with Iraq's majority Shiite population.

"Iran has enough levers, money, weapons, political and cultural influence," says Nasr. "And if there is a political formula on the table.... There is a certain degree of trust, to get [Iraqi Shiites] to accept political compromises with Sunnis they would not before."

A similar dynamic was often at play during Arab-Israeli "talks" for decades, says Nasr, when "you always needed a regional power to handhold the partner."

That could be Iran's most important step, he says, though it could also stop funding radical parties and weapons traffic.

But those decisions may depend upon the US, and what security guarantees, if any - a longstanding Iranian demand - it is willing to offer as it calls for Iran to help.

"Iran will be more willing to cooperate, if there is a minimal understanding [on security]," says Nasr, a point that applies not just to Iran.

"All countries around Iraq are hedging their bets. They're not sure what will happen, the type of government, if the US will stay or go, [so] everybody has a maximalist position," he adds. "By limiting uncertainty, the US can bring some stability."

Gunmen Kidnap Dozens From Iraq Ministry Office (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook And Zaid Sabah

USA Today, November 15, 2006

BAGHDAD — Six senior police officers were arrested Tuesday after gunmen dressed in commando uniforms kidnapped dozens of male staff and visitors from a Higher Education Ministry office.

The Interior Ministry said that among those arrested was the police chief for the Karradah district, the central Baghdad region where the daylight raid occurred.

DOJ_NMG_0094684

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who leads a Shiite-dominated Iraqi government, said the attack was "the result of disagreements and conflict between militias."

Assassinations and kidnappings have become common as fighting between Sunni and Shiite Muslims has increased dramatically this year.

Higher Education Minister Abed Theyab initially said as many as 150 people had been seized, which would have made it the largest such abduction during the conflict. Later, the prime minister's office said 45 to 50 people had been taken and 20 of them had been released within hours.

During the 20-minute raid, the gunmen raced through the four-story building and separated men and women. The male hostages were then loaded into about 30 vehicles, Higher Education Ministry spokesman Basil al-Khatib said.

Alaa Makki, head of parliament's education committee, said the gunmen worked from a list of names. Those kidnapped included the office's deputy general directors.

Theyab ordered the closing of colleges and universities in response to the attack. The order was rescinded after the Iraqi police and army promised to increase security, al-Khatib said.

"Higher education in Iraq is targeted and the goal is hindering the wheel of progress and science," Theyab said.

The abductions took place at a Higher Education Ministry office that handles research grants and academic exchanges.

Al-Khatib said the ministry had earlier asked al-Maliki's government for increased protection but received no response.

"We are a scientific and academic institution," al-Khatib said. "We can't bring tanks and warplanes to protect our facilities. It is the government's job."

Academics are frequently targeted. Recent victims include a prominent Sunni geology professor and the dean of Baghdad University's economics department.

Baghdad University students are worried about their safety.

"There is no security," said Ahmad Abdel-Ilah, 20, a civil engineering student. "We expect to be kidnapped. Everybody is targeted."

Iraq has about 100,000 students at colleges and universities, according to government statistics.

Dozens Abducted In Brazen Raid On Iraq Ministry (NYT)

By John F. Burns And Michael Luo

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

BAGHDAD, Wednesday, Nov. 15 — Gunmen dressed in Iraqi police commando uniforms and driving vehicles with Interior Ministry markings rounded up dozens of people inside a government building in the heart of Baghdad on Tuesday and drove off with them in one of the most brazen mass kidnappings since a wave of sectarian abductions and killings became a feature of the war.

Although some Iraqi officials said as many as 150 people had been taken, the American military command put the total at 55.

Witnesses said as many as 50 gunmen arrived at the Ministry of Higher Education compound at midmorning, forced their way past a handful of guards and stormed through a four-story building, herding office workers, visitors and even a delivery boy outside at rifle point. After women were separated, the men were loaded aboard a fleet of more than 30 pickup trucks and two larger trucks, then driven away through heavy traffic toward mainly Shiite neighborhoods on the city's eastern edge, officials and witnesses said.

Late in the evening there were conflicting reports that some or most of those taken had been freed. Iraqiya state television reported that most of those seized had been freed in security operations, but a Shiite station, Al Furat, said 25 people were still missing. None of the reports could be confirmed.

A spokesman for the Interior Ministry, which is responsible for the police, announced on state television several hours after the abductions that orders had been issued for the arrest of several police commanders from the Karada area in eastern Baghdad, site of the Higher Education Ministry.

The announcement combined with other details, including accounts by one of a group of about a dozen people released by the kidnappers later on Tuesday, to suggest that the abductions may have been the latest in a series of mass kidnappings carried out by Shiite gangs and death squads operating from inside the Interior Ministry, or with access to its uniforms and vehicles. If the abductions are traced to groups operating under Interior Ministry cover, they seem certain to add a new level of crisis to the political tensions in Baghdad.

On Wednesday, an Interior Ministry spokesman said a brigade of the police searching in eastern Baghdad had found and freed 30 kidnap victims. He said the brigade was continuing its search and expected to free the remaining victims before the end of the day.

Recent events in the United States, including the Democrats' midterm election gains last week and the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, have intensified American pressure on Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki and the alliance of Shiite religious groups he leads to act decisively to improve his government's performance — in effect, to show that America has trustworthy partner, and help to head off the momentum in Washington for a withdrawal of American troops.

Action against sectarian militias and death squads, particularly those associated with the governing Shiite parties, tops the American priorities that have been urged on the Iraqi leader, most recently in a meeting in Baghdad Monday with the top American military commander in the Middle East, Gen. John P. Abizaid.

Late on Tuesday, Mr. Maliki, appearing on state-run television, seemed eager to establish that he had responded swiftly to the abductions, saying that he had ordered the Defense and Interior Ministries to mount an intensive search for those seized.

During a meeting with the Iraqi president, Jalal Talabani, Mr. Maliki appeared to suggest that the kidnappers came from the Mahdi Army, an unruly militia headed by the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, a mainstay of the ruling Shiite alliance. "What is happening is not terrorism, but the result of disagreements and conflict between militias belonging to this side or that," he said.

The 56-year-old prime minister said security sweeps had been responsible for the dozen people released earlier in the day, though that did not immediately tally with the account given by a Shiite ministry official who was among those set free. The official said he and others in his group were separated from the main body of those seized by their kidnappers after the gunmen quizzed all their captives about their identities and occupations. After being driven blindfolded to a rural area in northern Baghdad, the official said, they were abandoned and left to make their own way to safety.

The government's swift response in ordering the arrest of the police commanders broke with a pattern of inaction in several earlier mass kidnappings that appeared to have been linked to Shiite death squads.

While concern to show a new resolve to restive critics of the war in Washington was likely to have been a major spur, another was the sheer scale and audacity of the attack. By seizing such a large number of people from a government building, in the center of the capital, in broad daylight, the kidnappers appeared to be sending a message that they could pounce anywhere with impunity.

The precise number abducted remained uncertain. In an angry, anguished address delivered on live television, Abed Thiab al-Ajili, the higher education minister and a member of the country's largest Sunni political bloc, told Parliament that 100 to 150 people had been taken; ministry officials said they included Sunnis, Shiites, Kurds and Christians. A similar figure was given by the Shiite ministry official who was released. His figure, though, appeared to be based on a rough count of the people working in the building and visitors, rather than an accurate head count of those abducted.

The American military command, which sent troops to the site of the kidnappings, said its investigation showed that the number of men taken was about 55. It also said there were indications that the kidnapping victims had been taken to the Baladiyat district in eastern Baghdad, a predominantly Shiite neighborhood on the southern fringe of Sadr City about three miles from the building where they were seized.

The fact that the kidnappers took captives from a wide cross-section of Iraq's cultural and religious groups created some confusion about their motives, though many previous kidnappings have followed a similar pattern.

In his speech to Parliament, Mr. Ajili, the higher education minister, skirted the question of whether the kidnapping was motivated by sectarian hatred. But he suggested that the Maliki government was incompetent, if not complicit in the abductions. He said he had repeatedly asked the government for additional security to protect the ministry and members of the university community, who have been favorite targets for assassination since the toppling of Saddam Hussein.

According to a tally by The Associated Press, more than 150 educators have been killed, and thousands of others have fled the country. "I told the M.O.I. and M.O.D. if you can't protect the universities, give me 800 recruits and I will do this mission," Mr. Ajili said, referring to the Ministries of Interior and Defense. "But they rejected the idea."

Shiite leaders have often said that kidnappers who have been linked to the Interior Ministry have in fact been criminal thugs, or even Sunni insurgents, who have acquired the military-style uniforms used in the attack from street markets where they are widely available. Basil al-Khateed, a spokesman for the Higher Education Ministry, counseled against hasty conclusions. "It's not clear if this kidnapping was sectarian or not," he said.

Witnesses said the gunmen arrived at the ministry about 9:30 a.m. in a long line of vehicles that appeared to be on police business. "I saw around 30 Interior Ministry vehicles which did not have license plates close the road, and then the commandos stepped out of their vehicles," said one man who worked in a government agency nearby but asked not to be identified. Mr.

Khateed, the ministry spokesman, said the gunmen told ministry guards and onlookers that the American ambassador was arriving.

The ministry official who was later released said he was in his office inside the building. The gunmen, in the blue camouflage uniforms worn by police commandos, flooded into the building, the official said, and told him they were from the government's integrity commission, an agency that investigates corruption.

Suddenly, however, the gunmen cocked their weapons and yelled for everyone to stay where they were, the official said. They gathered the women in one room, before eventually letting them go, Mr. Ajili, the minister, said, but not before taking their cellphones and sorting through them for newer models, which they stole, leaving older models behind. He said the men taken captive had their hands bound behind them and their eyes blindfolded before being taken out to the pickup trucks.

Iraqi police and army units in the area did nothing to stop the abductions, witnesses and officials said, either because they believed the gunmen were legitimate commandos, or, some suggested, because they were part of a preset plan. "We are astonished by this," said Saleem Abdulla, a lawmaker from the Iraqi Consensus Front, the main Sunni bloc in Parliament. "It just seems so odd. How can people kidnap about 100 people like that, in daylight?"

He added: "And what about the vehicles? What about the checkpoints? Aren't we in a state of emergency? And no one can trace these people? No one can follow them to find out who they are? It is very odd. We think there has to be some link between these gangs and powerful men in the M.O.I."

The released Shiite official, who spoke later on Iraqi television but did not give his name, said the gunmen yelled at motorists to clear the road as they headed east through the traffic from the ministry building.

The official said the gunmen had taken their captives into a large hall with a concrete floor, then began to quiz each of them, demanding their names, often an indicator of their sect, as well as identity cards. "They split us into two groups," he said. "The first group, they said, 'We will release you.' The second group, 'We will keep you for additional investigation.' They put me in the group that would be released. When they said that, I thought, no, they will kill me. I was sure they would kill me. They were shouting, 'We will kill everyone who doesn't listen to us.' "

But the gunmen put him and the others in his group back onto the pickup trucks, and drove them elsewhere, the official said. There, he said, they were told to sit on the ground and not move, and warned that anyone removing a blindfold would be killed.

But after 10 minutes of silence, he said, one of the men in the group mustered the courage to clear his eyes, and told the others they were safe. "We don't know why they took us, and why they released us," the official said. "It's a terrorist operation with a big criminal ring that planned this."

Elsewhere, a car bomb exploded near a busy market in the capital, killing 10 people and wounding 25 others, an Interior Ministry official said. Late Monday and into Tuesday, clashes erupted between members of the Mahdi Army militia and American troops, leaving six civilians dead and 13 wounded, an Interior Ministry official said. The police found 25 bodies dumped across the city on Tuesday, the official said.

Scores Kidnapped From Iraq Research Center (LAT)

By Solomon Moore, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 15, 2006

BAGHDAD — A large force wearing the uniform of Iraqi police commandos kidnapped at least 70 people from a Higher Education Ministry building in a highly coordinated raid this morning, witnesses said.

Dozens of masked men armed with AK-47s, U.S.-made grenade launchers and M-16 rifles cordoned off Nidal Street, only a few blocks from City Hall, with more than 30 vehicles, including armored sport utility vehicles, witnesses said. The trucks didn't have license plates, witnesses said, and many had high-caliber machine guns mounted in their back beds.

The gunmen stormed the five-story office building and searched it room by room, detaining people along the way, witnesses and education officials said.

The captives included 17 guards stationed at the facility, the Scholarship and Cultural Relations Directorate of the Higher Education Ministry. A number of other employees and even visitors who had business with the agency were taken. The raiders separated men from women, locked the men together in a daisy-chain with plastic cuffs and loaded them into vehicles at gunpoint.

"They beat some of the women," said a witness who gave his name as Abu Aya and said one of the captives, a cafeteria worker, was his cousin. "One woman's eye was bloody."

An Interior Ministry official said that several police officers have been detained in connection with the raid, including the Karada sector police chief.

DOJ_NMG_0094687

The incident was similar to a raid on a Sunni Arab-owned meatpacking plant more than a month ago in which police commandos kidnapped at least 60 workers, many of whom were discovered slain days later. That raid sparked an investigation by the U.S. Army and moved Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki to suspend an entire commando unit for retraining.

A Facilities Protection Service guard stationed at a small hospital behind the higher education building said that the gunmen appeared to be highly organized.

"They came from there waving like they were official," the guard said, pointing to the end of an alleyway behind the directorate. "They looked trigger-happy though. One officer pointed his gun at a man on a bicycle. They even took civilians just standing around on the street."

"Men wearing police commando uniforms entered the building and took our mobile phones," said Nour Hussein, 23, a cleaner who works at the directorate. "At the entrance, they were hitting the guards very hard with their hands. They took all of the employees and left some of the women after locking them in a room They hit employees, visitors and guards."

The gunmen whisked the captives away in a matter of minutes, witnesses said. Estimates of the number of captives ranged from 70 to 150. The witnesses said that traffic and patrol officers stationed nearby did not interfere.

Today's raid followed a series of police attacks on the directorate building, according to witnesses. Bullet holes and shattered windows marred the five-story building, evidence of several shootouts over the last two months.

The hospital guard, who identified himself as Abu Hassan, said guards at the directorate and police engaged in a 90-minute gun battle a week ago. He surmised that today's attack was payback. Gunfire was minimal during the raid and several witnesses said that the building's guards did not resist the large force.

Basil Khateeb, a ministry spokesman, said that Maliki rejected a move by the ministry to close down Iraq's higher education facilities and created a committee to investigate today's raid.

Although the kidnap victims included Shiite Muslims and Sunni Arabs, Sunni leaders claimed that the raid was a sectarian attack. Sunnis dominate the Higher Education Ministry.

"We are sure that this operation is not simply criminal but political in nature," said Ammar Wajuih, a Sunni member of parliament. "It happened in an area that is known for being thick with Iraqi security forces and checkpoints."

The kidnappings took place on a day when Iraqi authorities announced the violent deaths of at least 43 people around the country.

Scores Kidnapped At Iraqi Ministry (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 15 -- Signs of the abduction were everywhere. A splatter of blood smeared on the gray floor. A black telephone, yanked out of its socket, tangled in a mess of cords. The dirt outlines of boot prints on a door the kidnappers had kicked. And at the reception desk, next to a pile of papers, a single pink rose, abandoned in the chaos.

This was the scene Tuesday at an Iraqi Ministry of Higher Education building, one hour after a small army of 80 gunmen, dressed in police uniforms, staged a swift, brazen daylight raid, seizing scores of employees and visitors.

It was one of the largest mass abductions since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, startling even by the standards of a nation reeling from sectarian strife, daily bombings and death squads. The last high-profile mass kidnapping occurred in July, when gunmen seized more than 30 people from an Iraqi Olympics Committee meeting. Six were later released, but the fate of the rest is still unknown.

Tuesday's incident was a well-orchestrated reminder of how challenging basic security remains in Iraq at a time when U.S. officials are pressing Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to assert more control. The abductions came on a day when at least 117 people were killed in car bombings, clashes and other violence around the country.

Estimates of the number of kidnap victims varied widely. The prime minister's office said about 50 employees were abducted, but the Ministry of Higher Education said as many as 150 employees and visitors were taken.

Early Wednesday, an Interior Ministry spokesman said a joint Iraqi police and army operation had secured the release of more than 30 of the kidnap victims. "The operation is still running, the number is still changing," said Brig. Gen. Abdul Kareem Khalaf, the spokesman.

Five senior police officials -- the police chief and four high-ranking deputies in the Karrada neighborhood where the abductions took place -- had been arrested by Tuesday evening. Politicians were branding the kidnappings "a national catastrophe" and a loss of credibility for Iraq.

The kidnapping unfolded about 10:30 a.m., when gunmen arrived in a convoy of 25 to 30 blue-and-yellow police cars and pickup trucks, some mounted with machine guns. All drove without license plates, said witnesses. The gunmen wore neither hoods nor masks. They clutched police-issue weapons such as Glock pistols, witnesses said.

Some fired their guns into the air, ordering pedestrians off the street. The U.S. ambassador was coming, witnesses heard the gunmen yelling, and they were there to provide security and clear the path.

"They told me to get inside," said Hadi Karim, a carpenter who was working in an office across the street. "I had to close the door or they would shoot me."

Then the official-looking convoy sped past the lone guard at the security gate, who didn't offer any resistance, past a set of 30-foot blast walls and entered the parking lot of the building. It houses the Higher Education Ministry's scholarship and cultural relations directorate, an agency responsible for granting scholarships to Iraqi professors and students applying to study abroad.

The gunmen stormed through the entrance. One walked up to a receptionist and said the men were from the Interior Ministry, which oversees the police, said Basil al-Khateeb, a spokesman for the Higher Education Ministry, who said he had spoken with the receptionist. "Those who came were not like other attackers, thieves or looters," he added. "They came in an official way."

The gunmen speedily weeded out the men from the women. The women were taken to a room and locked up, witnesses said. The men were pushed into the trucks and driven away. The kidnapped included employees and visitors to the agency, janitors and PhDs, even a deputy general director of the agency. Some were blindfolded and tossed into the backs of pickup trucks, said witnesses.

They included Sunni Muslims and Shiite Muslims, Kurds and Christians, suggesting that the kidnappers might not be connected with the sectarian violence that is ravaging Iraq.

"They took everyone -- Sunnis and Shiites," said Hussam Yassin, a goateed man in his 20s and a Higher Education Ministry employee whose two cousins, both engineers, were among those abducted. "They took all the men, even a 60-year-old man."

Still, it was unclear Tuesday night whether the gunmen were members of the police or impostors. Militias associated with religious groups have been widely seen as fomenting the sectarian violence gripping the country, and Shiite militias are believed to have infiltrated the Shiite-dominated police force, which Sunnis have long accused of conducting mass abductions.

The minister of higher education is a member of the Iraqi Accordance Front, the largest Sunni Muslim bloc in parliament. At the same time, Karrada is increasingly becoming a stronghold of the Mahdi Army, the militia linked to radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. And the dominant Shiite religious party in government, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, also has an armed wing, the Badr Organization, that is known to have strong links within the police.

On Tuesday, at a televised meeting with President Jalal Talabani, Maliki appeared to imply that the kidnappings might be linked to militia rivalries. "What is happening is not terrorism, but the result of disagreements and conflict between militias belonging to this side or that," Maliki said.

If the kidnappings were militia-related, it would underscore Maliki's inability to disarm the groups and could erode his relationship with U.S. officials who have been pressuring him to take tougher action against the militias.

As the convoy left through the gate, Karim, the carpenter, watched from his window across the street. He noticed something different, he said. The convoy had grown by several cars, apparently stolen from inside the parking lot.

"They left with more cars than they came in," said Karim, adding that the convoy turned left onto his street and headed toward the neighborhood of Baladiyat.

He paused, then spoke about how Iraqis like him had lived through wars against Iran, Israel and Iraq's Kurdish minority. "We're used to wars, but not something like this," he said.

The kidnappings were the latest to target academics and a blow to efforts to keep members of Iraq's trained middle class from fleeing the country. Last month, within the same week, gunmen assassinated a Sunni professor and the Shiite dean of Baghdad University's economics department.

Higher Education Minister Abed Thiyab promptly suspended classes at all universities, fearing that more professors or students could be targeted. He told parliament that he had repeatedly asked for more security to protect academic institutions but that his request had not been fulfilled.

"We strongly condemn this act because it is a savage terrorist action," Thiyab said. "This contradicts the sense of credibility in the new Iraq."

Alaa Maki, a Sunni politician who heads the parliament's education committee, interrupted a parliamentary session and branded the abductions a "national catastrophe."

DOJ_NMG_0094689

At the ministry building, dozens of relatives of the kidnap victims had converged at the security gate. Some were openly wailing, others stood solemnly. They were Shiites, Sunnis and Christians seeking answers for the disappearance of their sons, brothers and cousins.

One angry Shiite man yelled at police officials investigating the scene: "Now you will say the militias did this. You will never be brave enough to say policemen did this."

On a nearby street, a man whose brother was a victim said: "Where can we go? The police kidnapped him."

Crouched against a wall, Jindeel Hassan was crying. His brother, Ali, was one of those kidnapped. Hassan said that his brother told him one month ago that the agency had received a threat letter.

"They are all clean people there," explained Hassan. "There are Sunnis, Shiites, Kurds, Christians, all educated people, working together."

"It's a big crime. I feel sadness, suffering, torture," Hassan added, directing his words at those who abducted Ali: "You leave the American occupiers, and you come and kill your country's sons?"

U.S. Commander In Iraq To Face Democrats Eager For Troop Cuts (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

Senate Democrats impatient to start withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq will inject a new political dynamic into the debate over the war beginning today as they question the military's top Middle East commander for the first time since their party swept into control of Congress this month.

Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, head of the U.S. Central Command, which oversees American forces in the Middle East, will face questions on the violence in Iraq and what it means for the roughly 145,000 U.S. troops there during scheduled testimony today before the Senate Armed Services Committee, senators from both parties said.

Senior Democrats and Republicans on the committee are deeply divided over basic issues such as troop levels and strategy and whether Iraq is already in a state of civil war. Still, they are united by a concern for American forces. Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.), for example, said he will quiz Abizaid on the risks that U.S. troops could face if embedded with Iraqi units under an Iraqi chain of command.

"We've got to be very careful we are not putting at risk life and limb of American forces by putting them with Iraqis," he said in an interview. "What kind of orders will the Iraqi forces receive?" he asked, voicing concern over sectarian influences within the Iraqi military.

Democrats have made it clear that they intend to bolster the committee's oversight role, and an influx of new members, including Democrat James Webb of Virginia, is expected to further invigorate debate. Webb, a former active-duty Marine and one of only a handful of members of Congress with offspring serving in Iraq, secured a seat on the committee yesterday, according to his spokeswoman, Kristian Denny Todd.

The committee plans to hold confirmation hearings Dec. 4 or 5 for former CIA chief Robert M. Gates, President Bush's nominee to replace Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who resigned the day after the Nov. 7 midterm elections. The panel will also weigh in on the congressionally created Iraq Study Group as well as on a sweeping review of Iraq strategy initiated by Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The Pace review will cover strategy and the viability of increasing or decreasing troop levels in Iraq, as well as stress on the force, according to Warner.

Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), poised to take over as Armed Services Committee chairman, said that Iraq is headed into an abyss of civil war and that only by beginning a troop pullout in four to six months can Washington exert the necessary pressure on Iraqi leaders to forge political solutions to the country's violence.

What Iraqis "need to hear, and what the American people need to hear, is that we are darned impatient," Levin said at a news conference Monday, recounting a conversation with President Bush.

Levin said he believes a majority of the Senate would now back a bipartisan resolution he initiated on a phased pullout.

Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.), a committee member who joined with 40 other senators in backing the resolution six months ago, said in an interview: "The best approach is to clearly state the policy to begin redeployment. The critical problems . . . are political in nature," not military, he said.

Democrats say a driving factor in their push for drawing down U.S. troops in Iraq is the strain on the all-volunteer military from repeated combat zone deployments, as well as from billions of dollars' worth of equipment wear and tear that has hurt the military's preparedness should another conflict break out.

Some Democrats on the committee, including Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), advocate increasing the size of the Army, which has about 500,000 active-duty soldiers, to improve readiness and ease the strain on the force.

Leading Republicans, for their part, are arguing against a timetable for troop withdrawals while urging a more measured approach to redefining Iraq strategy.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), set to become the committee's ranking minority member, made it clear that he vehemently opposes a timetable for withdrawing troops and instead favors a substantial increase in U.S. ground forces in Iraq.

If the United States begins a phased withdrawal, "chaos will ensue, and that chaos will spread throughout the region," McCain said in an interview. "We need to get more troops into the equation to try to get Iraqis trained," he said, adding that "the Iraqi military is doing better but is not yet prepared to take over."

McCain, who has advocated increasing U.S. forces in Iraq for years, said that of a string of U.S. mistakes there, "one of our greatest failures was not having enough troops from the beginning."

Feingold Pushes Bill To Extend Iraq Inspector General (MERC/AP)

By Frederic J. Frommer

The San Jose Mercury News/AP, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Senate approved an amendment Tuesday to extend an investigative office that unearthed millions of dollars in waste and fraud associated with the rebuilding of Iraq.

The amendment, passed by voice vote as part of the military construction and veterans' spending bill, would keep the inspector general's office running through October 2008. Under current law, it will expire in October 2007.

The amendment was offered by Republican Susan Collins, the chairwoman of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, and Wisconsin Democrat Russ Feingold.

"That office has been enormously effective as a watchdog," Collins said in a telephone interview. "It's inconceivable to me that we would allow it to expire prematurely when literally billions of dollars are still being spent on Iraqi reconstruction projects."

The overall spending bill passed the Senate by voice vote Tuesday night.

Connecticut Sen. Joseph Lieberman, who will become chairman of the committee when Democrats take over the Senate next year, called the office "critically necessary."

"And it's delivered - often to our consternation," he said at a new conference with Collins, Feingold and Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn.

"This is something that has actually gone right," said Feingold, a harsh critic of the war. "And it would be a real serious mistake to undo it prematurely."

Led by Stuart Bowen Jr., the Office of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction tracks spending in the multibillion-dollar effort to rebuild Iraq.

The agency's work has resulted in four criminal convictions and, most recently, evidence that a Halliburton subsidiary exploited federal regulations to hide details on its contract performance.

"Until taxpayer dollars are finished being spent in Iraq, we need oversight," said Coleman.

Earlier this year, Collins pushed through the Senate a measure that would allow the agency to review more than $6 billion in additional funding aimed at stabilizing Iraq - in effect keeping the IG office in business.

But that provision, added to a major defense bill, was stripped from the final legislation when it was negotiated with Rep. Duncan Hunter, chairman of the House Armed Services Committee.

Hunter did not return phone and e-mail messages seeking comment Tuesday. In a statement a couple of weeks ago, he said he agreed the office had been useful but that a termination date was needed.

Setting the 2007 date "ensures that we have a smooth transition from the special inspector general to the inspectors general of State and Defense," Hunter said in that statement.

Collins said she didn't think the latest provision would face similar obstacles when House and Senate negotiators finalize the military construction and veterans' spending bill.

"I don't think so, now that this issue has been exposed to the light of day, there has been a groundswell of support for retaining the office," she said. "And I'm very hopeful that the Congress will act promptly to extend the office."

By Whom The Toll Is Counted (LAT)

By Richard Fausset

The Los Angeles Times, November 15, 2006

NO one asked Michael White to count the dead soldiers in Iraq.

He is not a military man, and he has no friends or relatives who serve. He is a guy with a Honda Civic, a mortgage and a job in a suburban office park. A guy with a wife and a 7-year-old daughter who has soccer games to go to.

DOJ_NMG_0094691

But for almost 3 1/2 years — for no pay and no glory — White has kept a meticulous tally of every U.S. and coalition military fatality, posting the names and the numbers on his website, http://www.icasualties.org .

It started as a hobby — the work of a war critic who wanted to help keep the facts straight. Today, the Los Angeles Times, Washington Post and New York Times use White's numbers to show the extent of the nation's collective sacrifice. Bloggers use his numbers to quell conspiracy theories, and soldiers' parents call up the site to make sure their children are not listed on it. Job seekers have sent him resumes, unaware that the operation is little more than a guy and his laptop.

White is a former post-punk guitar player who, at age 50, favors khakis and sensible shoes. He is proud of his work, and pleased that people are paying attention. But like many Americans, he doesn't know when the war will end — and he wonders how long the site will dominate his life.

He has been particularly busy of late. His own statistics show that October was the deadliest month for U.S. forces in Iraq since January 2005, with 105 fatalities. This month, as of Tuesday, 35 more troops have died. The total number of American military fatalities stands at 2,853. It will surpass the 3,000 mark in a few months if current trends hold.

"I work on the site every morning, every lunch, every evening," White said. "I'm sure my wife resents it, as well she should…. There's housework that doesn't get done. There's yardwork that doesn't get done."

His wife, Ashley, admits that his obsession can be frustrating. "When I want to do something fun on the weekends, it competes with his work on the site," she said. "On the other hand, I'm very proud of him for his commitment."

Like most Americans with scant ties to the war effort, White could have kept its grisly rhythms at a distance. Instead, those rhythms now define him. And yet Iraq can still seem worlds from his tidy suburban cul-de-sac, and the breakfast nook where he does most of his work on a round wooden table. A window behind him offers a view of the train tracks where, about year ago, he remembers seeing a train loaded with Humvees — a rare reminder of life during wartime.

AND even now, White can seem unsure about his motivation for assuming his peculiar burden.

"Why do I do it? If you ask my mother or my sister, they'd say, 'That's Michael: obsessive,' " he said. "It's like when I was 14 years old and locked myself in my bedroom to memorize every word to [Bob Dylan's] 'Like A Rolling Stone.' "

White is of average height, with an open, sanguine face and a measured voice that is both soft and firm. He is a Southern liberal who never considered himself an activist, but he has long had an interest in politics and current events. He traces it to his upbringing in South Carolina, where he lived through the tension of desegregation.

His most reliable passion, however, has always been music. When George W. Bush was elected president in 2000, he retreated into the "Anthology of American Folk Music," the Harry Smith-compiled landmark of the genre, immersing himself in its crackly old spirituals and Scots-Irish murder ballads.

His reaction to Iraq was different. About two months after the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003, White discovered that a California antiwar protester named Pat Kneisler had posted a self-researched tally of troop casualties on Daily Kos, a pro-Democratic website. Like White, Kneisler had been frustrated by differing fatality counts in the media.

White contacted her and offered to keep the count going on his own site, lunaville.org— the name for the make-believe city where he set his daughter's bedtime stories.

Kneisler accepted the offer, and the pair set about their common task from different sides of the country. For White, it was a protest, albeit a low-key sort that suited his personality.

"I'm not the kind of person who will stand on a street corner holding a sign," he said. "Maybe I'd be a better person if I was."

Then, as now, the Department of Defense kept its own tally of U.S. casualties on its website, http://www.defenselink.mil . But White and Kneisler were concerned that the numbers were updated slowly, and didn't seem to be consistent in media accounts.

"The concept from the get-go was to get an accurate count," White said. "I'd pick up the morning paper and it would say the number was X, and then I'd hear a news report that said five more troops had been killed. But the next day in the paper the number was still X. It was always behind, and I wanted to know what the immediate tally was."

The pair used official military news releases for their list, cross-checking them with reports from journalists who were traveling with coalition troops. Over time they earned a reputation among media and military families for being accurate and quick to update their figures.

THE traffic to the site soon overwhelmed White's home server. When he switched to a commercial host, the traffic outstripped his subscription plan: At one point, he ended up with a $1,000 monthly bill. So he changed the terms of his subscription and put up a request for donations. Today, donors keep the bills paid.

There were more changes as the war dragged on. The name "icasualties" supplanted "lunaville." ("Yeah," Ashley said. "Some bedtime story, huh?") They added links to news stories, and began counting casualties in Afghanistan.

Kneisler dropped out of the project in April without explaining her reasons to White. She would not comment for this story. In the past, White said, they had argued over whether to post the name of a soldier who had been run over by a car while on leave back in the United States. He refused to include the fatality in the official count because it wasn't war-related.

White added features that packaged the casualty numbers — on the wounded as well as the dead — in ways that the Pentagon had not. The idea, he said, was to generate the kind of detailed data that corporate executives demand for their board meetings.

One map shows the number of coalition and U.S. deaths that occurred in each Iraqi province. It reveals that Al Anbar province, the largest in the nation and a stronghold of Sunni Muslim insurgents, has seen at least 1,044 coalition deaths, making it a deadlier place than Baghdad province, with at least 746 deaths. Some fatalities, the website notes, cannot be identified by province.

Some of the charts focus on fatalities among non-U.S. coalition troops: of the 246 killed, 125 were from the United Kingdom, 33 from Italy, and Poland and Ukraine have each lost 18. Another chart shows the number of U.S. troops killed each month by roadside bombs, known as improvised explosive devices, or IEDs.

SOME of the information on White's site, such as the number of U.S. deaths per state, is also available from the Defense Department, but White often updates his numbers faster. And his information, arguably, is easier to find: For one, the government's state-by-state fatality breakdown is accessible at a much more unwieldy URL (

And White goes one step further. He also breaks down the number of deaths by city.

Those kinds of details are among the chief attractions for journalists. In September, the New York Times used White's figures to show that Houston, at the time, had sacrificed more soldiers in Iraq and Afghanistan than any other city, 27. (With the death of Marine Cpl. Benjamin S. Rosales in Iraq in October, that number is now 28).

On Oct. 19, USA Today used icasualties.org's numbers to show the five deadliest days in Iraq thus far in 2006. (The deadliest was Jan. 7, when 18 U.S. troops were killed — nine of them in a helicopter crash).

Marine Corps Maj. Stewart T. Upton, a Defense Department spokesman, said he hadn't heard of the site before. "People should look to the Department of Defense for the official numbers," he said.

The essence of White's work starts with his search for casualty news releases from the coalition, the Multi-National Force-Iraq. The releases, available at its website, http://www.mnf-iraq.com , contain minimal details of the death — typically, its date and location, and what branch of the military the troop was in, and the cause.

White posts these deaths in his main database as "NAME NOT RELEASED YET", and counts them as "Reported U.S. Deaths Pending DoD Confirmation."

Then he goes to the Department of Defense website, where a more detailed news release is made public 24 hours after the family is notified. These generally contain the deceased's name, age, rank, hometown and a more thorough description of the cause of death.

When a specific news release matches a generic one, White fills in the details. It is these details that allow him to generate many of his original charts and graphs. But sometimes the generic and the specific news releases do not match up. Checking against details in news reports has become more difficult, he said, because fewer reporters appear to be traveling with military units. Instead, some of his best fact-checkers are the military personnel and families who use the site.

THOSE families visit for different reasons. Diane Santoriello, 57, of Penn Hills, Pa., checks icasualties.org every morning, writing the latest casualty count on a sticky note she posts on her computer.

Santoriello lost her son, Army 1st Lt. Neil A. Santoriello, in August 2004 when he was killed by an IED outside of Fallouja, in Al Anbar province. She has become an outspoken critic of the war. She says she misses the time she spent writing to him on her computer.

"I think part of it is a replacement for e-mailing him," she said.

Elsa De La Fuente, 49, of Miami, first visited the site about two months ago. A few weeks had gone by, and she hadn't heard from her 27-year-old son, stationed in or around Tikrit. She was relieved to find that his name was not on the list.

De La Fuente checks the site regularly. She said she preferred its presentation of cold facts to the emotionally charged images she had to endure on television and in newspapers.

"The statistics will show you," she said. "You don't need to shoot pictures or anything."

White has kept his site free of politics — largely because he has learned how much the families of troops rely on his numbers.

"It's awful hard to read those e-mails," he said. "You have to acknowledge their loss in a nonpartisan way. That's one reason the site's agenda is separate from my politics. It's documentary. It doesn't have a political agenda. It answers a question I want answered."

DOJ_NMG_0094693

But some questions are easier to answer than others. White also has been trying to keep track of Iraqi civilian deaths, tallying the numbers from news reports. But he knows it's not an accurate way to count, and his numbers only go back to January 2005.

His chart lists 19,526 Iraqi civilians killed since that date. Below that total, a sentence in red type says "Total Prior to 2005," followed by a question mark.

"This is not a complete list," the site states, "nor can we verify these totals."

His list of private contractors who died in Iraq carries a similar disclaimer. It is one of the few collections of its kind that is publicly available.

But so far he has found only 370 names by scouring news reports. The Department of Labor has tallied 650 such deaths through late October, but will not release the names for reasons of confidentiality.

And so White's work continues. There is a Starbucks near his office with Wi-Fi. Sometimes he glances down at the newspapers for sale and sees his numbers splashed across the front page.

Sometimes the faux bossa nova plays and the milk foam whooshes, and the world seems at peace, but for the clack of Michael White's keyboard.

Guilty Plea Expected In Iraq Rape Trial (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

A U.S. Army soldier who is accused of taking part in a plan to rape an Iraqi teenage girl and murder her family in March is scheduled to plead guilty today to numerous charges in a military court in Kentucky, the soldier's civilian lawyer said yesterday.

Spec. James P. Barker would be the first soldier involved in the gruesome rape and killings in Mahmudiyah to publicly take responsibility for the attack, which shocked both the U.S. military and the Iraqi community where the family lived. Prosecutors say the soldiers raped and killed a 14-year-old girl and gunned down her parents and 4-year-old sister.

Barker has agreed to testify against others who were involved, said David Sheldon, a Washington-based military defense lawyer. As part of his plea deal, Barker will not face the death penalty, Sheldon added, but he could receive life in prison on charges that include murder, rape and arson.

"Specialist Barker wanted to take responsibility for his role in the crimes that he committed with these other soldiers," Sheldon said. "He will cooperate fully with the prosecution."

Barker, who is also represented by Capt. James D. Culp, plans to plead guilty at Fort Campbell today, Sheldon said.

Four other members of Barker's company have been implicated in the attack, including former private Steven D. Green, who is charged with murder in federal court in Kentucky and has entered a not-guilty plea. Green's lawyers could not be reached yesterday.

Sheldon said that the soldiers had discussed raping the 14-year-old after they visited her house several weeks before the attack, and that on March 12 they agreed to sneak away from their military checkpoint to rape her and kill anyone else in the house.

At the home, about 300 yards from the checkpoint, Green allegedly rounded up the family members and put them in the bedroom while Barker and another soldier raped the 14-year-old, Sheldon said. Evidence in the case shows that Green shot the father in the head with his shotgun before finding an AK-47 rifle in the house and shooting the mother and the 4-year-old.

Green is accused of then raping the 14-year-old before shooting her in the head with the AK-47, according to court documents.

It was the American shotgun shell, left behind at the scene of the crime, that prompted Army officials to suspect U.S. soldiers were involved in the case, Sheldon said. Another soldier in the unit alerted authorities months later, initiating a formal investigation that led to the current charges.

Sheldon said Barker is remorseful for the attack, which he said arose out of an extremely stressful environment in an insurgent stronghold south of Baghdad.

"All of these soldiers were in a situation where they were sleep-deprived and where they had been drinking whiskey," Sheldon said. "In Specialist Barker's case, he had acute stress syndrome as a result of the traumatic events that he witnessed over the course of the previous two to three months."

Green has been singled out as the instigator of the attack. He was discharged from the Army weeks after it happened, although military officials have said they did not know of his alleged involvement at the time. Military documents show that members of Green's unit had concerns about his behavior and were unaware of his "personal problems" before his enlistment.

"Soldier needs to go for the best of the soldiers he serves with and U.S. Army," said a comment from his battalion's command sergeant major on a form dated April 16, a month after the Mahmudiyah rape and slayings. "He can't be counted on to do the right thing."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Incorporation Rules Enable Fraud, Officials Warn Panel (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

Lax state standards allow millions of companies to incorporate every year without their owners being identified, a practice that lets tax evasion, money laundering and securities fraud go undetected, federal officials told a Senate panel yesterday.

Leaders of the Senate Government Affairs Committee's permanent subcommittee on investigations sounded alarms about lenient rules that apply to about 2 million new businesses that incorporate in the United States every year. In most cases, states fail to seek basic ownership information from companies and often do not check what little data is provided in follow-up reports against criminal justice databases.

Lack of transparency over who controls the companies amounts to "an unacceptable risk to our national security and our treasury," said Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), whose staff initiated the investigation.

Justice Department and Internal Revenue Service officials who investigate financial wrongdoing testified that they are frequently stymied by the problem. "We have important investigations that are hitting brick walls because no one has the ownership information," said Stuart D. Nash, associate deputy attorney general.

Immigration and Customs Enforcement investigators pointed authorities to a Nevada company that received nearly 3,800 suspect wire transfers totaling $81 million over two years. But the case did not move forward because authorities could not identify who owned the business, lawmakers said.

The FBI has opened 103 investigations into stock market manipulation, most of them involving shell companies whose owners are unknown to authorities. The bureau said shell businesses have been used to launder as much as $36 billion from countries in the former Soviet Union. A previous report by the Justice Department disclosed that Russian officials used shell companies in Delaware and Pennsylvania to siphon $15 million that was supposed to pay for safety upgrades for former nuclear power plants.

In many cases, states do not have an incentive to seek detailed information about business owners because the lure of incorporation fees and related funds is too great. In Delaware alone, nearly one-quarter of the state's revenue comes from such fees, according to a Government Accountability Office report on the issue released in April.

Technology that allows companies to incorporate online without requiring the owners to appear in person in a state office is also raising concerns. In some states, including Delaware and Nevada, corporations can pay an extra fee to complete the incorporation process in an hour, lawmakers said.

"What is needed is a level playing field, a system that avoids a race to the bottom," said Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.).

Fixing the problem could be difficult. States and the federal government have clashed over who has the authority to regulate business. At the hearing, senators asked law enforcement officials to look more closely at the problem and to recommend a solution.

Some state regulators argue that seeking more information could raise privacy considerations. And Yvonne Jones, director of the financial markets team at the GAO, said that state officials interviewed by her staff expressed concern that widespread change could require action by state legislatures and could increase fees.

Senate Warned Of Threats From 'Shell Companies' (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, November 15, 2006

A top Justice Department official told a Senate subcommittee yesterday that while new businesses play an essential role in the nation's economy, a growing number of "shell companies" now being formed legitimately could be used for money laundering, bribery, corruption, tax fraud and the financing of terrorist activities.

Associate Deputy Attorney General Stuart Nash told the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs permanent subcommittee on investigations that a person without any identification can form a corporation and establish a new business nationwide "within as little as five minutes."

"The corporation is then a legal entity that can engage in business and open a bank account," Mr. Nash said. "Yet, some of the most important information about the corporation -- its ownership -- is nowhere recorded. If that corporation were to engage in fraudulent or negligent activity, it would be very difficult, or even impossible, to identify its beneficial owners.

"Domestic or foreign law-enforcement agents would be stymied in their attempts to conduct an investigation because they would be unable to find out who is behind the illegal activity," he said.

The subcommittee is investigating the issue of states incorporating nearly 2 million new U.S. companies each year without identifying the company owners, and the law-enforcement problems that result when some of these companies become engaged in money laundering, tax evasion or other crimes.

"Although the vast majority of companies formed in the U.S. serve legitimate commercial purposes, they are attractive vehicles for those seeking to launder money, evade taxes or finance terrorism," said Sen. Norm Coleman, Minnesota Republican and subcommittee chairman.

"Without company ownership information, it is often difficult and at times impossible for U.S. law enforcement to identify and prosecute the criminals behind U.S. shell companies that are engaged in illicit activities," Mr. Coleman said.

The Government Accountability Office reported earlier this year that none of the 50 states routinely require applicants to disclose who will own a corporation and most states do not require ownership information for a new limited liability company. The report said the absence of ownership information allowed people to conceal their identities while operating as U.S. companies.

Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the committee's ranking Democrat, said many states compete with each other to sign up new businesses -- offering the service for a median fee of $100. For example, he said, Nevada boasts that it can set up a legitimate company within an hour.

Mr. Levin said the United States was home to 12 million companies in 2004, including 9 million corporations and 3.8 million limited-liability corporations.

In that year alone, he said, the 50 states incorporated more than 1.9 million new businesses. He called on the Justice Department to come up with the "proper corrections" to end what he called a "problem that has been with us for more than two decades."

Mr. Levin said a person who wants to set up a U.S. company typically provides less information than is required to open a bank account or get a driver's license.

In most cases, he said, they do not have to provide the name or address of a single owner of the new company.

Shell Companies Proliferate In U.S. (AP)

By Marcy Gordon, The Associated Press

AP, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - Some $15 million in international aid for improving the safety of nuclear power plants in the former Soviet Union was diverted. Shell companies in the United States are used to launder as much as $36 billion from former Soviet republics. Millions in taxable income are hidden in bank accounts in the Caribbean.

All because, congressional investigators say, U.S. states grant incorporation to nearly 2 million new companies a year without identifying their owners -- lenience that allows people to hide their identities and shell companies to launder money, evade taxes or finance terrorism.

Officials of the U.S. Justice Department, the Internal Revenue Service and a financial crimes division of the Treasury Department told Congress at a hearing Tuesday that their agencies' law enforcement efforts have been hampered by the absence of information on company ownership. Shell companies exist mainly on paper and lack real operations. The use of shell companies incorporated in the United States for illicit activities is rising, the officials say.

A report by the Government Accountability Office, Congress' investigative arm, found that none of the 50 states customarily requires disclosure of the owners of companies that are not publicly traded. Other countries do require ownership information to be provided, lawmakers say.

The investigative panel of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee is examining the issue.

"Criminals seeking to launder money, evade taxes or commit other crimes want to cloak their actions in secrecy," Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the panel's senior Democrat, said. "And right now, that's exactly what they get when they establish a U.S. shell company."

Among examples cited by the GAO report:

Officials of U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement reported that a Nevada-based company received more than 3,700 suspicious wire transfers totaling $81 million over two years, but the case wasn't prosecuted because the agency could not identify the company's owners.

DOJ_NMG_0094696

The Justice Department said Russian officials used shell companies incorporated in Pennsylvania and Delaware to illegally divert $15 million in international aid intended for improving the safety of nuclear power plants in the former Soviet Union.

The FBI found that U.S. shell companies are being used to launder as much as $36 billion coming from the former Soviet Union.

San Diego Avoids Fine In Settlement With SEC (AP)

By Elliot Spagat, AP Business Writer

AP, November 15, 2006

The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission on Tuesday ordered San Diego to hire an independent financial consultant for three years but stopped short of levying fines to punish the nation's eighth-largest city for failing to disclose financial obligations when it sold bonds.

San Diego also agreed to avoid future violations of securities laws. The SEC did not sanction current or former officials but said it will continue to investigate "individuals and other entities that may have violated the federal securities laws."

The SEC and Justice Department began investigating San Diego in February 2004 after the city admitted errors and omissions in its financial statements. The federal probes triggered tumult at City Hall that culminated in the mayor's resignation.

The city made "misleading statements" in five bond offerings in 2002 and 2003 that raised $260 million from investors, the SEC said.

According to the SEC, the city failed to disclose that its unfunded pension liability - the gap between the value of its pension assets and its obligation to retirees - would balloon to $2 billion by 2009 from $284 million in 2002. The city also failed to tell potential investors it carried a $1.1 billion liability for retiree health care.

"The city's enormous pension and retiree health liabilities and failure to disclose those liabilities placed the city in serious financial straits," the SEC said in its 22-page order.

Mayor Jerry Sanders, a former police chief who was elected last year, said the settlement "marks a major milestone in San Diego's emergence from the financial wilderness."

City Attorney Michael Aguirre, who helped broker the settlement, said the SEC correctly avoided a stiffer penalty because taxpayers suffered just as much as bond investors.

San Diego's ability to borrow money has been crippled since the scandal turned the city into a Wall Street pariah. The city still must complete overdue financial audits dating back to 2003 before it can tap financial markets. Sanders said he expected to finish those audits soon and return to bond markets next year.

Michael Conger, an attorney who successfully sued the city in 2003 on behalf of retirees, said the SEC let San Diego off the hook - and appropriately so.

"The SEC is saying we appreciate what you've done so far, don't do it again, and we're going to put you on three years' probation," Conger said. "Now let's look at the individuals."

The SEC said city officials who worked on the misleading financial documents were aware of San Diego's liabilities and "acted recklessly" by failing to disclose them. It commended the city for replacing key employees and its auditor and characterized Mayor Dick Murphy's resignation last year as a step toward recovery.

Five former city and pension fund officials were charged with federal fraud and conspiracy in January. Conger said he suspected the SEC would urge the Justice Department to pursue additional charges against people who signed misleading documents.

Randall Lee, director of the SEC's Pacific region, declined to identify any individuals under investigation.

San Diego's problems began in 1980, when the city began spending above-average returns on its pension investments to give annual bonus checks to retirees. The city decided in 1996 and again in 2002 to avoid payments to the pension fund but at the same time enhanced retirement benefits.

Its unfunded pension liability currently stands at $1.43 billion.

Analyst At Centre Of Fraud Suit Arrested (FT)

By Ben White

Financial Times, November 15, 2006

The alleged operative at the centre of a high-profile civil lawsuit against a group of powerful hedge funds has been arrested in New York on a wire fraud charge.

Spyro Contogouris was taken into custody on Monday on charges that he stole more than $5m from a former employer, the US Attorney for the Southern District of New York said on Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0094697

The charge is unrelated to the private $5bn lawsuit filed by Canadian insurance group Fairfax Financial against Mr Contogouris and a group of hedge funds including Exis Capital and SAC Capital Management, the $10bn fund run by billionaire Steven Cohen.

However, the US Attorney's office said its investigation into Mr Contogouris is continuing. And the charges may bolster the lawsuit filed by Canadian insurance group Fairfax Financial.

An attorney for Mr Contogouris declined to comment as did attorneys for Exis and SAC.

In the lawsuit, Fairfax claims Mr Contogouris and the hedge funds conspired to generate bogus analyst reports critical of the company, sent threatening letters to Prem Watsa, Fairfax chief executive, and his friends and family, tried to intimidate employees into providing sensitive inside information and attempted to plant negative news stories about the company.

The hedge funds and Mr Contogouris have denied the allegations.

Fairfax has seen its shares rise more than 40 per cent since the lawsuit was filed. People close to the company say the rise is due at least in part to a stoppage in the alleged dirty tricks.

Mr Contogouris has said he was working for the FBI on a probe into Fairfax. The FBI declined to comment on that assertion.

Scandal-tainted Tyco Name To Live On (FT)

By Francesco Guerrera And Christopher Bowe In New York

Financial Times, November 15, 2006

The scandal-tainted Tyco name will survive the company's planned break-up, following the decision by Tyco Electronics, one of US conglomerate's three main units, to retain the brand despite its association with recent corporate excesses.

The surprising move comes after Tyco Electronics concluded that the value placed on the name by customers and employees was more powerful than the memory of Dennis Kozlowski, the former head of Tyco who has been convicted of looting the company.

The decision - to be announced on Wednesday - runs counter to recent trends that have seen companies such as Phillip Morris and British Petroleum change names and logos, often at great expense, in an effort to refresh their image and break with the past.

Tyco International, the group's main division which sells fire and security systems, is also expected to retain its name after the conglomerate splits into three next year, leaving the healthcare business as the only one seeking a new name.

Mr Kozlowski's actions earned Tyco a place in the unholy trinity of companies that exemplified the US corporate scandals of the late 1990s alongside Enron and WolrdCom, at least in the eye of the press and the investing public.

Tyco has tried to resist this perception, pointing out that, unlike the other two companies, the $40bn-a-year conglomerate stayed in business and made a fresh start under new management.

The decision by Tyco Electronics, which has revenues of about $13bn a year from selling electronic components, to change its logo but not its name came after it asked an independent research company to canvass more than 10,000 employees and over 1,000 customers across the globe.

"I joined Tyco Electronics in January and if you'd asked me then I would have said there was a high chance of a change in name," said Tom Lynch, Tyco Electronics' chief executive. "But employees and customers told us that the value of the brand was much more than any of the things that went on".

The company said the perception of a scandal-tainted company was predominantly a US one and that employees and customers in the rest of the world, which accounts for the majority of Tyco Electronics' business, liked the brand.

The move by Tyco's new management, which conducted most of the brand analysis in-house, could also mark a swing in the balance of power on image matters away from outside consultants and towards corporate executives.

However, brand experts said that, in general, companies with a troubled past should grasp the chance to start with a clean slate.

"Brand awareness and customers' liking of a name make a very small contribution to customers' engagement and loyalty," said Robert Passikoff , president of New York-based Brand Keys. "The name may be known but it is known for a reason".

By keeping the Tyco name on the electronics unit, the group has preserved the company's connection with its roots. Tyco Laboratores was incorporated in 1962 and some of its earliest work was in electronics. For almost 30 years Tyco remained a relatively small unknown company in New Hampshire, until Mr Kozlowski became chief executive in 1992 and perhaps sullied the name forever.

He and Mark Swartz, his chief financial officer, were convicted in 2005 for theft and fraudulent gains of more than $600m. They are serving at least eight years in prison and must pay about $240m in restitution.

DOJ_NMG_0094698

Known as “deal-a-day Dennis,” Mr Kozlowski grew Tyco from its roots and $2bn in sales in 1990 to a conglomerate with $36bn in 2002, when he was indicted by New York City prosecutors for fraud and theft.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Abramoff Is To Begin Sentence Today (WP)

By Susan Schmidt, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

Jack Abramoff, the former lobbyist blamed for a corruption scandal that contributed to the Republican loss of Congress last week, is scheduled to report to federal prison today.

Abramoff, 47, will begin serving a sentence of five years and 10 months at a minimum-security prison camp in Cumberland, Md., for defrauding banks of $23 million in his purchase of a Florida casino cruise line six years ago.

Abramoff has also pleaded guilty in Washington to fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy to bribe public officials. He is to be sentenced in that case next year, after he completes his cooperation with the Justice Department's wide-ranging investigation of his dealings with officials in Congress and executive-branch agencies.

Once a powerhouse in the Republican effort to dominate K Street, Abramoff has become a symbol of lobbying greed and excess. Eight people have been convicted or have pleaded guilty in connection with his schemes, including former Ohio representative Robert W. Ney.

Abramoff could receive a prison term of more than nine years on the Washington conviction, but prosecutors are expected to recommend a lower sentence based on what they have said is his substantial assistance in the ongoing probe. They have also agreed to recommend that the sentences from the Washington and Miami cases be served concurrently.

People involved in the case who spoke on the condition of anonymity said that Abramoff was to be sent to Cumberland. The federal Bureau of Prisons declined to comment. The Cumberland facility contains a medium-security prison and a minimum-security prison camp, where 320 inmates with sentences of less than 10 years live in dormitories. Most inmates at the Cumberland facilities have been convicted of drug charges, according to the Bureau of Prisons.

White House political adviser Karl Rove has blamed the Republican defeat at the polls last week on the Abramoff scandal and other ethics allegations involving members of Congress. Rove said that of the 28 House seats Republicans lost, 10 were lost because of ethics scandals and six were lost because incumbents did not react quickly enough to the issue. The October congressional page scandal involving Republican congressman Mark Foley of Florida "revived all the stuff about Abramoff and added to it," Rove told The Washington Post in a recent interview.

Andrew Blum, a spokesman for Abramoff's lawyers, declined to discuss prison arrangements. "We are still working on the logistics of the Miami sentence and cannot provide any additional comment other than that," Blum said.

Abramoff's business partner in the Florida cruise line purchase, Adam Kidan, received the same sentence and reported to prison in New Jersey last month. He is expected to testify as a government witness early next year in the Florida state trial of three men accused in connection with the gangland-style murder of the man who sold them the cruise line, SunCruz Casinos.

Abramoff and Kidan admitted to conspiracy and wire fraud in preparing a counterfeit $23 million wire transfer to fraudulently obtain a $60 million loan.

Prosecutors say having star witness behind bars hurts corruption case

WASHINGTON – Jack Abramoff, the lobbyist known for lavishing politicians with football tickets or whisking them away on exotic golf junkets, takes on a new identity on Wednesday: federal inmate No. 27593-112.

Mr. Abramoff is to report to federal prison to begin serving a nearly six-year sentence for a fraudulent deal to buy a fleet of casino ships in Florida. He also is awaiting sentencing for corrupting government officials and their staff members.

If it were up to the Justice Department, Mr. Abramoff wouldn't be heading to prison – at least not yet. He could hold the key to a sweeping corruption case involving Congress and members of the Bush administration and their aides. And prosecutors said putting their star witness behind bars would impede the investigation.

But a federal judge in Miami refused to delay the sentence, meaning Mr. Abramoff's cooperation will have to continue from prison. Mr. Abramoff's lawyers had no comment.

DOJ_NMG_0094699

Mr. Abramoff was originally assigned to a federal prison in Pennsylvania about four hours from Washington. Prosecutors wanted him assigned to a prison in Cumberland, Md., about two hours away.

The Justice Department said the issue has been resolved and, though the Bureau of Prisons will not comment on where Mr. Abramoff will report, prison officials began making preparation for a crush of reporters outside the Cumberland prison.

Mr. Abramoff enjoyed access and influence across Capitol Hill, from his close ties to congressmen to his hundreds of contacts with White House officials. He kept his powerful friends flush with campaign cash, gifts and trips such as a $92,000 chartered jet to Scotland for a golf outing with Rep. Bob Ney, Bush administration official David Safavian and congressional aides.

Mr. Ney was convicted in the case when he admitted last month that he took official actions on behalf of Mr. Abramoff's clients in exchange for his gifts and campaign donations. Mr. Safavian was sentenced in October to 18 months in prison for lying to investigators about his ties to Mr. Abramoff.

The investigation had already ensnared Mr. Ney's former chief of staff and two aides to former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay.

Abramoff Set To Start Prison Term (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 14 — Jack Abramoff, the former lobbyist at the center of a major influence-peddling scandal, is scheduled to enter prison on Wednesday, over the protests of prosecutors who wanted him to remain free to cooperate in an investigation that has threatened to implicate several members of Congress.

Mr. Abramoff was sentenced in March to five years and 10 months after pleading guilty in Miami to fraud charges involving his purchase of a gambling cruise-ship line.

He is still awaiting sentencing in Washington on charges that he conspired to provide illegal gifts to lawmakers, including former Representative Bob Ney, Republican of Ohio. Mr. Ney is also facing prison after pleading guilty to corruption.

People with knowledge of the case, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Mr. Abramoff was expected to serve most of his sentence at a federal prison in Cumberland, Md., about 140 miles from Washington, which would allow prosecutors to continue their debriefings of him.

The Justice Department had wanted to delay Mr. Abramoff's confinement for at least several months, but Judge Paul Huck of Federal District Court refused.

Federal prosecutors say that the investigation of Mr. Abramoff's lobbying operation is far from over and that, since his plea bargain was announced last January, he has provided valuable evidence of potential wrongdoing by public officials.

Prosecutors have not identified other targets of the investigation. But the inquiry has created alarm on Capitol Hill and was a factor in the defeat in last week's elections of at least three Republican lawmakers who were portrayed by their Democratic opponents as close to Mr. Abramoff.

Mr. Ney is scheduled to be sentenced in January after acknowledging that he had accepted illegal gifts from Mr. Abramoff and his partners.

A former White House budget official, David Safavian, was sentenced last month to 18 months in prison for lying to federal investigators about his knowledge of Mr. Abramoff's lobbying work and the circumstances of the golfing trip. </NYT_TEXT>

Abramoff Reports To Prison Tomorrow; Offers Testimony On Democratic Senators (ABC)

By Brian Ross And Rhonda Schwartz

ABCNews, November 15, 2006

Convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff is scheduled to report to federal prison tomorrow, over the objections of federal prosecutors who say they still need his help to pursue leads on officials he allegedly bribed.

Sources close to the investigation say Abramoff has provided information on his dealings with and campaign contributions and gifts to "dozens of members of Congress and staff," including what Abramoff has reportedly described as "six to eight seriously corrupt Democratic senators."

The sources say Abramoff was about to provide information about Bush administration officials, including Karl Rove, "accepting things of value" from Abramoff.

Rove has denied any wrongdoing in his dealings with Abramoff. But the lobbyist visited the White House at least seven times, according to Secret Service logs obtained by Judicial Watch.

Abramoff has been meeting almost daily in secret locations around Washington with Justice Department investigators who are examining thousands of e-mails and documents, according to sources close to the investigation. The convicted lobbyist was spotted in downtown Washington, D.C., yesterday, carrying a computer laptop case.

But the prosecutors' easy access to Abramoff has now ended.

After granting several delays, the federal judge in Florida, who sentenced Abramoff to six years for fraud in a casino boat gambling scheme, has ordered him to report to prison tomorrow.

ABC News has learned that the court has granted a request from prosecutors that Abramoff be incarcerated at the closest prison to Washington, D.C., the Federal Correction Institute in Cumberland, Md., where Abramoff is expected to report tomorrow.

There are 37,000 lobbyist working in Washington D.C. they earn on average over 200k a year. Nancy Pelosi stated she was going to "drain the swamp" I have news for her. When you start draining the water, you are going to find things in the mud that you thought were long discarded. Some of these bad things were thrown in by the Republican's and other's were thrown in by the Democrat's. Good luck there, Nancy.

Just what this country needs at a time when Iraq is turning from worse to worst.

These people, Democrats or Republicans should come out clean and quit Congress! I would love to hear the names of these Senators.

While I am a Democrat, this act is inexcusable.

like the peeling of an smelly stinky onion, the more you peel the stronger the stink, the more the smell penetrates your senses until you cannot deal with it anymore. Politics is the onion and corrupt politicians are the layers. each layer/politician is as corrupt as the next. and these are the people that are in power run our country....you all should be ashamed of yourselves....smiley glad hands...it's that hand they offer out to people that is stabbing the moral fiber of america

Posted by: W.L. | Nov 14, 2006 5:19:14 PM

DOZENS of members of Congress? Amazing.

I think we, Americans should accept the fact that corruption cannot be stopped. Forget about this and talk about Iraq. The situation there is worse than Iraq.

Posted by: Dhwani | Nov 14, 2006 5:24:00 PM

I'm just wondering why someone who was so deep in with the republicans would have been bribing Dems too. I'm not saying it didn't happen, but it seems very convenient that after all this time, all these months (after the dems won new 6 senate seats) we're just now hearing that well, lo and behold there are 5-6 dirty dems. I'm just wondering, since Karl Rove couldn't fix the elections, maybe he found a way to fix the after effects.

Posted by: Doubtful | Nov 14, 2006 5:24:02 PM

Is anyone even remotely surprised that Democrats are just as crooked as their Republican counterparts? It has gotten to the point where the only thing a moderate voter can do is vote for term limits or vote against the incumbant - regardless of party affiliation. The longer they stay in power, the more corrupt they become. At least we can limit the damage by voting them out of office as soon as possible.

Posted by: Gary | Nov 14, 2006 5:24:45 PM

It isn't that interesting at all. Abramoff has been saying all along that democrats took bribes. In fact, Harry Reid took an enormous amount of money from him.

Posted by: truth | Nov 14, 2006 5:32:56 PM

Despite his wrong doings he was 'playing the game' and if he names names and pull them down, give him a medal! We pull stings for street criminals...lets get these fatcats up in DC!!!

Posted by: Bill | Nov 14, 2006 5:33:32 PM

Unfortunately, congress has no intention of policing its own ranks. Never has - never will. The only time this sort of stuff comes to the forefront is election season and the election is over.

When Ted Stevens made the threat of retirement if he didn't get his bridge to nowhere, the so-called honest gop members should have stood shoulder to shoulder and told him not to let the door hit him in the ass.

That told the whole story. These people have corruption in their dna. The only way to fix this is a total and complete housecleaning - including aides and staffers. Then start over. With draconian corruption statutes - enforced. As in: You get caught - you go to jail. You cover for a bud - you go to jail. Zero tolerance vs zero accountability.

Fat chance.

Until then, vote for the liar that promises you what you want to hear.

Posted by: george | Nov 14, 2006 5:35:07 PM

I love how some people are still trying to pin something on Rove. "Something of value"? THat doesn't matter. What does matter, is can they prove a link?

Does it occur to any of you that the reason he was more in bed with Republicans was because THEY WERE IN CHARGE? And he was in bed with some powerful Dems because they could block some things from committees and to hedge his bets.

If any are found guilty of taking bribes, they should be excommunicated from Congress. But any of you who think that just because of the numbers that the Republicans are any more corrupt are just deluding yourself. Let's see the corruption in the next 2 years. BOTH parties have corrupt individuals. Witness Jefferson from Louisiana with $97K in his freezer.

Something really needs to be done in order to bring morality and justice back to government. The people are suffering from this type of behavior. The laws are changed in the interest of self-serving politicians under the watchful eye of lobbyists. Lobbyists who serve the interests of Major Insurance Companies,Health Insurance Companies,and who knows what else."We the People" need to find a solution to dishonesty and corruption in the U.S.Government.

Thank You

Too much time is wasted year after year trying to deal with the corruption in D.C. Build some barracks for their living quarters, give them a desk and room dividers, put them on a budget, do background checks before they are allowed to run, set up rules of behavior, set their hours for them, disallow access from lobbyists, and take them ALL on a tour of the worst federal prisons in the area. Isn't it time the citizens took some control over this silliness? If they insist on acting like irresponsible children, treat them as such.

Posted by: Paul | Nov 14, 2006 5:56:53 PM

Huh, nary a word mentioning corrupt Republicans, only Dems. It would seem that ABC would have you believe that Abramoff is a Democrat problem, which is obviously laughable on it's face. Abramoff was a loyal Republican, working for DeLay and the Republican establishment- make no mistake about it. Republicans are way more tied up in this mess, as any competent investigator will show.

Not to excuse the Dems- if they're corrupt, toss 'em ALL out, D or R. And NO, I DON'T accept corruption as "just the way it is", thanks VERY much, and neither should you Dawahni.

anquish over our politicians and
the reality of life in Washington,
just forget about term limits, it
will never happen, just remember to limit their terms in office to 2 terms and vote them out regardless of whether you think their doing a good job....the lust for money in their pockets will eventually color their thinking
so out they go. If they were doing
a good job, let them run again and
vote them in.Do so whether they are Republicans or Democrats in the House or Senate.
We created this "monster" need of money and more money to get re-elected and the vultures out there know it, so let's wake up and smell the coffee....the ballot box
is your only option.

If a couple of Democratic Senators were indicted and convicted of bribery from the Abramoff scandal, do you think Harry Reid would push for their removal from the senate? Even, if it meant he would give his new postition as Majority leader in the Senate? This investigation is going nowhere. I would not be surprised in Abramoff found his "demise" by some con with a shank in the shower.

Posted by: mike jones | Nov 14, 2006 5:58:05 PM

Why the "Rush" to prison? I mean, if Abramoff can dish the goods on more corrupt politicians, why put him away where he won't be as effective? Abramoff has met with hundreds of people in Congress.Meeting with Abramoff by itself doesn't mean corruption, Dem or Rep. But if illegal gifts or bribery took place, the guilty parties should leave congress. We've got to be careful of a vindictive Abramoff who might lie to the FBI just to get less jail time.

Why do we just keep hearing accusations of democrats being involved but no one ever names them?

I don't believe this is bi-partisan at all. If there were democrats involved we'd know their names like we do with the Republicans. Its easy to say democrats were involved but it doesn't seem so easy to say exactly who they are.

Posted by: esther clark | Nov 14, 2006 6:12:16 PM

You think this is bs? You haven't seen it all yet. And realize there is more to come. When you finally do "get it", it will leave you shaking your heads. Ladies and gentlemen, it is going to be too late to do anything about it, even if you could do something.

Posted by: wbva | Nov 14, 2006 6:20:24 PM

Think about it, Doubtful: Abramoff "rewarded" Republicans; in most cases, they already agreed with him. But he "bribed" Democrats, who otherwise (presumably) would have opposed what he was selling. If you paid careful attention, the names of potential Democrat targets have been in the news. Their names have been downplayed by the media going into the election. But, watch: There will be at least three Democrat Senators whose "crimes" will match the ones that defeated Conrad Burns.

Posted by: John | Nov 14, 2006 6:21:29 PM

Look at Abramoff's staff. Some of Reid's top guys worked for Abramoff. The guy knew the system, and he played both sides. I'm betting at least two-three democratic senators are at least in as much hot water as Congressman Ney.

Posted by: wizbang | Nov 14, 2006 6:22:37 PM

Jack Abramoff has admitted in the past that he did not pay much attention to Democrats. Why should he have? The Democrats were not in power and could do nothing to help enrich him or his clients.

Someone has leaked this phony story for obvious reasons. Six to eight Democratic Senators? Give me a break. If there are corrupt Democratic Senators, please provide the evidence.

It sure don't seem to be the people.

Posted by: a | Nov 14, 2006 6:32:23 PM

DOUBTFUL, I think you have it backwards.I think the fact that the left-leaning media did not report this until after the election is the outrage. BTW, I agree that ALL of these crooks, Rep or Dem need to go to jail if convicted.

Posted by: LABDUDE2 | Nov 14, 2006 6:34:36 PM

My goodness, Democrats took bribes too?! Shocking. NOT.

They're all politicians. It is in the nature of what they do that they must lie and be dirty dealing behind the scenes in order to accomplish anything. The only way out is to find some way to structure our elections in a way that money is not a factor. If you don't have to raise money, you're not beholden to any donor of funds, lobby group, industry, union, eco group, or anyone else. You're only obligated to those you represent.

Unfortunately I don't think I've yet heard a good idea of how to go about getting to the point where you don't have to be rich or bent over taking cash in order to get into office.

Posted by: AVoter | Nov 14, 2006 6:40:22 PM

Of course Abramoff had to bribe Democrats. In fact, he probably had to bribe more Dems than Repubs. Since he was a Republican, most Repubs would be inclined to agree with his agenda and would not need to be bribed to go along with him. Democrats, on the other hand, would be opposed to what he wanted and would have to be bribed to go along.

Several Democrats in Congress are known to have accepted significant campaign contributions from entities associated with Abramoff. However Abramoff has been sentenced by a Florida state court so he would normally go to a Florida prison, which he almost certainly wants to avoid. If federal investigators can get Abramoff assigned to a federal prison instead, perhaps he will keep talking.

The recent exit polls where corruption was listed a top issue by voters must be encouraging to federal prosecutors, who are apparently in a public corruption unit where Attorney General Gonzalez has been unable to protect Congressional Republicans.

First, we ought to congratulate Mr.Ross and Ms Schwartz for impartiality. Too many times The Blotter has been accused of siding with the Democrats or the other way around.

Second, the posters so far have stayed off the partisan path-- only one has expressed some doubt as to the timing of Abramoff's disclosure and it is not hard to see why. But the fact that the vast majority here is for the need to clean up, regardless of political make up of the cesspool, deserves yet another slap on the back.

Third, my own opinion is that the corruption has to be stopped. The best way to do it is by a non partisan approach, indeed.

And let the chips fall as they may!

If America ever needed a united front, this is it. The next will come so much easier. Be it sorting the mess in Iraq or real fight against the other common enemy which is terrorism, or the urgently needed change in foreign policy, the start of cleaning up the American government is the right priority if all the other problems are to have a chance to be solved.

Posted by: Patriot | Nov 14, 2006 7:14:57 PM

Exactly right Gary. I stopped being an "either or" kinda guy a long time ago. Vote against the incumbant every time and try to keep the opportunity for graft to a minimum. I can't believe anyone being niave enough to actually believe that either side is any cleaner than the other. Most of a professional politicians time is spent trying to find the dirt on the other side and getting re-elected. Meanwhile, we keep going down the tubes. I guess thousands of years of history as to what has happened to every other great world "superpower" of it's time has taught us nothing.

C'mon folks. He was trying to secure casino rights for Indian Reservations. This was not a Republican/Democrat issue. Dems are just as dirty. I love the comment about Karl Rove masterminding the timing here. Dems have just about attributed anything and everything to Rove. If Jesus makes his return tomorrow, the Dems will swear that Rove arranged it so that Nancy Pelosi wouldn't have a chance to be Speaker.

I really like the comment about Nancy Pelosi draining the swamp. Bad things live in swamps! and they bite when confronted!

This DEM is glad to hear that possibly corrupt Dems will be exposed. Our party will be stronger by ridding ourselves of the corrupt swamp denizens.

Now is the time for Dems to be diligent in not letting Dems in power become corrupted. The biggest change after this election will be who the lobbyist target.

University Urged To Take Ney's Name Off Building (USAT)

By Dennis Cauchon

USA Today, November 15, 2006

First, Bob Ney lost his job as a congressman. Now, he's on his way to losing another classic political honor — having a building named after him.

Ney, a six-term Republican from Ohio, will be sentenced Jan. 7 for his role in providing favors to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Ohio University has begun the process of removing Ney's name from the Robert W. Ney Center for Health and Physical Education at its campus in St. Clairsville, near the West Virginia border.

The building was named after Ney in 1997 because, as a state senator, he helped secure the $5.5 million in state funding to construct it.

The building has a 3,300-seat gymnasium, a fitness center, bookstore and cafeteria. It's the meeting place on the small campus of 600 commuter students.

“We haven't heard a lot of talk, but what we've heard supports removing the name,” says Charles Bird, the vice president in charge of the university's regional campuses.

On Monday, a university advisory council of local leaders, headed by a judge, urged removing Ney's name.

Bird says the recommendation will be given to the university trustees at their meeting Dec. 1. A call and an e-mail to Ney's attorney were not returned.

James Harris, who lost to Ney in the Republican primary in May, has one word for erasing Ney's name: “Good.”

“I have no interest in kicking someone who is down for the count, but on this small matter, taking his name down and moving forward is understandable,” Harris says. “His corruption undercut the Republican message of restraining government spending.”

However, the fallen congressman gets some sympathy from an unlikely source: Gregory DiDonato, whom Ney narrowly defeated in his first congressional race in 1994.

“I'd be cautious about taking away the legitimate credit someone earned, by removing a name. He played a major role in the project. Nothing can undo that,” says DiDonato, who later became a Democratic leader in the Ohio Senate.

If the trustees decide to remove Ney's name, the task won't take long. “We'll take the letters out of the masonry and fill the holes,” says Ohio University architect Richard Shultz. “A new name will probably go up some day.”

Federal Panel Begins Hearings On Curbing Prison Rape (AP)

By Don Thompson, Associated Press

AP, November 15, 2006

FOLSOM – Thomas Clinton says he and six of the other 10 homosexuals in his cell block were raped in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0094707

National prison officials and experts on Tuesday said they have no idea if the 36-year-old Los Angeles man's experience is typical. They are only now beginning studies to see how widespread sexual assault and consensual sex are behind bars.

Spurred by a 2003 federal law, the U.S. Department of Justice's new Review Panel on Prison Rape began two days of hearings Tuesday at California's Folsom Prison to learn what the country's largest state prison system is doing about the problem.

It is the start of a monthslong national effort to find how many prison inmates are victims of sexual assault and how to deter the attacks.

“We don't know to what extent the problem exists,” the federal rape panel's chairman, Steve McFarland, said in an interview.

Reports of assaults “may be just the tip of the iceberg. We haven't a clue,” said McFarland, who also directs the Justice Department's Task Force for Faith-Based and Community Initiatives.

Congress, in passing the federal rape law, cited estimates that 13 percent of inmates are assaulted nationwide. The federal Bureau of Justice Statistics, in a 1997 survey, put the incidence at less than 1 percent.

California legislative researchers found 4.4 percent of California inmates reported assaults in 2000, compared to 4 percent in Florida, 2.5 percent in Texas, 2.3 percent in New York and 1.7 percent in federal penitentiaries. But reporting methods vary so widely that the figures are useless, McFarland said.

For Clinton, the assaults began soon after he was sent to prison in California on a drug charge in October 2003.

“I was stabbed and cut because a skinhead wanted me to 'service' a lifer (inmate serving a life sentence) for some cigarettes,” Clinton said in an interview before testifying under oath Tuesday.

He said he was attacked with a knife after he refused to perform the sex act.

Clinton said he was later raped by another inmate in a shower at an inmate firefighters' camp near Susanville in November 2004.

“'Maybe you deserve to be raped because you choose to be homosexual in prison.' I was told that many times by guards,” said Clinton, who has since been released and is suing the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation in federal court in Sacramento over his treatment.

But McFarland said California is at the national forefront of prison rape prevention efforts. A 2005 state law requires a statistical study of sexual coercion, along with training programs, posters, brochures and videos to raise awareness of the problem.

The federal Bureau of Justice Statistics is starting its own scientific sampling of inmates nationwide in state and federal prisons, county and city jails and juvenile facilities.

The goal of the federal survey is to identify, by July, the best and worst facilities as far as the number of rapes, as well as consensual sex among inmates and between inmates and employees.

The federal review panel will then examine what the prisons and jails are doing right and wrong to prevent rapes and discourage consensual sex, and make recommendations to an eight-member National Prison Rape Elimination Act Commission, said McFarland.

The commission will then recommend rape prevention policies to prisons nationwide.

Two MS-13 Members Are Convicted Of Racketeering (WP)

By Ruben Castaneda

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

In the first major victory for federal prosecutors in a sweeping legal assault on MS-13 in Maryland, a federal jury in Greenbelt yesterday convicted two members of the violent Latino street gang of criminal racketeering.

Edgar Alberto Ayala, known as "Pony," 29, and Oscar Ramos Velasquez, 21, known as "Casper," both Salvadoran immigrants, were found guilty of conspiracy to commit murder to further the racketeering enterprise.

The racketeering prosecution is part of an investigative and legal offensive begun by federal authorities last year against a gang that as recently as five years ago was little known outside law enforcement circles and the neighborhoods it operates in.

Locally, law enforcement officials have attributed dozens of homicides and nonfatal assaults in recent years to MS-13 members in suburban Maryland, Northern Virginia and, to a lesser extent, the District. Nationwide, federal officials have formed an MS-13 task force, which began operating last year out of FBI headquarters.

The jury's decision, reached during five days of deliberations, means that both men are eligible for a maximum possible sentence of life in prison without parole.

DOJ_NMG_0094708

The defendants were among 22 in Maryland charged more than a year ago under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act. The RICO indictment alleges that members of MS-13, a gang also known as Mara Salvatrucha, killed six people and attempted to kill four others between April 2003 and June 2005 in Prince George's and Montgomery counties.

Eight of the attacks were in Prince George's, and two were in Montgomery, in neighborhoods that hug the border between the counties. In addition, federal prosecutors presented evidence that Ayala participated in the fatal shooting of a Fairfax County teenager.

Ayala and Velasquez showed no emotion as the guilty verdicts were read.

Ayala's relatives and Gary A. Ticknor, his attorney, declined to comment. According to evidence presented by the government, Ayala was a leader of one of the local MS-13 cliques.

Velasquez's attorney, Richard C. Bittner, repeated a theme yesterday that he set forth in his opening and closing arguments -- that being a member of a violent gang does not make a person guilty of that group's actions.

"If the pope was in the Nazi youth, was he responsible for the Holocaust? No," Bittner said. "I haven't seen anyone say he [Velasquez] planned a murder, participated in a murder or was present when a murder occurred."

Maryland U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein said "chilling" evidence presented by federal prosecutors showed that MS-13 members live by the motto "kill, rape and control."

"We hope this conviction sends a message to them and their conspirators," Rosenstein said.

At least four onetime members of MS-13 testified for the government about the gang's inner workings and about attacks carried out by gang members.

One of the most important witnesses was Noe "Shorty" Cruz, a former MS-13 member who wore a wire to a handful of gang meetings and called his police handler to tip him off about planned attacks and the location of firearms in the homes of gang members.

Cruz agreed to become an informant after meeting with Prince George's police Detective Felipe Ordo?o, who is a member of a local-federal anti-gang task force. Cruz said he was disgruntled because the gang had killed one of his friends, who was also an MS-13 member, and because fellow gang members criticized him for not attending enough meetings.

For nearly three years, Cruz risked his life by gathering evidence against members, who, he testified, would have cut out his tongue and killed him if they had discovered his actions.

Cruz is now in the federal witness protection program and has been moved to another state. Rosenstein praised the work of county police in identifying gang members and persuading some to cooperate with the government. The investigation was led by agents with the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

Federal prosecutors presented evidence that MS-13, made up primarily of immigrants from El Salvador and other Latin American countries, is not just a typical street gang but an international criminal conspiracy.

For example, members in Maryland receive directions from MS-13 leaders in El Salvador, local MS-13 gang members pay dues at meetings, and some of that money is sent to gang leaders in El Salvador, according to government witnesses.

Before the trial began, three MS-13 gang members named in the indictment pleaded guilty to racketeering or related charges. Seventeen defendants await trial on racketeering charges.

U.S. District Judge Deborah K. Chasanow scheduled sentencing for Ayala and Velasquez for Feb. 23.

DOJ Allowed To Examine Some Jefferson Papers (RC)

By John Bresnahan And Tory Newmyer

Roll Call, November 15, 2006

With the corruption investigation of Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) stalled for the last several months by a legal battle, a federal appeals court on Tuesday ordered Jefferson's lawyers to begin turning over some documents to the Department of Justice.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit also set a briefing schedule for its review of whether the May 20 FBI raid on Jefferson's Capitol Hill office was constitutional.

The briefing schedule signals that Jefferson's legal challenge to the raid is likely to continue into next summer or even well into the fall, although legal experts believe that Tuesday's order by the court could provide the Justice Department with a "face-saving" means of indicting Jefferson before the appeals court issues a ruling.

It is still unlikely, however, that Jefferson will be indicted before the end of the year, according to legal experts — good news for the embattled incumbent who faces a tough slog in his Louisiana runoff election. Jefferson finished first in his New Orleans-based open primary but garnered only 30 percent of the vote in a field crowded with a dozen challengers.

Tuesday's order by the appeals court means that federal prosecutors finally can begin to review documents recovered during the nighttime raid, which have been sealed since late May. Justice Department officials will receive any documents over which Jefferson's team does not claim constitutional "Speech or Debate" privilege. Chief District Judge Thomas Hogan will continue to review the remaining documents.

Federal prosecutors originally were set to wait until Hogan had ruled on all the materials before they could review any of them, according to a July ruling by the same court. Jefferson's legal team has sought to block prosecutors from looking at the documents from the raid until the appeals court ruled on the propriety of the FBI search.

Nigerian Vice President Atiku Abubakar was charged last month with more than a dozen counts of corruption in the case for allegedly receiving more than $4.6 million in bribes to divert public money to private interests.

One of Jefferson's former aides and a Kentucky businessman — Vernon Jackson, chairman and CEO of iGate Inc. — have already received lengthy prison sentences for their roles in the scandal.

Jefferson has so far proclaimed his own innocence, although FBI agents last year videotaped him allegedly accepting $100,000 in marked bills from an informant. A search of Jefferson's home several days later reportedly turned up $90,000 of the marked cash in the lawmaker's freezer.

Court Order May Delay Jefferson Investigation (NOTP)

By Bruce Alpert And Bill Walsh, Washington bureau

New Orleans Times-Picayune, November 14, 2006

WASHINGTON —In an order that could delay the government's decision on whether to indict Rep. William Jefferson, a three-judge panel has put off until at least the spring a final decision on legal challenges to some documents taken in a historic raid of the congressman's Capitol Hill office last May.

While the U.S. Court of Appeals for Washington D.C., said that the Justice Department can immediately begin examining those documents and computer files not challenged by Jefferson and his attorneys, it is the disputed documents that are expected to be most critical to the government's 20-month probe into allegations of bribery and corruption. Jefferson has denied wrongdoing and has not been charged in the investigation that has netted guilty pleas from two of his former associates.

"I can't imagine that the (unchallenged) documents would yield anything of value to the government," said Carl Tobias, a constitutional law expert at the University of Richmond.

The ruling will likely force another delay in the case, which began in March 2005 and has stalled over the question of whether the search of the congressional office breached the separation between the executive and legislative branches.

Justice Department officials could decide that the additional delay in the investigation it hoped to wrap up shortly after its May 20-21 raid of Jefferson's office is unacceptable and move forward based on evidence it has already collected in the case. But that would make it harder for the agency to justify what was a highly controversial raid of Jefferson's office, drawing charges of overreach by the top Republican and Democrat in the House of Representatives.

Justice Department officials refused comment Tuesday on the Court of Appeals ruling by Judges David Sentielle, Karen Henderson and David Tatel. The three judges ordered that briefs in the case be filed between Feb. 28 and April 13, with oral arguments scheduled for sometime after the last brief is filed.

Robert Trout, Jefferson's attorney, said that the ruling reflects "the continuing respect by the judges for the importance of the speech or debate privilege and we appreciate that." The speech or debate clause was intended by the framers of the Constitution to promote the separation of powers between the three branches of the federal government by shielding lawmakers from harassment in the discharge of their duties.

Jefferson, who is seeking reelection in a Dec. 9 runoff against fellow Democrat Karen Carter, did not comment on the ruling.

Jonathan Turley, a constitutional law professor at George Washington University who has been critical of the raid of Jefferson's office, said that it "triggered an unnecessary constitutional crisis and served to delay any indictment to Jefferson's obvious advantage."

Although the Appeals Court panel said that the Justice Department can gain immediate access to the seized material not challenged by his lawyers, a process will still need to be worked out to accomplish that. By court order, Jefferson's lawyers have been raising objections to certain material in closed hearings before Chief U.S. District Court Judge Thomas Hogan.

No one outside of Jefferson's lawyers, Jefferson and Hogan know which material has been challenged, and what material has not been and therefore can be turned over to the Justice Department investigators.

Trout said that he won't stand in the way of turning over the material and will work out a process with the Justice Department. "We are in the process of complying with the court's order," he said.

John Harrison, a constitutional law expert at the University of Virginia, said that Jefferson's lawyers probably don't want to overplay their hands.

"Jefferson's lawyers will most strongly resist release of the documents that are most unfavorable to their client, but their argument is based on the Speech or Debate clause privilege including, I think, the claim that even going through documents to find those that aren't privileged is impermissible," he said.

The investigation of Jefferson began March 15, 2005, when an investor in a Western African technology project championed by Jefferson went to the FBI complaining that she may have been defrauded of a multimillion dollar investment. In July 2005, the government secretly recorded the witness, Lori Mody, giving Jefferson $100,000 that the congressman, according to the FBI, suggested would be used to bribe the vice president of Nigeria to advance the project. All but $10,000 of the cash was later found in the freezer of Jefferson's Washington, D.C. home.

The probe has netted guilty pleas from two former Jefferson associates, including Vernon Jackson, the head of iGate Inc., who said in court documents that he paid more $400,000 to a company controlled by Jefferson's family in return for the congressman's help getting telecommunications contracts in Nigeria and Ghana.

Mob Boss James "Whitey" Bulger Spotted In San Diego (KFMB)

KFMB-TV, November 15, 2006

The News 8 CrimeFighters are on a manhunt for a notorious Boston mob boss who was spotted in San Diego. James "Whitey" Bulger has a $1 million reward on his head.

He is one of the most high-profile fugitives in America, second only to Osama bin Laden on the FBI's 10 Most Wanted list.

Bulger is a master of disguise. His nickname "Whitey" comes from his long blonde hair when he was a kid.

On the run for the past 11 years, Bulger was spotted here in San Diego, catching a screening of the gangster movie "The Departed" at a theater in Horton Plaza. In the movie, Jack Nicholson's mob boss character is based on "Whitey" Bulger. The matinee was playing at the UA Theatres in Horton Plaza on Friday, October 6.

A law enforcement officer says he spotted Bulger in the crowd, and followed him to a trolley stop at Fifth Avenue and C Street downtown, before losing him. Sources confirm the FBI grabbed surveillance video from both the mall and the movie theater.

While the FBI says it's a non-credible sighting, sources who viewed the surveillance tape say one agent remarked out loud, "that's him" when the suspect appeared in the video.

The man was wearing a white fisherman's hat with a floppy rim, dark sunglasses and a windbreaker. Bulger is known to wear hats and sunglasses in public, and carries a knife at all times.

Over the years, he has been spotted in at least eight states, and 19 different countries. He's under indictment in Boston for 18 organized crime murders, possession of machine guns, extortion and money laundering. In March, prosecutors released a decades-old surveillance video of Bulger, hoping someone might recognize him.

Bulger served nine years in prison for robbing banks in the 1950s. For nearly 20 years, he operated as an FBI informant, feeding information to the feds on rival wise guys, while at the same time leading his own South Boston crime ring.

It was a Boston FBI agent who tipped Bulger off to the pending indictment against him in 1995. That agent was later sent to prison.

Bulger is believed to be hiding out with his longtime girlfriend, 55-year-old Catherine Greig. Both fugitives use fake names, enjoy playing with dogs, and may be living near the beach.

If you have seen Bulger, do not approach him. He is extremely dangerous. Call the San Diego FBI office at (858) 565-1255.

Agent Claims He Saw Whitey On Surveillance Tape (CBS4BOS)

CBS 4 Boston, November 15, 2006

(CBS4) BOSTON There is a new lead in the hunt for Whitey Bulger coming on the heels of the reports that he was seen in southern California.

An FBI agent believes he spotted the fugitive mob boss on surveillance tape.

Could it really be Bulger at the movies? Watching a movie with a Jack Nicholson character based on him -- an Irish mob boss from South Boston?

A sighting of this master of disguise was first reported at a movie theatre in San Diego where "The Departed" opened on October 6.

A police officer claims he spotted Bulger in the crowd and followed him to a nearby trolley stop before losing him.

Sources tell our San Diego affiliate that the FBI grabbed surveillance video from both the movie theatre and the surrounding mall and one agent remarked out loud "that's him" when the suspect appeared on the tape.

DOJ_NMG_0094711

The man was wearing a white fisherman's hat with a floppy rim, dark sunglasses and a windbreaker. Bulger is known to wear hats and sunglasses in public.

On the run for 11 years, Bulger has been spotted in at least eight states and 19 countries. Back in March, prosecutors released decades-old surveillance video of Bulger hoping to trigger someone's memory.

If he was able to catch a screening here, it seems he took a look in the mirror and is on the run again.

The FBI here in Boston isn't shedding any light on this new claim from a San Diego agent that it could, in fact, be Bulger.

They'll only say the Bulger investigation remains a high priority and they follow up on any and all leads.

Currently, there is a $1 million reward for Bulger's arrest. He's second only to Osama bin Laden on the FBI's ten most wanted list.

Report: Feds Seize 'Whitey' Theatre Tapes (BOSH)

Boston Herald, November 15, 2006

The FBI seized videotapes from the theater where an off-duty San Diego cop possibly spotted fugitive mob boss James "Whitey" Bulger exiting from after watching the Boston-based crime movie "The Departed," according to a news report.

On Oct. 8 or 9, an off-duty San Diego police officer, who sources say was originally from the Boston area, spotted the Bulger lookalike leaving a theater and boarding a trolley bound for the Mexican border, the Herald reported last week.

Yesterday, San Diego TV station KFMB reported the FBI had seized security tapes from the theater and the mall where the off-duty cop sighted the Bulger lookalike.

When agents viewed the tapes, the station reported that one exclaimed, "That's him," referring to a man wearing a fisherman's cap and sunglasses.

Bulger is wanted for 19 murders.

Gail Marcinkiewicz, spokeswoman for the Boston FBI office, which is leading the task force to hunt down Bulger, said last night she could not confirm that agents seized the tapes.

"I would assume that they would," she said.

April Langwell, spokeswoman for the FBI's San Diego's office, said earlier yesterday they have yet to confirm that Bulger was spotted leaving the cinema.

"It would be exciting to capture him, but for right now, it was just considered non-credible information," she said.

However, several sources have told the Herald the FBI is taking the sighting seriously.

Former Driving School Owner Sentenced For Bribing Officials (TENN)

By Christian Bottorff, Staff writer

The Tennessean, November 15, 2006

The former owner of a Murfreesboro driving school was sentenced to six years in prison for bribing employees of the Tennessee Department of Safety to help customers, federal prosecutors announced Tuesday.

The sentencing follows a guilty plea entered in July by Bryan Guess to three public corruption charges related to bribes he paid the Tennessee Department of Safety, according to a press release issued by the Office of the United States Attorney for the Middle District of Tennessee.

Guess had faced a maximum of 15 years in prison after pleading guilty in July. His arrest was part of Operation Crooked Highway, a multi-agency investigation that resulted in six people charged with bribery and conspiracy.

Guess was the former owner of Winchester Driving School, which was in the same building as the driver's examination center on Samsonite Boulevard.

In return for the bribes paid by Guess, state Department of Safety examiners provided favors such as helping Guess's customers pass written and vision tests required to obtain drivers' licenses and overlooking proof-of-residency documents, officials said.

Guess admitted the value of the driver's licenses and certificates his customers received exceeded $400,000. He forfeited more than $162,000 he earned as part of the scheme.

Guess pled guilty to one conspiracy count and two substantive counts of bribing public employees.

Manhattan: No Trace Of Missing Goya (NYT)

By Anthony Ramirez

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0094712

The F.B.I. yesterday said it had no updates on the theft of a painting by Goya that was being trucked to an exhibition opening on Friday at the Solomon R. Guggenheim Museum. On Monday, authorities said little about the theft of “Children with a Cart,” painted in 1778. Jerri Williams, a special agent and spokeswoman for the F.B.I.’s Philadelphia office, elaborated yesterday by saying the painting was found to be missing near Scranton, Pa., on Nov. 9 while the truck was unattended. “The people who were transporting it stopped for a break,” she said, “and the painting was taken from the vehicle.” Anyone with information was urged to call the F.B.I. at (215) 418-4000.

Million Dollar Goya Painting Stolen While 'Unattended' (BLOTTER)

ABC News’ The Blotter, November 15, 2006

A million dollar masterpiece being transported to New York's Guggenheim art museum was stolen in transit, when the artwork was "left unattended" in the transport vehicle somewhere in the Scranton, Pa., area last week, FBI officials tell ABC News.

The insurer has offered a $50,000 reward for information leading to the recovery of the painting by the Spanish artist Goya, "Children with a Cart," which was being sent from the Toledo Museum of Art to New York's Guggenheim Museum for a special art exhibit set to open this Friday.

"It appears that the person or persons involved knew what they were doing," a FBI spokesperson told ABC News. But the spokesperson added, "There is no reason to believe the people transporting the artwork were involved."

A statement issued by the Guggenheim Museum said the painting "was in the care of a professional art transport provider."

The Philadelphia FBI office is leading the investigation and asks that persons with information regarding the painting contact them directly at (215) 418-4000.

FBI Says 1778 Goya Was Stolen (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 15, 2006

Federal officials yesterday asked the public's help finding a valuable painting and the thieves who stole it as it was traveling through Pennsylvania.

The 1778 painting - Children with a Cart by Francisco José de Goya y Lucientes - was taken while in the care of a professional art transport provider last week. At the time, the painting was traveling through the Scranton area en route from Toledo, Ohio, to New York, according to an FBI statement issued yesterday.

The insurer of the painting is offering a reward of up to $50,000 for information leading to the recovery of the painting, the FBI said.

Anyone with information on the painting is asked to contact the Philadelphia Division of the FBI at 215-418-4000 or another FBI office.

The Baby Godfather (NYDN)

By John Marzulli, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, November 15, 2006

The Bonanno crime family has tapped a man of steel to rebuild its crumbling empire, the Daily News has learned.

He's Salvatore (Sal the Ironworker) Montagna, the newly minted boss of the Mafia family, according to law enforcement sources - and he's practically a bambino at only 35 years of age.

The Sicilian-born Montagna and his wife, Francesca, own a small ironworks company in Brooklyn, but they show no signs of living the high-life of a Mafia don.

The couple and their three daughters live in a modest ranch house in working-class Elmont, L.I., not far from the Queens border.

"Putting someone that young and relatively unknown in charge indicates that they're desperately seeking to salvage the remnants of the family from the recent prosecutions and convictions," said Mark Feldman, former chief of organized crime for the Brooklyn U.S. attorney's office.

Feldman said the move clearly "signals desperation" on the part of a mob family that has seen three bosses and acting dons bite the dust in three years.

Most noteworthy was the conviction of longtime family boss Joseph Massino, who is now serving life in prison.

Last night, a teenage girl answered the door of Montagna's vinyl-sided home on Oakley Ave. and said the reputed crime kingpin was not at home.

Two little sisters stood at her side. Outside, a small construction crew was wrapping up its day working on Montagna's brick driveway.

DOJ_NMG_0094713

A short time later, Francesca Montagna drove up in a late-model Lexus SUV and turned angry when asked if her husband was the new head of the Bonanno family.

"I don't know what you're talking about," said the dark- haired woman, dressed in a sweatsuit. "I have kids in here. It's not appropriate for you to be here."

Until now, Montagna has rarely appeared on the radar of the NYPD and the feds, and neighbors said they knew nothing about any reputed mob ties. Still, the Mafia talk didn't worry them.

"Am I scared?" said one local. "Absolutely not. I come from Brooklyn. Believe me, when you live next to one of these people, there's nothing to be afraid of."

Another neighbor found the suggestion "ridiculous," but quickly added, "We'd be shocked and scared at the same time if that is true. Wow!"

The Montagnas run the family-owned Matrix Steel Co. on Bogart St. in Brooklyn. According to Dun & Bradstreet, the firm supplies structural material for builders and reported a modest $1.5 million in sales last year.

In 2003, Montagna pleaded guilty to criminal contempt charges and was sentenced to probation for refusing to answer questions before a Manhattan grand jury.

He had been indicted a year earlier after a probe by the Manhattan district attorney's office as one of 20 wiseguys charged in a takedown of a Mafia crew allegedly involved in gambling, loansharking and weapons possession.

Whether the new Bonanno boss has any other arrests was unclear yesterday.

"He's well-liked by the rank and file," said an underworld source, adding that Montagna is also known as Sal the Zip, a reference to the name bestowed on members of the crime family's Sicilian wing.

Sources said Montagna was close to legendary Bonanno gangster Baldassare (Baldo) Amato, another immigrant from near Castellammare del Golfo in Sicily, and served in the crew of capo Patrick (Patty from the Bronx) DeFilippo.

Those guys are largely history now, with Amato recently sentenced to life in prison and DeFilippo facing a retrial on murder charges.

Led by Assistant U.S. Attorney Greg Andres, the feds have indicted and convicted more than 70 Bonanno gangsters since 2002, leaving behind about 75 shell-shocked members on the street. Sources said Montagna's promotion couldn't have happened without the blessing of Vincent (Vinny Gorgeous) Basciano, who once operated Hello Gorgeous, a hair salon in the Bronx, and became the official boss of the crime family after Massino turned rat.

Thomas Reppetto, author of the just-published "Bringing Down The Mob: A War Against the American Mafia (Henry Holt)," said the new breed of boss pales in comparison to past godfathers like the late John Gotti or Vincent Gigante.

"There may no longer be a boss in the sense that we understood the term, an all-powerful figure at the top, because naming an official boss provides the FBI with a clear target," Reppetto said.

JHU Student's Killer Gets Life Term (BSUN)

By Julie Bykowicz And Dan Thanh Dang

The Baltimore Sun, November 15, 2006

The high school dropout and transient Baltimore restaurant worker ingratiated himself into a social circle of Johns Hopkins students. But all the while, he was honing his burglary skills near the prestigious university, lifting little things, such as music play ers, coins and even food from the students' refrigerators.

It was late Jan. 22, 2005, when Donta Maurice Allen broke into the Charles Village apartment that Linda Trinh shared with two other women, a botched burglary that, prosecutors said Tuesday, led to Allen's choking and beating Trinh and leaving her face down in her bathtub.

Allen, 28, pleaded guilty Tuesday in Baltimore Circuit Court to first-degree murder, securing a life sentence with the possibility of parole. He is to be sentenced in January.

Until Tuesday, which was to be the first day of trial, city prosecutors had sought life without the possibility of parole.

Trinh's parents, Vietnamese immigrants, said after the hearing that they were thankful to avoid a trial. They said the plea spares them what would have been a daily, heart-heavy journey from their home in Silver Spring to Baltimore to file into the courthouse.

"We thank God that we didn't have a trial," said Hoan Thi Trinh, Linda's mother. "It would kill us a little more every day to hear the details."

More than a dozen of Trinh's relatives and friends sat silently Tuesday on the courtroom benches. When Trinh's father saw Allen, for the first time, he felt neither hate nor forgiveness, he said later.

Allen is remorseful, his lawyer said.

DOJ_NMG_0094714

During and after the court hearing, the prosecutor and defense attorney gave the first in-depth explanation of how and why the promising student, a 21-year-old biomedical engineering major with dozens of friends, died.

Allen didn't think anyone was home that January night, one of the final days of winter break, but there was Trinh, wearing only a T-shirt and bra, said defense attorney Warren A. Brown.

He tried to assure the terrified woman that he wasn't there to sexually assault her, Brown said.

Allen knew Trinh. He was dating one of her sorority sisters, who lived one floor above Trinh in The Charles, a high-rise in the 3300 block of N. Charles St. occupied mostly by students.

Clutching her roommate's cell phone, Trinh said she was going to call the police. Allen tried to dissuade her, but she kept threatening to make the call, Brown said.

Their "argument soon escalated to a physical confrontation," Assistant State's Attorney Matthew Fraling said in court. He began to hit her, and she scratched him on the left side of his neck.

He beat her and choked her with his hands, Fraling said. She was left in two inches of standing water in the bathtub. The cell phone was there, too.

According to the medical examiner's report, there were signs that Trinh might have been alive when she went into the tub. There was no evidence of sexual assault, the report says.

Neither Fraling nor Brown elaborated on how the bathtub fitted in to the crime scene, or whether Allen had tried to stage a suicide or accident.

"I don't want to get into the gory details," Brown said.

Another mystery of the crime scene was the timing of a maintenance worker's visit to Trinh's apartment that night.

Smelling natural gas, other residents had summoned maintenance. Fraling said a worker arrived at the apartment about 10 p.m. He found the gas of the stove on but the pilot lights out, Fraling said. He also found a candle burning on the stovetop, Fraling said.

He did not find Trinh, who by then was dead. One of her roommates found her body the next day.

Crucial clues

When Allen left the apartment, he took several purses, Fraling said. But he behind crucial clues. Security tapes show Allen in the building, and skin cells under Trinh's fingernails contained Allen's DNA, Fraling said.

Allen was arrested and charged in March 2005, and he gave police a taped statement admitting that he was in Trinh's apartment on the night of her death.

In court Tuesday, Allen, tall, lanky and closely shaven, showed no outward emotion, though he was escorted out briefly after saying he felt ill.

Brown said his client is "racked with guilt. He did not intend for this to happen."

Allen, Brown said, had been pilfering from the apartments of Trinh and other students "only when he knew people weren't there."

Allen grew up in Cherry Hill, but his family moved frequently. He attended Perry Hall High School but dropped out in 1998. He later earned a General Education Development diploma. At one point, he has said, he was hospitalized after attempting suicide.

In the months before Trinh was killed, Allen worked in bars and restaurants near the Hopkins campus. Students befriended him, but some called him "Mr. Sketchy" behind his back.

Allen pleaded guilty because he felt remorse, Brown said, and because "he doesn't want to die in jail. The plea will allow him to one day come home."

Under state law, Allen's life sentence means he will be eligible for parole in about 11 1/2 years, said Thomas Pennewell, program manager for hearings with the state parole commission.

Before obtaining parole, an inmate must convince a majority of the 10 parole commissioners and the governor that he is fit to return to society, Pennewell said.

The release of any inmate serving a life sentence is subject to the governor's approval. Gov. Parris N. Glendening had a no-parole policy for lifers, and Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. has paroled them rarely.

It was unclear why city prosecutors abandoned their plan to pursue life without parole for Allen. Noting the January sentencing hearing, neither Fraling nor Deputy State's Attorney Cynthia Jones would comment.

Brown said prosecutors might have wanted to avoid "a circus." Brown, known for courtroom showmanship and a fiery delivery, said he would have raised issues of class and town-gown tension during a trial.

Trinh's was one of two homicides in less than a year near the Hopkins campus of 4,000 undergraduates.

Early one morning in April 2004, Christopher B. Elser, 20, a junior from South Carolina, was stabbed to death in an apartment building on the southwest corner of St. Paul and 30th streets. Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity rented that building.

DOJ_NMG_0094715

Police have never made an arrest in that case, though they have said the apparent motive was burglary.

Security bolstered

Hopkins has beefed up security in Charles Village since those killings.

In addition to increased foot patrols by campus security and off-duty police officers, the university has installed 88 closed-circuit television cameras on and around campus, officials said.

The university thinks the increased security has deterred crime. "But it's impossible to say whether that kind of presence would have made any difference in either of these cases," said Hopkins spokesman Dennis O'Shea.

A former president of her Alpha Phi sorority, Trinh was active socially and academically.

She spent time in Hanoi and Ho Chi Minh City, Vietnam, studying breast-cancer detection and AIDS. Moved by her work with orphaned AIDS children, whom she taught English and took to the beach, Trinh decided on a career in finding cures for devastating diseases.

The last couple of years have been hard on the Trinh family. Every day since Linda was buried, the family has visited the Roman Catholic church near their home to pray for strength and that their pain will pass.

On Sundays, they visit her grave and pray that her soul rests in peace.

"We've lost Linda," said Quy Van Minh, Linda's father. "But we carry her in our hearts forever."

Linda's older brother, Quang Minh Trinh, did not attend Tuesday's hearing.

"There were two," Quy said. "Brother and sister. And now there is one. He cannot bear it. He does not want to be reminded of how she died."

As the family gathered to drive back home, Quy and Hoan discussed Allen's life sentence and thought about what they will say at the sentencing hearing, scheduled for Jan. 8.

"Whether he gets 10 years, 50 years or 100 years, it will not bring Linda back," Quy said. "When we saw him for the first time today, we felt nothing. We did not feel hate. We did not feel anger or forgiveness. We don't know how to feel.

"We just know that we will support whatever the justice system decides to do. We will not ask for more time or for less. We just want it to be fair."

'This Is Not A Cold Case,' F.B.I. Says 5 Years After Prosecutor's Killing (NYT)

By Jessica Kowal

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

SEATTLE, Nov. 14 — A failed polygraph test by a gun collector. Handwriting samples from a chief suspect. A daughter's plea for the public's help. These three strands have breathed new life into the stalled five-year investigation of a federal prosecutor's killing here.

The prosecutor, Thomas C. Wales, 49, an assistant United States attorney, was shot to death on Oct. 11, 2001, as he sat typing at his computer in his basement. Someone standing in Mr. Wales's secluded backyard fired through a window, hitting him in the neck and torso, investigators have said. A neighbor told reporters at the time that she had seen a man stride from the scene, climb into his car and speed away.

No one has been charged with the crime, which the authorities say appears to have been premeditated because of its precision and the paltry evidence left behind. If Mr. Wales was murdered in retaliation for his work, he would be the first federal prosecutor killed in the line of duty.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation, which has offered a $1 million reward for information leading to a conviction, says it has interviewed about 4,000 people and followed 10,000 leads in 50 states and several Eastern European countries.

But there was a strong sense in Seattle that the case was stuck. The authorities used the fifth anniversary of the shooting to raise the profile of the investigation and even urged Mr. Wales's son and daughter to ask the public for help in solving the crime.

"I wholly encourage anyone who has information to come forward, to be brave, and to provide a measure of justice to the system," his daughter, Amy Wales, said in a recent interview in a coffee shop near her father's house. At 27, she looks prematurely worn by what she calls his "shattering" death.

Robert Geeslin, the F.B.I. agent who is supervising the investigation, said, "This is not a cold case."

Forensic tests conducted soon after the killing identified the weapon as an inexpensive semiautomatic Makarov handgun, one of millions produced in Soviet-bloc countries and China, Agent Geeslin said. The gun had been refitted with an American-made stainless-steel replacement barrel, one of 3,600 sold in the United States.

Since then, the F.B.I. has focused on its "Makarov project," a search for these silver-colored barrels. The bureau has located about 1,800 of them, Agent Geeslin said.

DOJ_NMG_0094716

One person on the Makarov list is a gun collector, Albert Kwan, who lives in a Seattle suburb, Bellevue. Mr. Kwan's lawyer, Joseph Conte of Washington, D.C., said that the F.B.I. apparently thought Mr. Kwan bought two gun barrels a decade ago, but that Mr. Kwan remembered buying only one. Mr. Kwan's collection of several hundred weapons includes eight Makarov pistols, Mr. Conte said.

In September, the United States Attorney's office here indicted Mr. Kwan on one count of illegal possession of a machine gun. Mr. Conte said the agency told him that it would consider dropping the charge if Mr. Kwan testified before a grand jury investigating Mr. Wales's killing and passed a polygraph test.

Mr. Kwan took the polygraph last week, his lawyer said, adding that the government told him his client had failed two questions, whether he bought two gun barrels and where the second one is.

"My interpretation is that he didn't give the government the answers they wanted," Mr. Conte said.

Before the polygraph, F.B.I. officials did not characterize Mr. Kwan as someone who was likely to provide a major break in the case. This week, the F.B.I. would not comment about Mr. Kwan or the polygraph results. Bill Redkey, an assistant United States attorney here, said Mr. Kwan was likely to go to trial on the machine-gun charge in March.

Mr. Conte said the F.B.I. erroneously thought Mr. Kwan might have provided a gun barrel to a chief suspect, a commercial airline pilot. Mr. Wales indicted the pilot and three business partners on conspiracy and fraud charges in 2000.

In 2001, the government dismissed the charges against the pilot and his partners after their company pleaded guilty to federal criminal violations related to the sale of a military helicopter and paid a fine.

Soon after, the pilot sued the government to recoup his legal fees, saying he was the victim of a "bad faith" prosecution. Four months later, Mr. Wales was killed. The pilot's lawsuit was ultimately dismissed.

The F.B.I. will not discuss the pilot. His lawyer, Larry Setchell, however, has said the F.B.I. had searched his client's homes and vehicles and confiscated clothing and shoes.

Mr. Setchell confirmed a report that first appeared in The Seattle Post-Intelligencer, that the pilot had agreed to provide handwriting samples to prove he was not the author of a mysterious letter related to the killing. In the letter, sent last January from Las Vegas to the F.B.I.'s downtown Seattle office, someone using the name "Gidget" claimed to have been hired by a "nice talking lady" to kill Mr. Wales.

Mr. Setchell has compared the pilot to Richard Jewell, the security guard whom the F.B.I. erroneously accused of setting off a bomb at the Atlanta Olympics in 1996.

Candidate Elected As Sheriff Despite Facing Rape Charges (NYT)

By New York Times Regional Newspapers

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

COLUMBUS, N.C., Nov. 13 — A campaign for sheriff usually focuses on who would be the best candidate to fight crime. In Polk County, N.C., voters have elected a new sheriff who faces charges of raping two girls more than 15 years ago.

The winner, Chris Abril, was until recently the police chief here in Columbus, a small town about 80 miles west of Charlotte and the seat of Polk County.

Mr. Abril, who defeated Sheriff David Satterfield on Tuesday, has been on nondisciplinary suspension with pay since his arrest on Aug. 28 on charges that he committed two rapes, one in 1988 and the other in 1989. The victims, according to court papers, were two Polk County girls, ages 10 and 12.

Mr. Abril, 45, was charged with five counts of first-degree statutory rape and one count of first-degree sexual offense and was released after posting a $100,000 bond. He said the charges were politically motivated.

"I am not capable of committing these crimes," Mr. Abril, a Democrat, said at a rally of his political supporters shortly after his release. "To my prosecutors, if this is not politically motivated, give me a trial in Superior Court so I can clear my name prior to the election."

Mr. Abril said later that he had been a suspect in a single rape in the late 1980s but that no evidence existed to charge him. Somehow, he said, a second alleged victim surfaced in March, but he said he had no information beyond that.

Court papers do not say why the charges were brought a decade and a half after the rapes are said to have occurred.

Jeff Hunt, a Republican and the district attorney for the area that includes Polk County, said in a statement that the office of the state attorney general, Roy Cooper, a Democrat, sought indictments against Mr. Abril after the North Carolina Bureau of Investigation began looking into the rape allegations on March 29.

But a spokesman for the Department of Justice, Noelle Talley, said Mr. Hunt requested the investigation. She would not say why.

Sheriff Satterfield, a Republican who was first elected eight years ago, has refused to comment about his defeat or about the charges against Mr. Abril, other than to say that he had nothing to do with the investigation.

Mr. Abril beat Mr. Satterfield, a state trooper for 30 years, 54 percent to 46 percent. There were 7,556 votes cast, a 53 percent turnout, which locals officials said was higher than in previous elections.

Mr. Abril's swearing-in as sheriff is scheduled for Dec. 4. Exactly one month later he is to appear for a hearing in the rape case in Superior Court here, at which time a trial date is to be set.

CIVIL LAW:

Cheney Asks Judge To Toss CIA Leak Suit (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Vice President Dick Cheney asked a federal judge Tuesday to dismiss a lawsuit brought against him by a former CIA operative who says the White House leaked her identity to the press.

Cheney's attorneys criticized the lawsuit in court papers, saying it invented constitutional rights, intruded on national security discussions and came two years after the statute of limitations had expired.

Former CIA operative Valerie Plame Wilson claims that she was outed as retribution for her husband's criticism of the administration's prewar intelligence on Iraq.

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald spent years investigating who revealed her identity to syndicated columnist Robert Novak in 2003 but nobody was charged with the leak. Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, who faces trial in January on perjury and obstruction, is the only person charged in the case.

Wilson's civil lawsuit is continuing alongside Libby's criminal case. In seeking to dismiss the case, Cheney said Wilson doesn't have any grounds to bring the suit and, even if she did, the vice president is shielded from civil suits.

The suit centers on conversations between Cheney and Libby about Plame's job at the CIA.

"Plaintiffs invite the judicial branch to permit intrusive discovery into those communications and to discern which among them might be, as a matter of tort law, wrongful and which not," Cheney's attorneys wrote. "Such an inquiry cannot be squared with basic separation of powers principles."

The Justice Department also weighed in on behalf of Cheney and other Bush administration officials including presidential adviser Karl Rove. In briefs, the agency said government officials are shielded from civil lawsuits and that Wilson has not shown that a constitutional right was violated.

Omnicare Settles Generic Drug Suit For $49.5 Million (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Andrew Harris

Bloomberg, November 15, 2006

Nov. 14 (Bloomberg) -- Omnicare Inc., the largest provider of pharmacy services to U.S. nursing homes, agreed to pay $49.5 million to settle claims by the U.S. government and 42 states that it overcharged them for drugs provided to senior citizens.

Omnicare substituted more expensive forms of generic versions of drugs including Zantac, an antacid, and Prozac, an antidepressant, to evade price limits for Medicaid reimbursement, said Michael Behn, a Chicago plaintiffs' attorney. The U.S. joined the false claims act suit after it was filed.

``The health care industry should be wary of manipulating federal and state programs in this manner," Chicago U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald said today in a statement.

The settlement includes a ``corporate integrity agreement" requiring training and oversight at Covington, Kentucky-based Omnicare, the company said in a statement. The amount of the accord has been ``fully reserved," said Omnicare, which didn't admit any wrongdoing as part of the accord.

``This was the first case targeting generic drug switching under the false claims act to help protect both patients and taxpayers," Behn said. The company said patient safety ``was never an issue."

Omnicare's profit fell 11 percent in the third quarter, hurt by lower insurance payments from UnitedHealth Group Inc., the company said Oct. 31.

Tablets to Capsules

Omnicare defrauded the government by changing prescriptions for a popular antacid from tablets to capsules in order to inflate government reimbursements by as much as 400 percent, according to the lawsuit filed five years ago by Behn on behalf of Illinois pharmacist Bernard Lisitza.

While popularly prescribed tablet-forms of Ranitidine, a generic form of Zantac, are subject to federal price reimbursement limits, the capsule forms aren't, Behn said.

DOJ_NMG_0094718

Omnicare was also accused in the complaint of swapping more expensive forms of two other drugs: Fluoxetine, a generic version of Prozac, and Buspirone, the generic version of the ant-anxiety medication Buspar. Some of the swaps were made without the knowledge of the patients' doctors, the Justice Department said.

``Those switches increased the price substantially while adding no medical benefit and violating federal and state regulations," Fitzgerald said in a statement.

Lisitza worked for nine years as an Omnicare pharmacist in DesPlaines, Illinois, Behn said.

`They Fired Him'

``He couldn't fill prescriptions with the drug that was prescribed," the lawyer said. ``After he complained, they fired him."

Behn filed suit in 2001. David Kammerer, Omnicare's former director of Medicaid reimbursement, later filed his own suit.

Lisitza will receive $6.4 million and Kammerer will get $792,593 as their shares of the state and federal settlements, the Justice Department said.

Kammerer's lawyer, Charles Atkins of Cincinnati, didn't immediately return a call seeking comment.

The U.S. government will receive $29.6 million, of which $19.8 million will be allocated to the states participating in the settlement. Medicaid is a joint federal-state program that provides health care benefits for low-income and disabled people.

Participating states included Florida, Illinois, North Carolina, Ohio and Massachusetts.

43 Cents

In the third quarter, Omnicare's net income declined to $52.2 million, or 43 cents a share, compared with $58.5 million, or 54 cents, a year earlier, the company said. Sales rose 9.5 percent to $1.59 billion.

The company reduced its earnings forecast for the fourth quarter because of the lower insurance payments and problems at a drug repacking plant in Toledo, Ohio. Omnicare said UnitedHealth cut payments for providing drug benefits to the elderly under the U.S. Medicare program. The action cost $19.7 million in sales and operating profit, the company said. Omnicare sued UnitedHealth over the cuts.

Omnicare shares rose 34 cents to $38.65 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

The cases are U.S. ex. rel. Lisitza v. Omnicare, 01cv7433 and U.S. ex. rel. Kammerer v. Omnicare, 04cv2074, in the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division (Chicago).

U.S. Attorney General Says No Region Immune To Human Trafficking (AP)

By Carolyn Thompson

AP, November 15, 2006

BUFFALO, N.Y. - Citing a farm labor contractor who withheld wages from upstate workers and used threats to keep them in line, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced Tuesday the creation of a human trafficking task force in western New York.

"Human trafficking is a violation of the human body, mind and spirit," Gonzales said during a stop which also included a helicopter tour of U.S.-Canadian border crossings.

Buffalo was among 10 cities to receive funding last month to focus on anti-trafficking efforts. Nationally, 32 such task forces already exist.

Federal officials pointed to the arrest of Maria Garcia and several family members in Albion, Orleans County, as proof no region is immune to the problem. Garcia pleaded guilty in December 2004 to a forced labor charge following an investigation that began when some Mexican workers she recruited to upstate farms escaped her control and sought help.

Prosecutors said the workers were charged up to $1,800 for a van ride from Arizona and had money deducted from their pay for rent, food, electricity and rides to the fields. They were told they could not leave crowded housing units unless their debts were paid.

"They had lost all liberties," said Terrance Flynn, U.S. attorney for New York's Western District.

The task force, with nearly $900,000 in federal funding, will train law enforcement agencies to spot potential trafficking victims and organizations and focus resources on prosecutions.

Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Customs and Border Protection, the FBI and U.S. Department of Labor will work with local agencies and the state police. Law enforcement will also team up with organizations that deal with the immigrant community, such as the International Institute of Buffalo and Farmworkers' Legal Services.

Gonzales said the government has increased its focus on human trafficking in recent years. In fiscal 2006, 79 people were convicted in federal cases, more than twice the number in the previous year.

"We know that we must work together to fight human trafficking, and we must intensify our efforts," Gonzales said. "Because right now the victims of these criminals are out there. They are suffering and they are waiting for our help."

Western New York is particularly attractive to traffickers, he said, because of its ethnic diversity, numerous farms and use of migrant labor.

Garcia was sentenced last year to 46 months in prison. Her son Elias Botello, who pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit forced labor, was sentenced to 37 months. Another son, Jose J. Garcia, received a 14-month term for alien harboring and her husband, Jose I. Garcia, was given one year of probation on the same charge.

A.G. Gonzales Visits Buffalo To Talk Cross-Border Crime (WIVB)

WIVB-TV, News 4, Buffalo, NY, November 15, 2006

(Buffalo, NY, November 14, 2006) - - U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez made his first official visit to Buffalo Tuesday, and Senior Correspondent Rich Newberg reports America's top law enforcer is launching a new task force to combat human trafficking across the U.S.-Canadian border.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said, "Human trafficking is a violation of the human body, mind and spirit."

Gonzales came to Buffalo to announce $900,000 in funding to crack down on human trafficking, for everything from prostitution to forced labor on farms.

Gonzales said, "Right now, the victims of these criminals are out there. They are suffering, and they are waiting for our help."

Buffalo and the region are susceptible because of border crossings and the large number of seasonal workers who come here.

Last year, Maria Garcia was prosecuted for exploiting Mexican migrants she brought to Albion.

U.S. Attorney Terrance Flynn said, "Wages were being taken from them. They were living and working in deplorable conditions. They had lost all liberties when they entered this country under that circumstance."

There may be all sorts of similar situations in our communities we're not aware of, according to Erie County Sheriff Tim Howard.

Howard said, "Their passports have been seized. They're being forced by certain unscrupulous individuals to engage in different types of labor, sometimes illegal acts like prostitution, against their will."

Pamela Kefi of the International Institute of Buffalo said, "Even domestic servitude can be an issue in a community like ours, where somebody may bring somebody from another country and force them to stay in the home and care for their children and take care of their home without a salary, without freedom to move around."

The International Institute of Buffalo will assist victims of human trafficking.

Justice Department To Investigate L.A. County Youth Camps (LAT)

By Susannah Rosenblatt, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 15, 2006

The U.S. Justice Department plans an investigation into conditions at L.A. County juvenile facilities, authorities say.

The U.S. Justice Department plans to investigate dangerous conditions at Los Angeles County probation camps for teens, county officials said Tuesday.

The probe, announced to the Board of Supervisors last week, comes after years of federal scrutiny of county juvenile halls, and could lead to a lawsuit or consent decree, officials say.

Although details of the investigation, expected to begin early next year, remained confidential, Supervisor Gloria Molina alluded to problems with use of force and restraints of inmates during Tuesday's supervisors meeting.

"You don't pop somebody in the face just because you had a bad day," Molina said of probation officers. She described the pending investigation as "very troubling" and expressed surprise at the Justice Department's planned oversight. "I was sort of shocked by it because I thought we had been doing better."

Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson confirmed plans to investigate probation camps but declined to disclose specifics.

The Probation Department, which houses about 4,000 teenagers across the county on any given day, has grappled with growing violence among inmates. Youthful offenders stay for short periods in the county's three juvenile halls while their cases are adjudicated; convicted teens serve their sentences in 19 rural probation camps scattered across the region.

A 2003 Justice Department report criticized the halls for substandard medical and mental-health care, poor sanitation, overuse of pepper spray and dangerous conditions. The facilities also lacked adequate educational, social and religious opportunities, and had no effective way for minors to air grievances, federal officials found.

Many of the 66 required changes have been made, including increasing staff in the juvenile halls by about 20%, but stemming physical conflicts remains a challenge, said David Grkinich, a Probation Department director. "It's tough to predict behavior," he said.

There were 2,630 youth-on-youth fights in the camps last year, with between 2,300 and 2,600 projected for this year, according to department statistics. In the juvenile halls, there were 2,738 fights last year, and 1,702 altercations through August of this year. Although none of the confrontations, which are difficult to track accurately, resulted in fatalities, one youth was paralyzed and another lost an eye during attacks at the Sylmar facility earlier this year.

The federal inquiry is expected to be similar to the previous one, said David Davies, Probation Department chief deputy.

"They just want to make sure that the children, the minors are getting the services they should be getting," Davies said.

Presiding Juvenile Court Judge Michael Nash said, "I don't think anybody is satisfied with how the juvenile justice system at this time performs."

A county study released earlier this year found the Probation Department lacking in mental-health support, compiling data on youth inmates, education and aid to teens' families.

Supervisors postponed until next week a decision on a sole-source $865,000 contract for an outside consultant to aid with juvenile justice reform. Supervisor Zev Yaroslavsky cast the lone dissenting vote, urging immediate approval.

"Our system was failing," Yaroslavsky said, calling board members "oblivious" to the probation system's woes.

"This is one consent decree I may welcome," Yaroslavsky said. "I don't know what it takes to get our attention."

Police Look Into Use Of Force Shown In Videos (USAT)

By William M. Welch

USA Today, November 15, 2006

LOS ANGELES — Video of officers using force in two separate arrests have put a new spotlight on this city's police department, 15 years after the Rodney King beating case ignited riots.

In the latest case, the video shot by a witness in a public area at Venice Beach appears to show an officer using pepper spray on a handcuffed man who had been placed in the back of a patrol car.

The incident happened in February 2005 but just came to light in a report Tuesday by the Los Angeles Times. It said the officer has since resigned.

Los Angeles Police Chief William Bratton said in a news conference Tuesday that prosecutors investigated the pepper spray case and concluded officers did not use excessive force but that an administrative review is continuing.

He said a judge found no excessive force was used in the other recent videotaped case, in which police appeared to strike a suspect who was on the ground after a foot chase in Hollywood. It is also the object of an internal investigation.

“Finders of fact have determined they are lawful,” Bratton said of police actions in the unrelated cases. “The reality is, LA police officers show great restraint.”

Connie Rice, a civil rights lawyer, says she turned the latest videotape over to police. “The LAPD has a very long history of having a reputation for use of excessive force in low-income communities,” she says. “Its history weighs it down.”

Rice says, however, that the city's police have come a long way in restraining uses of force since 1991, when the videotaped beating of King after a motor vehicle stop led to charges against four officers. The officers' acquittals touched off riots.

Rice said she gave the latest tape to police officials because she was confident the department would investigate itself — evidence in itself, she said, of an improvement in sensitivity to such issues by the department.

“When they saw the pepper spray tape, they were livid,” she said.

The latest report comes days after another tape was distributed on the YouTube video website that appears to show an officer hitting a man in the face after a foot chase Aug. 11.

Prosecutors dropped charges of resisting arrest and battery on a police officer after viewing the tape of the pepper spray case, the newspaper said. Bratton identified the defendant as Benjamin Barker.

John Raphling, an attorney for Barker, said his client was not threatening police.

“It's an act of violence against a person who's sitting there helpless,” Raphling told KABC-TV.

Latest Video Brings More Controversy To Los Angeles Police (NYT)

LOS ANGELES, Nov. 14 — Less than a week after video of a city police officer punching a prone man in the face began circulating on the Internet, a tape of a man being pepper-sprayed by officers was generating more controversy.

Critics called the tapes the latest evidence of police brutality, but Chief William J. Bratton pointed to rulings that were sympathetic to the officers involved in both incidents.

The episodes are under investigation by the Los Angeles Police Department. The F.B.I. is also investigating the punching incident for possible civil rights violations.

Department policy allows officers to use nonlethal force when a suspect is uncooperative, Chief Bratton said.

The pepper-spraying incident, in February 2005, was first disclosed by the Los Angeles Times on Tuesday.

An investigation by the Los Angeles district attorney's office concluded that the suspect, Benjamin Barker, spat at Officer David Guiterman twice after being placed in a police car and that the spray was a reasonable reaction.

The video of the punching on Aug. 11 shows the suspect, William Cardenas, on his back while Officer Alexander Schlegel straddles his torso and Officer Patrick Farrell punches Mr. Cardenas in the face at least five times.

At a hearing in September, a court commissioner found that Mr. Cardenas used force to resist arrest and that the officers' response was "more than reasonable."

Video Spurs Bratton To Weigh Review Of Pepper-spray Policy (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 15, 2006

Bratton says he may order a review in light of the taped Venice arrest. The ACLU and some police watchdog groups call for a reexamination.

LAPD Chief William J. Bratton said Tuesday that he was concerned when he saw a videotape showing an officer using pepper spray on a handcuffed suspect in the back of a patrol car and that he is considering a review of the policy governing when officers can use the spray.

Bratton said the tape, shot in 2005 on the Venice boardwalk and made public Monday, concerned him enough when he saw it last year that he immediately removed the officers involved from active duty pending an internal investigation. The officer who used the pepper spray has left the department, but an investigation is continuing, Bratton said.

The chief said the videotaped incident "may look awful," but he added that the Los Angeles County district attorney's office found no crime committed by the three officers involved in the Venice Beach arrest in their treatment of the suspect.

Still, Bratton said his own administrative decision on whether they complied with department policy is still days away.

The chief said he was uneasy that the officer shut the door of the patrol car, leaving the handcuffed suspect alone inside, after administering the pepper spray.

The closing of the door "was one of the reasons I had concern," Bratton said.

"My interest there is: Was that pepper spray used to control the behavior of that individual or was it used punitively?" he said.

"If in my judgment the individual ceased to be a threat to the officer and other tactics could have been used, then I could conceivably find the officer out of policy. That whole case really comes down to that issue. And also the closing of the door."

Bratton's comments come as some police watchdog groups and the American Civil Liberties Union called Tuesday on the LAPD to reexamine when officers can use pepper spray, particularly if suspects are handcuffed. Current rules allow the spray to be used whenever a suspect is "combative," but some say that definition is far too broad.

"It's appalling," Catherine Lhamon, an attorney for the ACLU of Southern California, said of the Venice incident. "There is no question that spitting on an officer does not merit pepper-spraying someone when they are handcuffed in the back of a patrol car."

Bratton said he is considering an examination of when officers should use the spray.

"This would not be too onerous a burden for the department to engage in that review," he said.

Members of the Los Angeles Police Commission, meanwhile, ordered the inspector general to launch an assessment of how the LAPD handled the Venice incident.

"It is a disturbing tape," Police Commissioner Andrea Sheridan Ordin said. "I ask that these matters be given the highest priority so we can assure ourselves and the public about what has occurred."

Ordin said the evaluation by Inspector General Andre Birotte Jr. might raise questions about the policy allowing officers wide discretion in the use of pepper spray on handcuffed suspects if they are judged to be combative. But she and others said it was premature to consider policy changes yet.

The videotape was played for The Times on Monday by an attorney who represented the defendant, identified in police reports as Benjamin Barker.

DOJ_NMG_0094722

Barker, a transient, was arrested after getting into a scuffle with a merchant on the boardwalk.

He pleaded guilty to misdemeanor battery on the shopkeeper.

The videotape shows Barker in handcuffs as he is bent over a patrol car. As the officer pushes him into the car, Barker can be heard saying, "Why am I going to jail?"

Once Barker is in the back seat, he starts shouting: "I can't breathe! I can't breathe! Don't spray me!"

One officer is heard saying: "He knows what's happening."

Another officer takes a pepper-spray canister from his belt, shakes it and leans in to apply it to Barker's face.

The officer closes the doors of the patrol car and steps back. Barker is seen holding his face up to the car window, his features contorted in pain.

The district attorney's investigation looked at whether there was enough evidence to show that the officers had committed a crime against Barker. The LAPD inquiry is looking at whether the officers violated department policies.

The closing memo from the district attorney, released Tuesday by Bratton, said the officer and two colleagues "did not use excessive force" and instead "showed remarkable restraint and demonstrated professional courtesy toward Barker despite his belligerent, threatening and combative behavior."

The officers involved told authorities that Barker spat on one of them and was threatening to spit again when he was pepper-sprayed.

Bratton acknowledged discrepancies between the police reports and the videotape.

Two officers said in initial reports that the spitting and use of pepper spray occurred outside the car, but the video shows that the pepper spray was used in the car.

The district attorney's office dismissed the disparity, which was corrected in a follow-up police report, as "a product of mistaken recollection and not intentional misstatements of material fact," the closing memo said.

The Venice incident comes as the LAPD and FBI have begun investigations into another videotape showing a police officer hitting a suspect in the face several times at the end of a foot chase in Hollywood.

Police union President Bob Baker issued a statement Tuesday urging the public to be understanding of the job that officers face.

"Asking officers to refrain from using approved tools or techniques in their arrests is akin to telling the soldiers in Iraq to just reason with the insurgents," Baker said. "Perhaps the activists would like to talk to the families of the LAPD officers who have been maimed or killed when some thug who was resisting arrest decided to shoot the arresting officer because he didn't feel like going to jail that day."

Councilman Bernard C. Parks was among those who called on the commission to deal more effectively with the latest allegations of excessive force.

Parks, a former police chief, said the LAPD has, for more than a year, ignored his warnings about "the ongoing discipline problem" in the department.

"Now, after last week's release of the videotaped LAPD beating of William Cardenas, we are left to try to close the barn door after the horses have already left," Parks wrote. "In trying to find a resolution to the problem that we knew existed more than a year ago, I again ask the commission to get to the bottom of the issue."

Parks said the commission should look at complaints and dispositions from the five years before Bratton became chief compared with those from the time since Bratton has headed the department, arguing that a "relatively low number of employees" have been disciplined in the last three years.

The councilman also called on the commission to reconsider the policy of concealing officers' identities in reports on officer-involved shootings and Boards of Rights investigations.

"The decision to shut the public out of these two processes goes against preserving the idea of transparency at the department," Parks wrote.

Later in the day, the head of the council's Public Safety Committee called a public hearing for Monday to examine whether a proposal to install video cameras in police cars might provide the public with better information on controversial incidents than it gets from bystanders using camera phones.

"In light of these YouTube beatings, the public needs to know there is a public policy solution here, which is rapidly installing video cameras in cop cars," said Councilman Jack Weiss, the chairman.

Even if the car cameras do not capture video of an incident, microphones that pick up sound several hundred feet away might capture audio that can put a use-of-force incident into context, Weiss said.

He added that the images in the latest videotapes may be disturbing but that he trusts the LAPD to fully investigate any use of force and that some force may be justified.

"I don't know where people got the idea that you could ever have a Police Department without violence," Weiss said.

Officers In Suspect-Beating Video Investigated (KCAL)

KCAL-TV, November 15, 2006

(CBS) LOS ANGELES The Los Angeles Police Commission called Tuesday for a speedy and thorough investigation into the conduct of two officers caught on videotape holding down and repeatedly punching a man, 23, during an arrest in Hollywood.

The LAPD and FBI have launched investigations into the circumstances of the Aug. 11 arrest, when Officer Alexander Schlegel held down William Cardenas as Officer Patrick Farrell placed his knee on the man's neck and punched his face six times near the intersection of Gordon Street and Fountain Avenue.

The video of the arrest was posted on the popular YouTube Web site. "I would just encourage all parties who are involved ... that it be treated with the utmost speed," Police Commissioner Andrea Ordin, who served on the Christopher Commission that investigated the LAPD in the wake of the 1991 Rodney King beating said.

"It is clearly something the public is interested in and is entitled to have information (about)," Ordin said. "Sometimes that means shifting our priorities so that we can get that information out."

Andre Birotte, the commission's inspector general, said he is reviewing the case daily.

The LAPD has launched criminal and administrative investigations of the officers, who have been assigned to desk duty.

Additionally, the FBI opened a preliminary inquiry into the arrest last Thursday, in response to media coverage of the video. The inquiry results will be forwarded to the U.S. Justice Department, which will determine whether further investigations are required, according to FBI spokeswoman Laura Eimiller.

"It shouldn't have to be said that we know the department wants and we want a full, complete, accurate, fair investigation on a timely basis," Commissioner Alan Skobin said.

Cardenas remains in custody on $40,000 bail. Charges of receiving stolen property, which were tied to an arrest warrant against Cardenas, were dropped due to insufficient evidence, but he still faces two felony counts of resisting arrest, according to his attorney B. Kwaku Duren.

Cardenas is due back in court Nov. 20. Trial is scheduled for Nov. 27, Duren said.

Judge Says Inmate Death Was 'Torture' (NYT)

By Libby Sander

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

CHICAGO, Nov. 14 — Shackled to a concrete slab, Timothy Joe Souders spent the final days of his life naked and lying in his own urine, sweating through temperatures over 100 degrees in an isolated prison cell.

Mr. Souders, a 21-year-old with a history of severe mental illness, died Aug. 6 after spending four days in a segregation cell at the Southern Michigan Correctional Facility in Jackson. His death prompted state prison officials to revise their restraint policies for unruly prisoners, limiting the use of "top of the bed" restraints to a maximum of six hours.

But this week, a federal judge in Kalamazoo said those revisions were not sufficient. Scolding corrections officials for failing to provide adequate treatment to mentally ill inmates, the judge said on Monday that the conditions leading to Mr. Souders's death constituted "torture."

"You are not coat racks who collect government paychecks while your work is taken to the sexton for burial," wrote Richard A. Enslen, a senior federal district judge. "If a patient does not receive necessary medical or psychological services, including medicines and specialty care, it is not his problem, it is your problem."

Medical experts cited in Monday's ruling have speculated that Mr. Souders died of dehydration, though an autopsy report has not been completed.

Judge Enslen ordered an immediate ban on punitive restraints in three Jackson prison facilities holding roughly 4,500 inmates. The court has been monitoring those facilities as part of a 1985 consent decree.

Russell L. Marlan, a spokesman for the Michigan Department of Corrections, said the department disagreed with the ruling and planned to appeal. Top of the bed restraints, he said, are "nationally accepted, effective practices in correctional populations. We think the changes we've made in regard to these restraints are what is necessary."

Mr. Souders, who suffered from depression and psychosis and had previously tried to hang himself at a county jail, was serving a sentence for shoplifting, said Paul W. Broschay, who is representing Mr. Souders's estate in a federal wrongful death lawsuit against the Department of Corrections. At the time of his death, he was taking at least six medications for mental disorders.

DOJ_NMG_0094724

On July 31, Mr. Souders was transferred to the segregated cell for disobeying orders. Three days later, after slipping out of soft restraints, Mr. Souders was restrained atop the concrete bed slab. Though Mr. Souders had been scheduled for a transfer to a mental health facility after a social worker found him "floridly psychotic," the transfer never happened, and on Aug. 6, he was pronounced dead. A court-appointed doctor visiting the prison on Aug. 7 learned of Mr. Souders's death. The doctor, Robert L. Cohen, wrote in an Aug. 14 letter to Judge Enslen: "No psychiatrist was consulted. No emergency psychiatric evaluation was obtained." He concluded that Mr. Souders's death "was predictable and preventable."

Monday's ruling is believed to be the first ban on punitive restraints in state prisons, said Elizabeth Alexander, director of the National Prison Project of the American Civil Liberties Union.

"This really is a precedent-setting decision," Ms. Alexander said.

Officials Clash Over Mentally Ill In Florida Jails (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

MIAMI, Nov. 14 — For years, circuit judges here have ordered state officials to obey Florida law and promptly transfer severely mentally ill inmates from jails to state hospitals. But with few hospital beds available, Gov. Jeb Bush's administration began flouting those court orders in August.

Now, in a growing standoff between the government of Florida and its judges, the state is being threatened with steep daily fines if it does not comply. And at least one judge has raised the possibility that the secretary of the Florida Department of Children and Families could go to jail for contempt of court.

"This type of arrogant activity cannot be tolerated in an orderly society," Judge Crockett Farnell of Pinellas-Pasco Circuit Court wrote in an Oct. 11 ruling.

State law requires that inmates found incompetent to stand trial be moved from county jails to psychiatric hospitals within 15 days of the state's receiving the commitment orders. Florida has broken that law for years, provoking some public defenders to seek court orders forcing swift compliance.

With the state now rebuffing even those orders, a rising number of mentally ill inmates, now more than 300, have been left without treatment in crowded jails because the state's 1,416 psychiatric beds are full.

Two mentally ill inmates in the Escambia County Jail in Pensacola died over the last year and a half after being subdued by guards, according to news reports. And in the Pinellas County Jail in Clearwater, a schizophrenic inmate gouged out his eye after waiting weeks for a hospital bed, his lawyer said.

Public defenders in Miami-Dade County describe psychotic clients who have hallucinated, mutilated themselves and attempted suicide while awaiting transfer to hospitals. The state says that shortages of beds and financing have made compliance impossible, and that court orders forcing the transfer of certain inmates are unfair to those who have waited longer.

Most judges have responded skeptically, asking why the Department of Children and Families has not sought more state money as the number of committed inmates has soared. The agency cut its budget by $53 million this year, which public defenders say makes no sense given the inmate crisis and the state's $8 billion budget surplus.

In one of the toughest rulings to date on the subject, Judge Farnell said last month that he would start fining the department $1,000 a day for each mentally ill inmate who stayed in the Pinellas County Jail longer than 15 days. The judge, based in Clearwater, expressed outrage about the agency's "conscious decision" to ignore court orders.

Judges in Broward, Hillsborough and Miami-Dade Counties are also weighing motions to force the department to comply with the law or to hold it in contempt for letting the mentally ill pile up in unsuitable jails. The department appealed after three state judges in Miami ordered it to take custody of several inmates last month, but a panel of the Third District Court of Appeal indicated last week that it might rule against the department and its secretary, Lucy D. Hadi.

"It strikes me that ultimately you've got contempt issues," Judge Frank A. Shepherd said during oral arguments, "and Ms. Hadi may be going to jail."

The problem is not unique to Florida, although it is especially severe in Miami-Dade County, which has one of the nation's largest percentages of mentally ill residents, according to the National Alliance for the Mentally Ill, an advocacy group.

A Justice Department study released in September found that 64 percent of inmates in county jails around the nation reported mental health problems within the last year. Many are arrested for petty crimes, advocates say, yet remain in jail an inordinately long time because there is nowhere else for them to go.

Only 40,000 beds remain in state psychiatric hospitals around the nation, down from 69,000 in 1995. Advocates for the mentally ill say that community-based treatment programs, which were supposed to replace psychiatric hospitals after the deinstitutionalization movement of the '60s and '70s, have not begun to make up for the loss.

DOJ_NMG_0094725

Long waits for beds are especially common in the nation's urban areas. Last week, 307 mentally ill inmates were waiting for one of Florida's 1,416 psychiatric beds, and 72 percent had waited longer than 15 days. The state has three psychiatric hospitals with secure beds.

"This is a national problem, and it's a direct reflection of the lack of adequate beds and coordination between the criminal justice and mental health systems," said Ronald S. Honberg, legal director of the National Alliance for the Mentally Ill.

In Miami, an average of 25 to 40 acutely psychotic people live in a unit of the main county jail that a lawyer for Human Rights Watch, Jennifer Daskal, described as squalid after visiting last month. Seventeen such inmates are currently waiting for state hospital beds, said Valerie Jonas, a county public defender, adding that the number has been as high as 30 in recent weeks.

Ms. Daskal said that some of the unit's 14 "suicide cells" — dim, bare and designed for one inmate — were holding two or three at a time, and that the inmates were kept in their cells 24 hours a day except to shower. None of the mentally ill inmates receive group or individual therapy, she said in an affidavit.

Officials with the Department of Children and Families have argued that the agency cannot be held in contempt when it simply has no more beds, and that it could not have anticipated this year's sharp rise in commitments. In June 2005, they said, only 125 inmates were waiting for hospital beds, of which 38 percent had waited longer than 15 days.

"We are at the moment on a daily basis trying to find a short-term solution to the bed shortage," said Al Zimmerman, a spokesman for the department. "We are trying to find ways to pay for additional space, pay for additional beds."

The department requested and received money for about two dozen new secure beds this year, and it has asked for 38 next year. Each bed costs $100,000 a year, Mr. Zimmerman said.

Ms. Jonas, the public defender, said it was unconscionable that the department would not ask for more. "Given they've got a wait list of over 300 and they're running all over the state claiming inability to comply," she said, "where do they get off requesting only 38 new beds?"

Yet Mr. Honberg said that putting more mentally ill inmates in state hospitals should not be the ultimate goal. The treatment they get there often skims the surface, he said, and many end up deteriorating when they return to jail, only to end up on the wait list for a hospital bed again.

"You have large numbers of people sent to state hospitals not for therapeutic purposes, but for purposes of making them competent to proceed to trial," Mr. Honberg said. "We're not going to solve these problems until we invest adequate resources into services that work for people before they get to jail."

ANTITRUST:

Regulators Clear Purchase Of BMG Music (AP)

By Alex Veiga, AP Business Writer

AP, November 15, 2006

The Federal Trade Commission and the Justice Department gave antitrust approval Tuesday to Universal Music Group's planned acquisition of BMG Music Publishing for $2.09 billion.

The deal must now receive approval from European regulators to become final.

BMG - owned by German media company Bertelsmann AG - owns the rights to more than a million songs by contemporary recording artists such as Nelly, Maroon 5 and Coldplay, as well as classic hits by the Beach Boys, Barry Manilow and other entertainers.

Universal Music Group is a unit of Paris-based Vivendi SA. Its publishing arm controls the rights to songs by artists such as 50 Cent, Mary J. Blige and Chamillionaire.

If approved, the deal would combine the No. 3 and No. 4 music publishing catalogs.

"We were confident that the regulatory authorities would find that the acquisition did not raise competition concerns, and we appreciate that the Justice Department promptly reached the same conclusion," Universal Music Group said in a prepared statement.

European Union regulators said earlier this month they would issue a ruling on the deal by Dec. 8.

Unlike the recording business, which sells CDs and other products to be sold at retail, music publishers make money by licensing songs for use in movies, TV shows, CDs, video games, ringtones and other media.

The companies also collect performance fees when songs are played on the radio or in public venues such as clubs.

Some analysts have warned that EU regulators are likely to scrutinize the deal, in part because of an EU court ruling in July that overturned the European Commission's go-ahead for the merger that created Sony BMG Music Entertainment.

That 2004 deal, which reduced the number of major recording companies from five to four, is being re-examined.

NAR Changes Controversial MLS Policy (INMAN)

By Glenn Roberts Jr.

Inman News, November 15, 2006

Policy limits some MLS restrictions on public display of listings

NEW ORLEANS -- Responding to antitrust actions and investigations by the U.S. Justice Department and Federal Trade Commission over multiple listing service restrictions for a category of property listings, directors for the National Association of Realtors approved policy changes that allow individual MLS participants to decide whether to implement restrictions on the Internet display of property listings.

Laurie Janik, general counsel for the Realtors group, has said that the change is legally significant in that individuals are making decisions rather than MLSs, which represent a group of real estate industry participants. The issue is unrelated to the Justice Department's antitrust lawsuit filed last year against the association over other policies for online property listings display.

Under the policy change approved Monday at the group's annual real estate conference, MLS participants may select listings they choose to forward for display -- or not forward -- to Web sites that are part of a broker-supported cooperative property listing system based on "objective criteria."

This criteria, according to the approved policy, can be based on factors such as geography, or location, list price, property type, cooperative compensation offered by listing brokers, type of listing (such as properties under "exclusive right to sell" or "exclusive agency" listing contracts), or "the level of service provided by the listing firm," according to language in the approved policy.

The FTC and Justice Department had engaged in 15 investigations over MLS policies that block exclusive agency property listings from public display on the Realtor.com and some other public-facing property-search sites, such as those MLS participants' sites that are part of the broker-sharing system known as Internet Data Exchange or IDX. Exclusive agency listings are contracts in which sellers are not obligated to pay the listing broker in a real estate transaction if the seller finds a buyer for the property without any assistance from the listing broker.

The FTC has announced a series of consent agreements with MLSs that settle some of the investigations over the exclusive agency restrictions, and also has announced complaints against two MLSs in Michigan that refused to change their policies. The FTC has also said that other investigations are ongoing.

"Selection of listings to be displayed on an IDX site must be independently made by each participant," according to the policy adopted by the Realtor group's directors. The policy adopted by the directors also states that MLSs must, if requested by a participant, "provide basic downloading of all current listings and may not exclude any listings from the information which can be downloaded or displayed under IDX except those listings for which a participant has withheld consent."

Janik had said in earlier meetings at the Realtors conference that there is no guarantee that the federal agencies will not take action against the revised policy, though she said that there were greater risks in leaving the policy intact.

The association's board of directors also approved the removal of a section in the policy that stated, "MLSs may, as a matter of local option, limit information which can be downloaded and/or otherwise displayed under IDX to properties listed on an exclusive right to sell basis." Exclusive right to sell listing agreements, unlike exclusive agency listing agreements, require sellers to pay the listing broker regardless of who locates a buyer for the property.

The federal agencies have charged that exclusive agency agreements are more likely to be used by alternative real estate business models, such as discount or limited-service business models.

Realtor-association directors also adopted a change to MLS that gives MLSs the option to block its transmission of property listings to some public Web sites if the street address or location of the property is displayed to the public and if "a 'for sale by owner' or other sign or notice is displayed on the property telling the public the seller is soliciting direct contacts from potential buyers."

According to a description of the proposed policy, it "establishes that MLSs are not required to transmit participants' listings to third-party aggregators or to operate publicly accessible MLS Web sites."

Also during the meeting, Realtor directors approved several new standards of practice for its 1.3 million members. One of the new standards provides that Realtors are obligated "to present a true picture in their advertising and representations to the public," including the use of Web URLs and domain names that they use.

This standard prohibits Realtors from "engaging in deceptive or unauthorized framing of real estate brokerage Web sites," "manipulating (e.g. presenting content developed by others) listing content in any way that produces a deceptive or misleading result," or "deceptively using meta-tags, keywords or other devices/methods to direct, drive or divert Internet traffic, or to otherwise mislead consumers."

Another change in standards approved by the directors provides that Realtors have a duty "to not knowingly or recklessly repeat, retransmit or republish false or misleading statements made by others. This duty applies whether false or misleading statements are repeated in person, in writing, by technological means or by any other means."

Directors clashed over an unrelated proposal related to local Realtor associations that adopt alternative business names other than their formal, established names. An association committee's work group recommended a policy change providing that all associations using these "DBAs" would be required to submit an application for approval by the Realtor group, and requiring these DBAs to comply with the same policies governing the formal names of associations.

The basis for the policy change, according to the work group, was that some DBAs could be "deceptively similar" to formal names already established by other Realtor associations and could mislead people about the geographic coverage area of that association. After some debate and the defeat of a proposed amendment that would have eliminated the retroactive nature of the proposal, a majority of directors approved the change.

Judge Denies New York's Quick Bid To Block Insurance Merger (AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 15, 2006

NEW YORK -- A judge on Tuesday refused a city request to immediately stop the merger of two nonprofit insurance companies that provide coverage to city workers because it violates antitrust laws.

U.S. District Judge Kenneth M. Karas said he did not believe the city would suffer irreparable harm if he permitted the merger to go forward Wednesday while he takes a longer look at the facts of the case and the legal history of similar mergers.

In a statement made after the hearing, city lawyer Michael Cardozo said the city would look for other health care providers "who can offer comparable _ but less expensive _ health care benefits."

On Monday, the city filed a lawsuit to block the pending merger of Group Health Inc. and the HIP Health Plan of New York, saying the union would create a virtual monopoly in the public service health care sector.

The merger, which has been approved by the Department of Justice and state insurance regulators, would control more than 90 percent of the city's municipal health care market and 100 percent of the low-cost market, the city said in a release.

It asked the judge to issue an immediate restraining order to block the merger from going forward while lawyers submitted arguments and evidence to prove their positions.

Before his ruling, the judge listened to arguments Tuesday.

City lawyer John Low-Beer said an immediate order was necessary to protect competition in the insurance industry. He said the two companies had "been competing vigorously for business" before deciding to merge.

"For this product we want to buy, there is no other seller who comes close in price," he said.

GHI lawyer Stephen M. Axinn said the merger was announced 14 months ago and the city delayed challenging it, hopeful that the federal government would stop it.

"This is none of their business," he said. "This is not an anticompetitive transaction. This is a pro-competitive situation."

Axinn said the combined companies would save money on office expenses and pass those savings along to customers.

He said the merged entity would be better able to compete against insurance giants that are 50 times its size.

HIP lawyer Bruce Schneider said there was no need to temporarily block the transaction, especially since the contracts with the city do not expire until the end of June.

High Court Asked To Hear IPO Case (DEAL)

By Cecile Kohrs Lindell

The Deal, November 15, 2006

Lawyers for the government last week asked the Supreme Court to take a case that has the potential to wreak havoc on initial public offerings in the United States by calling into question much of the cooperation investment banks engage in when they form underwriting syndicates.

The class action, Glen Billing v. Credit Suisse First Boston Ltd., charges that common practices such as setting prices and allocating shares among themselves is essentially illegal collaboration among competitors.

Aside from the threat to current IPO practices, the case already has sparked a turf battle between the Securities and Exchange Commission, the primary regulator for Wall Street, and the Department of Justice, which has jurisdiction over antitrust enforcement.

But Solicitor General Paul D. Clement, answering the Supreme Court's request for a unified federal position, seems to be offering a solution that pleases both DOJ's Assistant Attorney General for Antitrust Thomas Barnett and the SEC's Associate General Counsel Richard M. Humes. Both agency officials signed on to Clement's brief filed last week, requesting the top court hear and rule on the heavily nuanced case.

At issue is a September 2005 ruling by the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which overturned a district court's initial ruling to dismiss the Billing case. The appeals court agreed with DOJ's argument that nefarious behavior should not be shielded by a regulatory scheme that doesn't adequately prevent harms that could be addressed by antitrust laws and ordered the case to proceed.

The SEC has argued that it regulates the securities industry, and antitrust law doesn't always apply, and that the court should find "implied immunity" from antitrust laws when a pervasive regulatory scheme is in place.

Because the case was dismissed at the district court level, the merits of Billing's accusations have not been addressed. But even allowing the case to proceed would pose a threat to Wall Street, because a new avenue would be opened for plaintiffs lawyers pursuing class actions, according to Paul Atkins, a member of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Atkins' op-ed warnings about the case were filed to the Supreme Court by banks asking the top court to toss out the 2nd Circuit opinion. He said a new category of plaintiff suits could cost billions of dollars, create upheaval in the market and effectively end Wall Street's reign as the center of the world's capital markets.

Clement suggested that both agencies have some authority to regulate Wall Street, but he urges the Supreme Court to grant certiorari and write a decision that will provide much-needed guidance to courts without upending IPO practices. Clement wrote that overlapping SEC regulation and antitrust enforcement would snarl public securities offerings and "could undercut critical national regulatory policies and interfere with the capital formation process," if the 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals decision is allowed to stand.

But, Clement added, the initial district court's decision, which said the antitrust laws need not apply in light of the extensive SEC regulation, is also wrong. That approach, he wrote, "would oust not only private treble damages actions but government antitrust enforcement from the securities industry, despite the absence of any evidence that Congress intended such a drastic result." That could allow DOJ to investigate some practices for antitrust violations.

The investment bank defendants asked the Supreme Court to hear the case after the appeals court ruling, and the justices, in turn, asked for the views of the United States. That left it to Clement to sort out a room full of about two dozen lawyers and years of history that pitted the SEC's regulatory schemes against antitrust enforcement.

"It looks like they worked out a compromise," said Ali Stoepplewirth, a partner at Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale and Dorr LLP, which represents Citigroup Global Markets Holdings Inc. in this case.

According to Roy Englert, a partner with Robbins, Russell, Englert, Orseck & Untereiner LLP who is representing an amicus in the case, the fact that Clement could craft a brief that is supported by both agencies means it is very likely that the justices will hear the case.

A DOJ spokeswoman was unwilling to comment on the antitrust division's perspective, other than to say that Barnett had signed on.

The case was filed by lawyers with Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP originally as a securities law case, but after it was rejected by the district court, it was refiled as an antitrust case, alleging conspiracy and collaboration against Credit Suisse and Citigroup Global Markets Holdings Inc., Robertson Stephens Inc., Deutsche Bank Securities Inc., Merrill Lynch & Co., Morgan Stanley, Janus Capital Management LLC, Goldman, Sachs & Co., Bear, Stearns & Co., Lehman Brothers Inc., Van Wagoner Capital Management Inc., Fidelity Distributors Corp. and Comerica Inc.

Because the case now alleges antitrust violations, any remedy would automatically be tripled.

The justices will consider taking the case in early December and "could hear the case as early as March," Englert said.

Microsoft: EU Ruling Could Come Soon (CNET)

By Ina Fried

CNET News, November 15, 2006

Microsoft chief lawyer Brad Smith said Tuesday that the company expects to hear back from a European court as early as December on its appeal of the landmark antitrust ruling there.

"We expect to get that decision really in the next several months," Smith said during a question-and-answer session at the company's shareholder meeting in Bellevue, Wash. "Most people think it will probably come some time between December and March or April."

The European Union's antitrust regulators slapped Microsoft with a $600 million fine in March 2004, but the software maker has been pursuing an appeal of the case with Europe's Court of First Instance.

Smith said whatever the decision is, it should give Microsoft and the industry more "clarity."

DOJ_NMG_0094729

"We'll all have to see where we go from there," he said during the meeting, which was also broadcast over the Internet. "Certainly, we and increasingly a lot of other people in Europe would like to see us get to some clear resolution so we can all focus on some other things."

Regulators tacked on an additional $357 million fine in July, saying Microsoft was not fully complying with the 2004 ruling. Microsoft is appealing that as well.

Smith's comments came after a shareholder asked Microsoft executives: "In Europe, how long are they going to keep stringing you along. Do you think they have any intention of ever letting you off the hook?"

It has gone on for a long time, Smith agreed. "It's been going for about eight years," he said.

Also at the meeting, Microsoft shareholders elected the company's proposed slate of directors and rejected three shareholder proposals. CEO Steve Ballmer and Chairman Bill Gates addressed the shareholders, who also got a demo of the Zune music player that went on sale earlier in the day.

Voters Back Limits On Eminent Domain (NYT)

By Terry Pristin

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

Voters showed last week that the furor over a 2005 Supreme Court decision in a Connecticut eminent domain case has not abated, even in states that have already enacted legislation to restrict the use of condemnation for economic development.

Ballot measures to limit eminent domain powers to public uses were approved by large margins in eight states. Louisiana passed an eminent domain measure in September.

In all, 34 states have adopted laws or passed ballot measures in response to the Connecticut case, Kelo v. New London, which upheld the right of local officials to require the forced sale of homes and businesses for private development intended to increase the tax base of one of the state's poorest cities.

"A message has been sent that state and local governments have to do a better job of justifying a need for eminent domain," said Larry Morandi, a land-use specialist at the National Conference of State Legislatures. "There needs to be more negotiation and more transparency."

Donald J. Borut, the executive director of the National League of Cities, acknowledged that condemnation powers are sometimes abused. But he said that property-rights groups have played to public fears in a way that discourages thoughtful discussion about how individual rights should be balanced against projects that benefit the community as a whole. He described anti-Kelo sentiment as "a huge emotional tsunami that's been rushing through the country."

Of the measures approved by voters, "about half of them are purely procedural or largely symbolic," said John D. Echeverria, the executive director of the Georgetown Environmental Law and Policy Institute. In Florida, for example, the State Legislature, by a three-fifths vote of each house, can make an exception to a ban on transferring condemned property from one private entity to another.

Strict constitutional amendments have been added in South Carolina and Georgia — states where eminent domain is not used for economic development, said Timothy Sandefur, a staff lawyer for the Pacific Legal Foundation, a libertarian group that represents property owners in condemnation cases.

But in Michigan, where officials are trying to cope with decades of disinvestment in cities like Detroit and Flint, a new constitutional amendment is likely to have a "chilling effect on the willingness of investors to undertake new development," said John E. Mogk, a law professor at Wayne State University.

Though property-rights groups cheered last week's election results, their victory was tempered by the failure — except in Arizona — of initiatives aimed at discouraging government officials from making zoning and other land-use decisions. California, Idaho and Washington State defeated initiatives to require compensation for owners of property that lost value as a result of a government action to restrict its use.

That the measure was rejected by three-fourths of the voters in Idaho, considered a strong property-rights state, suggests that the movement against so-called regulatory takings is doomed, said David Barron, a Harvard Law School professor. "It shows that the people recognize that the property-rights movement is potentially just divesting them of their ability to decide their own future as a community," he said. "People don't want that to happen."

In Oregon, which passed a similar measure in 2004, local officials have waived zoning rules to avoid paying nearly $6 billion to compensate property owners who claimed economic losses.

But California's eminent domain and antizoning initiative lost by only four percentage points after opponents put together a huge coalition that included antitax groups concerned about the potential cost of compensating property owners for land-use changes.

The California measure was one of eight propositions on ballots throughout the country backed by groups linked to Howard S. Rich, a New York real estate investor. In Arizona, where the measure was one of 19 on the ballot, the proponents outspent the opponents 4 to 1, according to The Arizona Republic. The situation was reversed in California, where proponents were outspent 3 to 1, said John F. Shirey, the executive director of the California Redevelopment Association, a trade group.

California has already tinkered with its eminent domain powers, but Mr. Shirey said the state should take further steps — like passing legislation to prevent the condemnation of single-family homes — to head off future property-rights initiatives. "We need to do something substantive to give people better assurances than they have now that something like what occurred in Connecticut couldn't happen in California," he said.

Eminent domain specialists on both sides of the issue say many of the statutes enacted by state legislatures have few teeth, either because the language is vague or the measures impose only minor restrictions on public officials.

"A lot of state legislators don't really believe in property rights," Mr. Sandefur said. He praised Pennsylvania as one of a handful of states that have enacted a "well-crafted, careful, thought-out measure," but noted that officials could continue condemning property for redevelopment in Philadelphia and Pittsburgh until 2012.

Mr. Barron, the Harvard Law professor, said much of the legislation was "more hype than not," often riddled with exceptions inserted during the legislative process. Indiana — another state praised by Mr. Sandefur — includes technology parks as a "public use" for which eminent domain powers can be used.

The initiatives approved Nov. 7 tend to be shorter and more restrictive than the bills, "but there will be a lot of interpretative questions about what they mean," Mr. Barron said.

Amy S. Doppelt, a managing director at Fitch Ratings, said the initiatives were often unclear. "Frequently, the language is quite broad," she said. "It creates a lot of uncertainty." Communities that can no longer use condemnation could find themselves at a competitive disadvantage, which could ultimately lower their credit rating, she said.

In many communities, eminent domain powers are used only sparingly. That is not the case in Detroit, where officials have worked to bring industrial parks and middle-income housing developments to tracts of land that are largely, but not entirely, vacant.

"Any project requiring an assembly of land of 50 acres or more since 1960 has required eminent domain at some point in order to complete the project," said Mr. Mogk, the Wayne State professor.

But the use of condemnation powers to replace one set of property owners with another has often proved contentious. One such project on the city's east side, now known as Jefferson Village, gave rise to years of lawsuits. But it has proved so successful that the city expects to recoup its $38 million investment in 12 years, said Robbin G. Millard, a project manager for the Detroit Economic Growth Corporation, the nonprofit organization that helped create Jefferson Village. Though 160 homes were taken, most owners were able to reach a settlement with the city, he said.

In 2004, the Michigan Supreme Court ruled that eminent domain could no longer be used for private projects to create jobs and generate tax revenue. That decision is now enshrined in a constitutional amendment approved last week by Michigan voters. If condemnation is used to eliminate blight, each individual property must now be shown to be blighted "by clear and convincing evidence," Mr. Mogk said. This requirement is likely to discourage badly needed development, he said.

Mr. Millard said that while some aspects of the amendment need to be clarified, that does not appear to pose insurmountable barriers. Officials will be able to show that the buildings they seek to condemn are blighted. "We think we can still do eminent domain in this city," he said.

Judge Says Crack Sentencing Goes Too Far (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — A federal judge who served as a top drug policy adviser to the first President Bush and advocated harsher penalties for crack cocaine crimes said Tuesday the policy had gone too far and was undermining faith in the judicial system.

U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton told the U.S. Sentencing Commission that federal laws requiring dramatically longer sentences for crack cocaine than for cocaine powder were "unconscionable" and contributed to the perception within minority communities that courts are unfair.

"I never thought that the disparity should be as severe as it has become," said Walton, who sits on the bench in Washington, where he previously served as a Superior Court judge, a federal prosecutor and a deputy drug czar.

The current law includes what critics have called the 100-to-1 disparity: Trafficking in 5 grams of cocaine carries a mandatory five-year prison sentence, but it takes 500 grams of cocaine powder to warrant the same sentence.

Advocates for changing the law point to crime statistics that show crack is more of an inner-city drug while cocaine powder is used more often in the suburbs.

The Sentencing Commission, which has thrice recommended that Congress narrow the sentencing gap, is again reviewing the disparity. Previous recommendations, which were not adopted, have included raising the penalties for powder cocaine and lowering them for crack.

The Bush administration, like the Clinton administration, indicated Tuesday that it welcomed a discussion about the sentencing disparity but adamantly opposed lowering the penalties for crack. The Justice Department says crack is more addictive and easier to sell in small doses, leading to increased violence and a greater health impact.

The Justice Department also urged the Sentencing Commission only to make recommendations to Congress and not to take it upon itself to narrow the gap by rewriting sentencing guidelines.

Walton said there may still be a need for tougher sentences for crack because it is more addictive and more closely associated with violence. But he said the disparity is too great.

As an example, he offered two hypothetical cases involving a white college student arrested with a kilogram of powder cocaine and a black high school dropout caught with the same amount of crack. The white man would face a likely sentence of 3 to 4 years in prison, Walton said in exhibits filed with the commission. The black man would face a mandatory 10-year sentence and the possibility of a life sentence.

Walton said the law wasn't intended to target poor people or minorities. But with a disproportionately high number of minorities in prison and potential jurors openly balking at convicting drug offenders because of concerns over the fairness of the system, Walton said the problem must be addressed.

"I hope the powers that be will have the will to do the right thing and rectify the problem," Walton said.

Equal Drug Crimes Need Equal Jail Times (CSM)

By Eric E. Sterling

The Christian Science Monitor, November 15, 2006

For a generation, antidrug policy has been built on mistakes and tough talk.

One of our most infamous contemporary laws is the 100-to-1 difference in sentencing between selling crack cocaine and selling powder cocaine. Under federal drug laws, prison sentences are usually tied to the quantity of drugs the defendant trafficked. For example, selling 5,000 grams of powder cocaine (about a briefcase full) results in a mandatory 10-year prison sentence, but so does selling only 50 grams of crack cocaine (the weight of a candy bar).

Working for the House Judiciary Committee in 1986, I wrote the House bill that was the basis for that law. We made some terrible mistakes.

Those mistakes, aggravated by the Justice Department's misuse of the penalties, have been a disaster. Conventional wisdom is that the 100-to-1 ratio needs to be repealed. But that's an inadequate fix.

On Tuesday, the US Sentencing Commission - the independent agency that gives sentencing guidelines to federal judges and advises Congress - held hearings on this issue. If logic prevails, in the next Congress we may finally see an end to one of the most unjust laws passed in recent memory. And that might correct the biggest mistake of my professional life.

We still cling to 20-year-old ideas that crack is uniquely harmful: It is instantly addictive; it makes you especially violent; it causes women to abandon their babies; the babies of crack users will be basket cases. None of these are true.

Also, because crack is no longer a big news story, people mistakenly believe our anticocaine policy has worked. Not so. There is no scarcity of cocaine. Since 1986, the price of cocaine has fallen and the quality is better. Cocaine deaths have increased. The number of crack users is basically unchanged.

Drug sentences are on the national agenda again because civil rights supporters are justifiably outraged that almost all federal crack prosecutions involve people of color. And indeed, for years no whites were prosecuted for crack offenses in many federal courts, including those in Los Angeles, Chicago, Miami, Denver, Dallas, or Boston.

Because of that, the myth developed that Congress intended to punish blacks - believed to be the crack users - with long sentences and let the white powder cocaine sniffers of Hollywood and Wall Street get away with light sentences. But that's not the case. Congress was trying to remedy a problem it believed afflicted the black community.

A second myth is that Congress chose a 100-to-1 ratio because it determined that crack was 100 times worse than powder cocaine. But the weights chosen (5 and 50 grams, versus 500 and 5,000 grams) weren't based on a comparison of the two drugs. Congress had no clear understanding of drug trafficking - or the metric system - and thought those weights indicated significant trafficking activity. In fact, tons (millions of grams) of cocaine are shipped to the US by the leaders, organizers, and financiers of the international drug trade.

The law was flawed, but the Justice Department still could have used it to target high-level traffickers. But research from the US Sentencing Commission shows that three-quarters of the federal cocaine defendants - both powder and crack - are just neighborhood dealers or couriers.

Congress should do what it tried to do in 1986 - make the Justice Department focus exclusively on high-level cases because state and local law enforcement cannot. There are three elements that would fix the problem: 1) Raise the quantity triggers for all drugs to realistic levels for high-level traffickers, such as 50 or 100 kilos of cocaine, and end the crack/powder imbalance. 2) Require the attorney general to approve prosecution of any case involving less than 50 kilos of cocaine. 3) Analyze federal drug cases district by district to identify agents and prosecutors who waste time and money. If only high-level dealers were being prosecuted by the feds, no one would have cause to complain about the race of the defendants.

A promising sign is that a few months ago, Sen. Jeff Sessions (R) of Alabama, a former US attorney, introduced legislation to address the problem. Action on his bill is unlikely before Congress adjourns, but it had bipartisan support - a good sign that a political fix is viable.

The 20-year-old mistake of tiny quantity triggers has distracted both the Justice Department from the proper cases and reformers from the proper fix.

For a generation, antidrug policy has been built on factual mistakes and tough-sounding rhetoric. The American people simply need an effective policy. Truly, that would be tough enough.

Man Gets Life Term In Drug Agent's Death (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

Filed at 9:52 a.m. ET

PHOENIX (AP) -- A man accused of masterminding a 1994 robbery plot during which an undercover federal drug agent was killed has been sentenced to life in prison.

Augustin Vasquez-Mendoza, 37, who had been on the FBI's Ten Most Wanted List for four years, was arrested in Mexico in 2000 but not returned to Arizona until 2005. He was alleged to be the leader of a drug ring that produced methamphetamine in Mexico for import to the U.S.

Vasquez-Mendoza was sentenced Monday in Maricopa County Superior Court to life in prison with a possibility of parole after 25 years. The judge added 46 years for kidnapping, assault and armed robbery counts, which must be served after the murder conviction sentence.

As terms of his extradition, U.S. authorities had agreed to waive the death penalty and a life sentence without parole, Drug Enforcement Administration officials said last year.

Federal drug agent Richard Fass, 37, who was posing as a drug dealer, was killed by henchmen of Vasquez-Mendoza in Glendale while trying to buy 22 pounds of methamphetamine from them for $160,000, the government said.

Vasquez-Mendoza wasn't present when Fass was shot, prosecutors said. But he was alleged to have been the mastermind who arranged to have the agent robbed and to have him killed if he resisted.

The other suspects were previously convicted, including Juan Rubio Vasquez, the triggerman and the defendant's half brother, who was sentenced to life in prison with no chance of parole.

Arrests Made In Fentanyl-Laced Heroin Deaths (AP)

AP, November 14, 2006

(AP) PITTSBURGH Ten men have been charged with operating a drug ring in western Pennsylvania that may have been responsible for distributing deadly fentanyl-laced heroin, the U.S. Attorney's Office announced Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0094733

All face one count of conspiracy to distribute more than one kilogram of heroin, according to criminal complaints filed in U.S. District Court for the Western District of Pennsylvania.

Eight have been arrested and two remain fugitives, U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan said.

Investigators were still collecting evidence to determine whether the men are linked to more than a dozen deaths from fentanyl-laced heroin earlier this year, Buchanan said.

If a federal grand jury determines they are, they could face longer prison sentences, she said.

If convicted, the men face minimum sentences of 10 years in prison.

If connected to any of the deaths, they could be sentenced 20 years to life in prison.

Authorities on Tuesday were investigating the seventh likely heroin overdose in western Pennsylvania in recent days.

Eighteen to 20 people overdosed on fentanyl or fentanyl-laced heroin between late April and mid-August, said Dr. Frederick Fochtman, director and chief toxicologist at the forensic laboratory division of the Allegheny County Medical Examiner's Office.

Hundreds of overdose deaths nationwide have been blamed on heroin laced with fentanyl, an opiate used legally in anesthesia.

Fentanyl is cheaper than heroin and 40 to 100 times more potent than morphine.

Feds Bust 10 In Big Heroin Ring (PPG)

By Paula Reed Ward, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, November 15, 2006

Hazelwood-based group is charged with selling fentanyl-laced drug blamed for 10 deaths

Five months after fentanyl-laced heroin hit the streets of Pittsburgh and racked up at least 10 fatalities and dozens of overdoses, federal officials yesterday announced that they've broken the Hazelwood-based ring believed to be responsible.

Ten people have been charged -- although two are still fugitives -- through criminal complaints by the U.S. attorney's office.

Investigators believe the organization dismantled by "Operation Burnout" is also linked to the spate of heroin overdoses and deaths in the area over the last several days.

U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan said officials do not yet know if the heroin responsible for those deaths was laced with fentanyl, but they have confirmed that it is an especially potent mixture.

She called the Hazelwood group an "elaborate network," though Ms. Buchanan would not reveal the quantity of heroin sold by the organization or the amount of money earned from its sale.

The men were responsible for selling heroin and fentanyl-laced heroin with the names "Get High or Die Trying," "Burnout," "Energizer," "Mayday" and "Chevrolet."

Each defendant is charged with one count of conspiracy to distribute in excess of 1 kilogram of heroin.

Within the next 30 days, the case will be presented to the federal grand jury for indictment.

If convicted, the defendants each could face a mandatory minimum sentence of 10 years in prison. If they are convicted of selling heroin that resulted in a death, the defendants could face mandatory prison terms of 20 years to life, Ms. Buchanan said.

The charges came as a result of monitoring cell phone conversations between three of the drug ring's alleged main players -- Wilford Clark, 26, and Travess Strothers, 27, both of Hazelwood, and Kenneth Johnson, 29, of the North Side -- between June and November.

According to investigators, the men tried to speak in code, referring to quantities of heroin by the names of professional football players. For example, when they spoke about "Emmitt Smith," they were referring to the former Dallas Cowboys player's No. 22. That meant someone wanted to order 22 bricks -- or 1,100 stamp bags -- of heroin.

"As slick as these individuals think they may have been, their criminal activity has come to an end," Ms. Buchanan said.

During the intercepted phone calls, the defendants spoke about the quantity of heroin they needed, as well as its quality.

"They complaining about them Burnouts. ... I'm getting too much lip," Mr. Clark was heard saying on the phone. "As soon as we boost them back up, then these [people] will be scared."

"It was clear that Clark was stating that if the heroin were to be laced or 'boosted' up with fentanyl, the customers who Clark routinely referred to as 'the fiends' would stop complaining," the agent wrote in a court affidavit.

In addition to the cell phone conversations, federal agents used two confidential informants in the case. One, who worked for Wilford Clark, was arrested in June after a search resulted in the seizure of 21 stamp bags of the heroin labeled "Get High or Die Trying."

Several of the defendants were arrested either last week or yesterday morning. Mr. Clark and Mr. Strothers have not yet been taken into custody and are considered fugitives.

DOJ_NMG_0094734

Mr. Johnson is believed to be the primary dealer for the organization, while Shakur Muhammad, 35, of Homewood, was responsible for getting the heroin from sources in New Jersey.

Mr. Muhammad was arrested Nov. 3, after visiting his supplier in New Jersey, authorities said. State police, who were cooperating with the Drug Enforcement Administration, stopped Mr. Muhammad, who was speeding, on the Pennsylvania Turnpike near Somerset.

A state trooper requested permission to search his black Jeep Liberty, and Mr. Muhammad consented. Inside, police found a package of diapers, which also included 23,000 stamp bags of heroin, many bearing the label "Chevrolet."

During an interview with a DEA agent, Mr. Muhammad said he had gotten the kilogram of heroin for about $84,000. He also told the agent that he'd been making regular trips to New Jersey and had gotten up to 1,000 bricks of heroin on more than one occasion.

In addition to the arrests in Pittsburgh, the accused supplier of the heroin, Alfurgan Simon, 36, was arrested yesterday morning in Newark, N.J. He will be extradited to the U.S. District Court's Western District of Pennsylvania for prosecution.

As part of the case, officials are asking friends or family members of people who took the fentanyl-laced heroin to contact the Pittsburgh Police Narcotics Squad at 412-323-7761 to help in the investigation.

The "Get High or Die Trying" heroin had addicts clamoring to try it for what they expected to be an intense high. Fentanyl, a painkiller about 80 times stronger than morphine, was added to the heroin to give it an extra kick.

Fentanyl-laced heroin was responsible for hundreds of overdose deaths across the country this year, including here, in Philadelphia, Detroit and Chicago.

Pittsburgh had another problem with fentanyl-laced heroin in 1988. In that "China White" outbreak, 18 people died from injecting heroin laced with 3-methyl fentanyl. That drug was both made and distributed here.

Arrests Shut Deadly Hazelwood Drug Pipeline (PTR)

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, November 15, 2006

Authorities say they have arrested eight members of a Hazelwood drug distribution ring accused of supplying fentanyl-laced heroin that killed at least 18 people in Allegheny County between June and August.

The ring likely supplied heroin that killed seven people across the region in the past week and caused more than a dozen nonfatal overdoses, U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan said Tuesday. Toxicology tests are being conducted to determine if that heroin also was laced with fentanyl, a powerful painkiller.

"This was a very elaborate network that was distributing this deadly drug to desperate drug users," Buchanan said. "But as slick as these individuals think they may have been, their criminal activity has come to an end."

Buchanan announced the arrests of seven men from Hazelwood, Homewood, the Hill District, North Side and East Liberty, and one from New Jersey who is accused of making the deadly mixture in Newark for distribution in Pittsburgh. Two other suspects remained at large yesterday.

The 10 men face charges including possession, distribution and conspiracy to distribute heroin.

Federal agents monitored the drug dealers' cell phone conversations during a five-month investigation dubbed "Operation Burn Out," which included Pittsburgh police and state police, Buchanan said.

If investigators link the suspects to the fatal overdoses and convict them, they could face prison terms of 20 years to life for each death, Buchanan said. The conspiracy and distribution charges carry mandatory minimum prison sentences of 10 years.

"We intend to hold them accountable for the needless deaths that we believe occurred due to their greed," Buchanan said.

Three of the deaths in the past week occurred in Pittsburgh, three in Westmoreland County and one victim was a student at Indiana University of Pennsylvania.

"Drugs, especially heroin, know no geographic or socioeconomic boundaries," said Pittsburgh police Sgt. John Fisher, who heads the federal Weed and Seed unit.

Buchanan said it's too soon to say how much fentanyl-laced heroin the ring distributed locally and how much suppliers profited.

The heroin and fentanyl mixture was distributed in stamp bags marked "Get High or Die Trying," "Burnouts," "Energizer" "Mayday" and "Chevrolet," Buchanan said.

The suspects, during cell phone conversations, often spoke in code when referring to how much of the heroin and fentanyl mix they wanted to distribute, Buchanan said.

They used the names of NFL football players -- such as Emmitt Smith and Donovan McNabb -- whose jersey numbers corresponded to the amount of drugs desired, Buchanan said.

"In the case of Emmitt Smith, his number is 22, so they were referring to the number of bricks they wanted," Buchanan said.

DOJ_NMG_0094735

Arrested yesterday were: Eugene Terrell, 18, Kevin Carter, 35, and Wilford Clark, 26, all of Hazelwood; Carlton Williams, 30, of East Liberty; Damon Jackson, 31, of the Hill District; and Alfurgan Simon, 36, of Newark, N.J.

Shakur Muhammad, 35, of Homewood, and Kenneth Johnson, 29, of the North Side, were arrested last week.

Authorities were searching for William Clark, 25, and Travess Strothers, 27, both of Hazelwood.

Muhammad was arrested Nov. 3 while traveling from New Jersey to Pittsburgh, Buchanan said. State police troopers found 460 bricks of heroin stamped "Chevrolet" in his car. A brick contains 50 stamp-sized bags of heroin.

The men will be arraigned Thursday and detention hearings will be held later this week, Buchanan said. Evidence will be presented to a federal grand jury within 30 days, she said.

10 Face Heroin Distribution Charges (WTAE)

WTAE-TV, November 14, 2006

PITTSBURGH -- Heroin laced with a powerful painkiller led to 50 overdoses and nine deaths in Pittsburgh and surrounding communities last summer, and now, 10 people face charges for distribution of the drug.

The killer heroin was mixed with Fentanyl, a painkiller about 80 times stronger than morphine.

The deadly drug might have led to several overdoses this past weekend, also, authorities said.

U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan was joined by Pittsburgh Mayor Luke Ravenstahl to talk about the investigation of the huge drug trafficking operation that stretches from New Jersey to Pittsburgh.

If convicted, those arrested could face a maximum sentence of life in prison.

SF Supes: Pot Offenses 'Lowest Law Enforcement Priority' (BCNS)

Bay City News Service, November 14, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- San Francisco supervisors voted Tuesday to make marijuana offenses the Police Department's lowest priority, though prohibitions remain for marijuana sales in public, possession by minors or use by motorists.

"San Francisco should determine its marijuana policy locally, not hand them over to the federal Drug Enforcement Administration," stated the ordinance by Supervisor Tom Ammiano. "Law enforcement resources would be better spent fighting serious and violent crimes."

Ammiano's bill was opposed by supervisors Sean Elsbernd, Michela Alioto-Pier and Fiona Ma.

The law also urges the San Francisco district attorney, Kamala Harris, to make prosecution of marijuana offenses her office's lowest priority. A community oversight committee was also created to monitor implementation of the law.

SF Supes Outlaw Foam Food Containers, Decriminalize Adult Pot Use (SFC)

By Robert Selna, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, November 14, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- The Board of Supervisors voted today to outlaw the use of Styrofoam and other polystyrene products by city restaurants and to effectively decriminalize the use, sale and cultivation of marijuana by adults.

The food container legislation, introduced by Board of Supervisors President Aaron Peskin and approved unanimously on the first of two votes needed for passage, would apply to about 3,400 restaurants in San Francisco as well city facility food service providers and food vendor companies contracting with the city. It is scheduled to be implemented June 1, 2007.

Polystyrene containers are blamed for filling up landfills and breaking down into smaller nonbiodegradable pieces that harm marine and other wildlife when they are ingested.

In passing the ordinance, San Francisco joins number of other cities around the country, including Oakland, Portland, Ore., and Berkeley, which banned Styrofoam and similar products nearly 20 years ago.

The marijuana legislation, which passed on an initial vote 8-3, would set nearly all crimes involving marijuana as the lowest law enforcement priority for city police and urges the district attorney to adopt the same policy when prosecuting criminal defendants.

It passed with the blessing of the police officials, but over the complaints of some residents who say the marijuana trade attracts or occurs along with other criminal activity that undermines the quality of life in their neighborhoods.

Ammiano introduced the legislation in August at the behest of groups pushing for the national decriminalization of marijuana.

S.F. Passes Marijuana Tolerance Law (KGO)

San Francisco's Board of Supervisors passed a law that essentially says when it comes to marijuana, the city doesn't much care.

The proposal passed overwhelmingly today and it gets a second reading same time next week, but that's mostly a formality. So for all intesive purposes the city has a new pot policy.

Veronica Gaynor, Fair Oaks Community Coalition: "The police will have to arrest for barking dogs or spitting on the sidewalk before they get to this marijuana."

Members of a mission neighborhood group oppose the new measure which makes marijuana violations by adults on private property the lowest priority for San Francisco police.

The mayor says it simply formalizes what is already city policy.

Gavin Newsom, San Francisco: "I don't see it changing anything what so ever - frankly I think it's just symbolic."

The measure provides some exceptions: allowing crackdowns on those caught driving under the influence, selling pot on public property, if it poses a threat to public safety, and the use and sale involving minors.

Most other marijuana offenses will be a low priority but Police Chief Heather Fong says that doesn't mean her officers will turn a blind eye.

Chief Heather Fong, SFPD: "When there are legitimate criminal behaviors, criminal acts that occur, officers are permitted to enforce the law as they have been."

A public hearing was held yesterday. Some critics believe the measure will undermine San Francisco's medical marijuana clubs.

Kim Stryker, Fair Oaks Community Coalition: "There's no reason to get a permit for a medical facility, there's no reason to get a medical card - you just go to your neighbor and buy what you want in unlimited amounts according to this legislation."

Supervisor Tom Ammiano calls that an over-reaction. He is the sponsor of the legislation.

Tom Ammiano: "I don't know why the in quotes neighbors, because they aren't my neighbors, keep saying that after we point out that it's not true. Whatever the police are doing now they will continue to do, it's up to them."

San Francisco's new law includes a committee to monitor the implementation. This law is similar to an ordinance passed by Santa Cruz to voters last week.

S.F. Passes Marijuana Tolerance Law (KGO)

KGO-TV, November 14, 2006

San Francisco's proposed legislation is similar to a measure passed by Santa Cruz voters this past Election Day. Measure K was approved by more than 60 percent of that city's voters.

It makes marijuana laws the lowest enforcement priority. The new policy pertains to infractions by adults on private property. If the city's police officers don't comply with the new rule, they could find themselves on the receiving end of civil lawsuits.

The Santa Cruz police department is also restricted from cooperating with state and federal authorities when it comes to marijuana investigations or arrests.

Measure K also calls for the creation of a community oversight committee to monitor implementation.

The Santa Cruz ordinance doesn't protect pot use by minors, which is also the case with San Francisco's proposal.

According to the Santa Cruz Sentinel, newspaper, critics worry about a conflict between the state laws officers are sworn to uphold and obeying this ordinance.

California law allows marijuana use only for medical purposes.

Measure K is set to take effect in Santa Cruz by February.

As We See It: Pot Capital? (SCS)

Santa Cruz Sentinel, November 13, 2006

Do the people of Santa Cruz really want marijuana to be what the city is known for?

That question just may be turning into a reality, especially after the passage last week of Measure K.

The ballot measure passed overwhelmingly, although we still believe that a number of voters didn't really understand the full implications of the measure.

It's part of a national effort by a well-funded group that's trying to overturn the nation's marijuana laws. They're going about the effort by picking off far-left towns like Santa Cruz to apparently convince the rest of the country that marijuana ought to be legalized.

We're not convinced that marijuana is really harmless, nor are we convinced that legalizing it is really the smartest move our society could make.

DOJ_NMG_0094737

But were it to be legalized, we'd hate to see it done this way, where you end up with "pockets" of marijuana havens like Santa Cruz.

Beyond that, Measure K is setting up some bureaucratic regulations that will be time-consuming and frustrating to follow. How would you like to be a busy city clerk who has to take time to write a letter to federal lawmakers each year, asking them to support legalized marijuana?

Advertisement

Why should the city have to name an "oversight committee" to monitor police reports? Why would any self-respecting police officer work in that kind of atmosphere? It almost guarantees that the best cops will look elsewhere for employment.

The measure also declares that it's city policy to support policies for taxation and regulation of marijuana.

At one time, those who smoked marijuana were considered to be free spirits who flouted the law. But this generation of pot-promoters are more bureaucratic. They seem to be as interested in setting up procedures and policies every bit as much as they are in getting high.

The serious side of this issue is that people shouldn't be encouraged to get high. Marijuana might not be the most dangerous drug in the world, but our society does not need more avenues to self-medication. One more legal way to get high is not something our society needs.

Year in and year out, the local United Way Community Assessment Project report warns that the tolerance of drug use — and abuse — is one of the biggest problems facing this community. Drug and alcohol use by teens is much higher than the state and national averages.

It's no joke. People's lives are made worse because of drug and alcohol use and abuse.

As for Santa Cruz, drug use is a big problem. It's a problem downtown, and don't let anyone tell you otherwise. Marijuana is part of that problem.

We don't think that Santa Cruz ought to be known as a "pot capital" of the world. That's why Measure K is not good for the city, despite the overwhelming vote to approve it.

Ziegler And Company Create A Medical Marijuana Cooperative In Susanville (LN)

Lassen News, November 14, 2006

Nov. 14, 2006 — Once again, the medical marijuana war breaks into an open boil right here in Susanville. Proposition 215, the Compassionate Use Act, was passed by the people of the state of California 10 years ago last week, but the controversial issue still remains unresolved.

To some seriously ill people in our community, the pungent herb is a God-given painkiller that works better than any man-made drug. But to some of our local city leaders and law enforcement officials, it's just plain old dope.

While the battle rages all around him, local medical marijuana farmer Timothy Ziegler, 47, bristles at the suggestion he's a drug dealer.

He always refers to his plants and the big, potent buds he grows in several different rooms of an old commercial building a stone's throw off Main Street as medicine.

He said the drug dealers are out in the bars or in the park hawking their wares to customers who seek a quick buzz. He said that's not him and that's not his purpose.

He said it's easy to see the difference between marijuana the drug and marijuana the medicine once one sees a patient curled up on a couch in a fetal position in excruciating pain take a dose or two of medicine and then be well enough to sit up and eat some food. Maybe even watch a little television.

"You're going to watch this happen and then tell me somebody can't do this?" an incredulous Ziegler asked.

He said most of the medical marijuana users he's encountered use the drug because of chronic pain, but other users include cancer and AIDS patients. Some use the drug to ease their nausea. Others use the drug to help build their appetite and combat wasting.

Ziegler said three local doctors write recommendations for patients to use marijuana as an alternative to stronger, addictive, and to some, more dangerous and damaging pharmaceuticals.

"If I wanted to be a drug dealer, I'd be growing hundreds of plants on federal land," Ziegler said. "I'd be a whole lot richer than I am now. Just look at this place. You can see there's no money in this."

Ziegler, a medical marijuana patient who started using the drug after he was crushed by a wall in a construction accident at a Lake Almanor building site three years ago, said marijuana allows him to have a life without the opiate painkillers he said were stealing his life and reducing him to little more than opiate eyes.

DOJ_NMG_0094738

"I've been clean and sober for 22 years," Ziegler said. "I quit doing everything. After 19 years of sobriety, I got crushed, breaking my back and three ribs in nine places, leaving me in constant pain. I have an addictive personality, and taking those pain medications was turning me into a junkie. It just wasn't an option. That's how I got into medical marijuana."

Ziegler said he and 104 other medical marijuana patients have formed the CASA Collective Cooperative — Californians for Safe Access — here in Susanville.

"We're a patient's group," Ziegler said. "We're patients helping patients."

According to Ziegler, the collective has 104 medical marijuana recommendations from Lassen County patients. The recommendations and photocopies of picture ID cards are all gathered in a file folder to show law enforcement officers should the cooperative be raided.

Unfortunately, Ziegler said he couldn't grow enough medicine for so many patients and remain below the federal radar. Federal law does not recognize a medical marijuana defense, and a convicted grower with more than 99 plants faces a mandatory five-year prison sentence. For that reason, Ziegler said he never grows more than about 90 plants. Some counties in California will let a medical marijuana patient have as many as eight mature plants.

"One hundred plants," Ziegler said, "that's the magic number."

Ziegler said he has to travel to the Bay Area to purchase medicine for himself and the other cooperative members. He said that's more expensive for collective members.

"Bob Burns turned me over to the feds," Ziegler said. "I'm prepared for them to come. What I'm doing is federally illegal. When they come, they take everything. It's all gone. It's all confiscated. But in the last five years no one with a legal medical marijuana claim has done more than the booking time in Northeastern California. Jail is an ever-looming threat for me and every patient in the collective. You listen to every sound. Every day you wonder, 'Is today the day.' There's a lot of fear."

Ziegler characterized the issue as a struggle with a group of city leaders who refuse to recognize and follow the laws of the state of California.

"They don't want to acknowledge it," Ziegler said of the medical marijuana law. "They don't want to acknowledge they are subject to the laws and the Constitution of the state of California in this city."

While a city ordinance makes it illegal to operate a medical marijuana dispensary in Susanville, Ziegler said the cooperative gets around that restriction by operating a delivery service.

Ziegler said he's very careful to make sure the medicine he grows remains medicine and doesn't wind up as illegal drugs on the street.

"I'm guilty of doing what I despise — profiling," Ziegler said. "We don't want to be involved with anyone if we're suspicious they're distributing medicine to other people. All it would take is one incident, and they (the authorities) would have everything they needed."

While there might be big money in drug dealing, Ziegler said growing medical marijuana is a not-for-profit venture.

When he can't grow enough medical marijuana for the patients Ziegler makes a trip to another cooperative to purchase medicine.

Trips to the Bay Area to purchase medicine cost about $600 in gas, food and lodging. A pound of medical marijuana from another cooperative costs about $4,000. The patient pays about $250 per ounce.

"There's just no profit in it," Ziegler said. "It's not there. Do the math."

Ziegler said given the overhead and the high cost of electricity there's not much profit in the plants he grows himself. He said each plant grown indoors yields about 2-1/2 ounces of medicine. Keeping under the federal sentencing limit of less than 100 plants limits how much medicine Ziegler can grow for the cooperative's patients.

The cooperative has five employees and is open from noon to 8 p.m. Tuesday through Saturday. Ziegler said the cooperative is a non-profit corporation that keeps regular business records, pays taxes and worker's compensation just like any other business except Ziegler's not entitled to sell, only seek reimbursement for time and materials.

Ziegler said he starts cloned plants hydroponically so they develop a strong root structure.

He said his plants are all grown organically without any pesticides or chemicals, which could be harmful to some patients. For example, mites, a typical pest for marijuana gardners, are controlled with ladybugs.

Once the small plants are strong, they're moved to a second "veg room" where they sit under grow lights nearly 24-hours per day. The plants grow rapidly in this environment.

Finally the plants are moved to a "sleep room" where the number of hours of light per day is gradually diminished. Marijuana plants are light sensitive, so the buds form and grow larger as the number of hours of light the plants receive each day is reduced.

Finally, the buds are trimmed, cured and dried before they are bagged and used as medicine.

DOJ_NMG_0094739

The entire process of the indoor grow reduces the plants' life cycle from eight or 10 months to two or three months. A plant grown outside could yield as much as one pound of medicine.

Ziegler staunchly defends his right to do what he's doing under California law.

"If I'm doing something wrong, how come I'm still here doing this two years later?" Ziegler asked.

Drug Ring Leader Guilty Of Trafficking (NT)

Nashua Telegraph, November 15, 2006

CONCORD – A Mexican national man who was arrested in June after he delivered nearly 2 kilograms of cocaine to a Nashua residence, was convicted Monday on federal drug trafficking and immigration charges, First Assistant U.S. Attorney Joseph Laplante said.

Francisco David Avalos-Morfin, 38, of Mexico, pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in Concord as part of a plea agreement charging him with conspiracy to distribute more than 500 grams of cocaine and unlawful re-entry into the United States, Laplante said.

Avalos-Morfin has been jailed since June 5 when agents working as part of a federal drug task force arrested him and other man, Aurelio Bonilla, 29,drop off a plastic bag containing two white, powdery bricks at a Nashua residence, Laplante said.

The two bricks encased in shrink wrap were later verified to be cocaine, approximately 1,955 grams, Laplante said, which according to local police has a Nashua street value of about $100 a gram, or $195,500.

Avalos-Morfin, who was living in Fitchburg, Mass., when he was arrested, was the leader of a Mexican drug ring, according to a Drug Enforcement Administration agent's affidavit filed in the case.

Telephone conversations arranging the drug transaction between Avalos-Morfin and an informant working with DEA officials began April 29 and continued through May, leading up to the June 5 delivery, according to the affidavit.

By that time the DEA informant, who received several unannounced visits from Avalos-Morfin during that time, had managed to negotiate a price of $48,000 for the cocaine.

Although that amount of money was never exchanged during the investigation, all of the money that was exchanged was returned, Laplante said.

The investigation was headed by the New England Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force and included members of Nashua, Manchester and state police departments, according to a statement from the U.S. attorney's office.

Officials from the federal Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement assisted Laplante in prosecuting Avalos-Morfin on the immigration charges, the statement said.

Avalos-Morfin faces a 40-year maximum federal prison sentence for the drug charges alone, but will more likely receive a sentence much closer to the five-year minimum he must serve on the charge, Laplante said, who estimated about 10 years for both drug and immigration charges.

"But sentencing is up to the court," he added.

A sentencing hearing has been set for Feb. 22 in U.S. District Court in Concord.

Avalos-Morfin has been deported from the United States on two other occasions, the first in 1996 from Nogales, N.M., and the second time in 2004 from Bakersfield, Calif., Laplante said.

Laplante could not say where in Mexico Avalos-Morfin is from.

Federal court records show that in the summer of 2003 he was sentenced to 18 months in prison for the re-entering the country after having been deported.

Once he has served his time, Avalos-Morfin will again be deported to Mexico, Laplante said.

Bonilla, who is a U.S. citizen, was charged with conspiracy to distribute cocaine, more than 500 grams, according to court records. That charge is still pending.

Colombia President Lobbies US Congress For Free Trade (WSJ/DJ)

Wall Street Journal/Dow Jones, November 14, 2006

BOGOTA (Dow Jones)--Colombian President Alvaro Uribe is lobbying the U.S. Congress on labor issues to build support for an extension of trade preferences granted to his country and for a free trade agreement between both nations that has yet to be signed and ratified.

Uribe, who traveled to Washington for two days, tried to convince U.S. legislators that the labor situation is improving in his country.

The Colombian president told Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., that his government is working hard to protect labor union leaders, forbid child labor and boost the minimum wage.

DOJ_NMG_0094740

Colombia's labor laws and environmental standards have been criticized by U.S. Democrats in several trade deals in the past, said Alberto Ramos, a New York-based analyst with Goldman Sachs.

"Legislators want to make sure trade is free and that labor standards aren't too low in the other country so that companies don't get an unfair advantage," Ramos said.

Colombia is considered one of the most dangerous countries on earth for labor unions. About 56 union activists have been killed so far this year, according to the countries' unions. The Colombian government says that 46 union leaders and unionized workers have been killed so far in 2006.

More than 3,800 union leaders and activists have been assassinated since the mid-1980s, according to the John F. Henning Center for International Labor Relations at the University of California Berkley.

Also, about 1.6 million children were working in Colombia in 2001, according to the most recent figures available from the government, while the non-profit organization Save the Children estimates that 2.5 million children are working in the country.

The Colombian government wants the U.S. Congress to extend the trade preferences Colombian producers enjoy at least until a free-trade agreement reached by both countries takes effect. The preferences are scheduled to expire on Dec. 31.

Colombia hopes the extension of the trade preferences will be followed by the ratification of the free-trade agreement by the U.S. Congress.

"It is important to get the preferences, but investors liken preferences to a unilateral decision that is unstable in the future," Uribe said after meeting Rangel. "They don't give certainty so that people make the investments Colombia requires to create enough jobs and to have the means to overcome poverty," he added.

Rangel, who will likely take over the chairmanship of the House Ways and Means Committee next year, said the U.S. Congress will review the free trade agreement but won't "reopen" the negotiations.

Last week, Rangel said he wouldn't support free trade agreements reached with Peru and Colombia unless the labor provisions are renegotiated. Congressional Democrats say the pacts' labor provisions are inadequate.

Congress authorized the Andean Trade Preferences Act, or ATPA, in 1991 to allow Colombia, Peru, Ecuador and Bolivia to export many products to the U.S. duty free, with the goal of creating new economic alternatives to the illegal cocaine trade. Congress renewed and enhanced the program in 2002.

The Bush administration hopes to replace the ATPA with the free-trade agreements.

The free-trade agreement between Colombia and the U.S. is scheduled to be signed by both governments on Nov. 22 but will still need to be ratified by the legislatures of both countries. For Peru, the agreement only needs to be ratified by the U.S. Congress.

Several U.S. official have asked Congress to extend the trade preferences, echoing requests made by Peruvian and Colombian officials.

Peru Still Hopes For US Free-Trade Pact Approval - Envoy (WSJ/DJ)

Wall Street Journal/Dow Jones, November 14, 2006

LIMA (Dow Jones)--Peru hopes that the U.S. Congress will approve an already-negotiated free trade agreement, but opposes reopening the pact to make changes to labor standards, the Peruvian government's trade envoy to the U.S., Hernando de Soto, said.

Peru's Congress has approved the deal, worked out by the executive branches in both nations, but the deal has yet to be approved in the U.S. Congress, where recent election gains by members of the Democratic party could weaken support for free-trade deals.

"Everyone is in agreement that we have to fight for the deal now, as we have more possibilities to make our points in 2006, since in 2007 it appears that the situation for more free trade deals will deteriorate," de Soto, an economist, said in a radio interview.

The Peruvian government opposes reopening the pact, de Soto added.

"Our strategy is to not accept a change in the free trade deal itself, for some simple reasons. One is that the negotiations have been closed and to reopen them would be to reopen the contract, and possibly to take it past the date that the government of the U.S. has for the authorization for the negotiations with U.S., which is June 2007," he said.

The Peruvian government is open, however, to the idea of including improvements to labor standards, but in a side deal, he said.

Some politicians in the U.S. have been pushing for U.S. trading partners to comply with international labor standards.

De Soto also said that the Peruvian government wants an extension to the current trade deal that allows products from some Andean nations to enter into the U.S. with reduced tariffs. That deal, known as the Andean Pact Trade and Drug Enforcement Agreement, or APTDEA, is set to expire at the end of this year.

DOJ_NMG_0094741

Prime Minister Jorge del Castillo said at a press conference Monday that if the overall free trade deal isn't approved, then it is almost "a done deal" that an extension to the APTDEA will be approved. That agreement has allowed for Peruvian textile exports to expand sharply.

Peru started the free trade talks alongside Colombia and Ecuador in 2004.

While Colombia and Peru reached deals with the U.S., talks between Ecuador and the U.S. fell apart, although the pact has become an issue in the current election campaign in Ecuador.

Colombian and Peruvian officials continue to meet with U.S. legislators to gain support for the trade initiatives.

JP Morgan said in a report Tuesday that, "FTA ratification may take the back seat for now, but it is likely to take place sometime in the first half of 2007."

Wall St Rules Out Progress On LatAm Trade Deals Until 07 (WSJ/DJ)

Wall Street Journal/Dow Jones, November 14, 2006

NEW YORK (Dow Jones)--Amid an increasingly uncertain political climate in the U.S. for free trade, Peru and Colombia have sent delegations to Washington this week to lobby for their respective bilateral agreements.

Their efforts come after the House of Representatives failed to pass legislation late Monday granting permanent normal trade status to Vietnam. While lawmakers could approve the measure under a different rule, the Monday vote was a setback for President George W. Bush's administration, which is expected to see its trade policy stymied by a Democrat-controlled legislature.

Given the murky environment for free trade deals, Wall Street investment firms are sounding more sure that the Peru and Colombia FTAs won't be considered in the U.S. Congress until next year.

"We do not discard that the Democratic Congress may decide to support the FTA signings with Peru and Colombia given their friendly and strategic relationship with the US," HSBC said in a Tuesday research note. "However, we are not optimistic that will happen any time soon."

Peru's FTA has already been ratified in the Andean country's legislature. Colombia and the U.S. still need to sign their deal, a step that President Alvaro Uribe said should took place on Nov. 22.

Goldman Sachs said Tuesday the U.S. government has told Peru that "due to the current political juncture," it will not send the FTA to Congress for a vote "for at least a number of weeks." In Goldman Sachs' calculations, this timeline would also push legislative approval of the Peru deal until sometime in 2007. JPMorgan echoed this view in a Tuesday report as well, saying "FTA ratification may take the backseat for now."

Analysts have said it was far more likely that the Bush administration would push for renewal of the Andean Trade Preference Act during the current Congress' lame-duck session. Deputy U.S. Trade Representative John Veroneau confirmed this approach on Tuesday, saying the government is seeking to extend those preferences "in a timely fashion, so as to minimize any business disruptions." The ATPA, which is scheduled to expire at year-end, eliminates duties on many imports from Colombia, Peru, Ecuador and Bolivia in exchange for drug-control measures.

In the case of Ecuador, whose free trade talks with the U.S. ran aground after the country rescinded an operating contract with Occidental Petroleum (OXY) and took over the company's oilfields, a one-year extension of the Andean trade preferences is "the most Ecuador can aspire to," Goldman Sachs said.

Temporary renewal of the preferences for Colombia and Peru, which have enjoyed much better relations with the U.S., is also crucial in the absence of full FTAs.

Speaking about Colombia, Credit Suisse said in a Tuesday report that "failing to secure at least the extension of preferential trade benefits would impact negatively the country's external accounts, investment prospects, and employment capacity."

The fate of Peru and Colombia's FTAs will depend largely on what kinds of additional labor provisions Democrats will seek when the new Congress convenes. Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., who is in line to helm the House Ways and Means Committee, said last week the labor provisions in both countries' deals need to be renegotiated. But Peru, for its part, is resistant to altering the agreement.

"Our strategy is not to accept a change in the free trade deal itself, for some simple reasons," Hernande de Soto, Peru's trade envoy to the U.S., said in a Tuesday radio interview. "One is that the negotiations have been closed and to reopen them would be to reopen the contract, and possibly to take it past" the expiration of the Bush administration's Trade Promotion Authority in June 2007.

Under TPA, lawmakers can vote yes or no on deals but not amend them. This fast-track authority passed by a slim margin when it last came up for renewal, and its extension is not widely expected for next year.

DOJ_NMG_0094742

"At this point, it is unclear whether (the Colombia FTA) will be approved next year before President Bush's trade negotiating authority expires in mid-2007," Credit Suisse said.

IMMIGRATION:

Fingerprint Database Lets Police Identify Criminal Immigrants (AP)

By Jeremiah Marquez, The Associated Press

AP, November 15, 2006

LOS ANGELES - Jesus F. Palacios was arrested last month after sheriff's deputies spotted him trying to jimmy a car door.

Using newly acquired access to federal immigration files, they scanned his fingerprints into a database at the police station and instantly determined the 30-year-old Mexican was a previously deported illegal immigrant with a criminal record.

Deputies alerted federal authorities and got an order to hold Palacios on suspicion of immigration violations. He had been removed from the U.S. at least three times after being convicted of child molestation and grand theft auto.

In the past, suspects like Palacios may have been freed on bail as deputies waited for hours for federal and state officials to do a background check.

But now, as part of a post-Sept. 11 crackdown, the Department of Homeland Security and the Justice Department are working to give local authorities rapid access to fingerprint data that can help determine if suspects under arrest are in this country illegally.

"It has been a tremendous advantage to local law enforcement," said Los Angeles County sheriff's Lt. Larry Bryant, who manages the database. "There would be a very good chance these people would be undetected and be released if we didn't have this capability."

The Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department and nearly 50 other Southern California police and law enforcement agencies have been given rapid access to federal records on criminal immigrants. So have the police in Boston and Dallas.

The U.S. government intends to make information available to all local law enforcement agencies in the nation within two years to help catch criminal immigrants, people with ties to terrorist groups, and others who pose a threat.

"We need more people on the ground with information who can act," said Robert Mocny, acting director of the Home Security visitor-technology program.

Civil rights advocates worry that enlisting local authorities could chill relations in communities where police rely on immigrants to come forward with information about crimes without fearing their own status will be checked.

"The No. 1 tool law enforcement uses to solve crimes is law enforcement-community cooperation," said John Trasvina, president of the Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund.

In Los Angeles County, Bryant said there is no indication officers have arrested people just to check their immigration status. "We've got better things to do," he said.

This year, federal authorities have placed immigration holds on more than 6,700 inmates in jails operated by the Sheriff's Department, according to the government.

Since police in Los Angeles County started using the database in September, they have identified and detained about 130 illegal immigrants with criminal records.

Among them were:

- A 31-year-old Mexican national deported in 1999 after being convicted of attempted extortion. He was arrested in East Los Angeles in September on suspicion of the same crime.

- A 36-year-old Mexican man with convictions for burglary and taking a car without consent. He was twice deported, and caught once attempting to cross the border. In September, he was arrested by the Sheriff's Department on suspicion of carrying a concealed or loaded firearm registered to someone else.

In most cases, local authorities cannot legally hold suspects longer than four hours before releasing them on bail or with a citation, Bryant said. However, it often took the FBI and state agencies longer than that to check a suspect's fingerprints and return results, he said.

The new database - housed in the Sheriff's Department and accessible to other law enforcement agencies in the county - cuts that time to minutes.

If there is a match, the agency contacts a federal law enforcement center in Burlington, Vt., to request an immigration hold. The suspect is turned over to federal authorities only after the local criminal case has been resolved.

Palacios faces charges of failing to register as a sex offender and using fake citizenship papers. He was not charged with trying to break into the car because it belonged to an acquaintance, authorities said.

More Immigrants Seeking Asylum Cite Gang Violence (WP)

By N.C. Aizenman

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

Increasing numbers of Salvadorans, Hondurans and Guatemalans are entering the United States illegally and applying for asylum on the grounds that their lives are imperiled by gang violence in their home countries, according to immigration lawyers and advocacy groups.

Although the number granted asylum barely surpassed 700 last year, asylum applications by people from those three countries have almost doubled, which lawyers attribute primarily to fear of gang violence.

The lawyers hope to persuade judges to more readily grant asylum to those who have risked reprisal by resisting extortion demands by gangs, testifying against gang members, renouncing their own membership in gangs or trying to avoid being forced to join gangs.

Gang violence has grown to epidemic proportions in the three countries since the mid-1990s, when the United States began sending Central American-born members of the rival Los Angeles-based Mara Salvatrucha and Mara 18 gangs back to their home countries. The deportees helped fuel the rise of ferocious sister gangs in Central America, whose estimated 60,000 members are now battling each other, the police and residents in hundreds of communities.

Many of those who say they fled gangs end up in the Washington area, which has one of the nation's largest Central American immigrant populations.

Jose Hernandez, a soft-spoken 19-year-old currently living in a shelter in the District, said he left El Salvador in 2004 after a close friend was gunned down in his home town of Yayantique. Both Hernandez and his friend had been resisting entreaties to join MS-13.

A few days later, Hernandez said, several tattooed gang members grabbed him on the street, held a knife against his stomach and warned him to join "or you'll end up like your friend."

Such accounts are common, said Eric Sigmon, who runs a project for the National Center for Refugee and Immigrant Children that finds pro bono lawyers for unaccompanied minors stopped at the U.S. border. Of the roughly 1,500 Central American children interviewed since the project began 16 months ago, about half cited fear of gang violence as a reason for embarking on the dangerous trek north.

"These are not kids who are leaving just because they feel like it one day," Sigmon said.

Brittney Nystrom of the Capital Area Immigrants' Rights Coalition, which provides a similar service to adult illegal immigrants held in five detention centers in Virginia, said that "literally every week" she comes across an illegal immigrant who left his or her country because of gang violence or fears returning because of it.

Immigration lawyers have responded with a budding effort to win asylum for their clients. And the growing awareness of gang violence may well explain why the number of Salvadorans, Hondurans and Guatemalans filing asylum claims in U.S. immigration courts jumped from about 7,000 in fiscal 2004 to more than 13,000 in fiscal 2006.

Geoff Thale, an expert on Central American gangs at the Washington Office on Latin America, a nonprofit advocacy group, dates the trend to spring 2005, when asylum lawyers first began contacting him for background information on gangs in Central America. Since then, Thale has received about 100 such calls, two or three a week.

But asylum claims are hardly an easy route to legalization: Only 721 Salvadorans, Hondurans and Guatemalans were granted asylum for any reason in fiscal 2005.

U.S. law requires that an applicant prove his fear of violence is credible and that the threat is based on his race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group or political opinion. Immigration judges have frequently ruled against applicants who were victims of gangs because of bad luck or who have faced conscription by a gang simply because they were young and male.

But some judges have been amenable to more nuanced arguments.

Last year, an immigration judge based in Arlington County granted asylum to a 14-year-old Salvadoran boy whose father had a dispute with gang members. After the father died, gang members began harassing the boy -- at one point beating him so badly they broke his arm, according to the boy's attorney, Christina Wilkes of the D.C.-based immigrant assistance center Ayuda.

"The judge found that my client was persecuted based on belonging to his family and that this constituted membership in a 'particular social group' protected under asylum law," Wilkes said. The boy now lives with an uncle in Northern Virginia.

Several lawyers also have argued that someone who faces retaliation for refusing to join a gang for religious reasons or because he opposes the gang's values is being persecuted based on a political view and is therefore eligible for asylum. Wilkes, who also represents Hernandez, said she is hoping to argue that in his case.

Former gang members who worry that they will be killed as punishment for defecting sometimes have been recognized as a protected group by immigration judges. But those judges are often reluctant to grant asylum to former members, opting instead for a less-generous form of relief known as "withdrawal of removal."

Those granted withdrawal of removal cannot receive federal assistance or apply for permanent residency. The decision permits U.S. authorities to deport immigrants to someplace other than their home country. In practice, however, they are allowed to remain in the United States indefinitely.

That was relief enough for attorney Jason Dzubow's client, a 29-year-old construction worker who faced deportation back to El Salvador after he was picked up for driving while intoxicated in Virginia.

During an interview in Dzubow's presence, the construction worker, who said he was fearful of being identified by name, said he grew up in a neighborhood of the city of San Miguel that was so dominated by gangs that the corpses of their victims would remain on the street because no one dared move them. He said he was forced to join MS-13 when he was a teenager but fled to the District when gang members handed him a gun and ordered him to kill a cousin belonging to the rival Mara 18 gang.

The construction worker, who is married to a U.S. citizen and has two U.S.-born children, had since tried to cover a large "1" and "3" tattooed on his right and left shoulders with new tattoos of snarling panthers. But he was terrified that other MS-13 members on his deportation flight would see through the ruse and realize he had tried to renounce the gang -- a virtual death sentence.

When the judge ruled that he could stay in the United States, his wife recalled, "it was almost like he couldn't breathe."

"It was incredible," he agreed. "I felt like I was reborn."

Martinez Hits 'Enforcement Only' (WT)

By Stephen Dinan And Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, November 15, 2006

Sen. Mel Martinez, President Bush's choice to become chairman of the Republican National Committee, said his goal will be to undo the election damage done by the border-enforcement-first message of most Republicans -- which he called "harshness only."

Mr. Martinez's nomination -- which must be approved by the RNC at its January meeting -- is Mr. Bush's first major political step since last week's elections, and it is already creating division among rank-and-file Republicans, who say it puts the party on the wrong side of the immigration issue.

"I would say it's another Harriet Miers moment," said Randy Pullen, an RNC committee member from Arizona, referring to the doomed pick for the Supreme Court.

Mr. Bush announced the nomination in the Oval Office, saying Mr. Martinez would keep his Florida Senate seat and serve as honorary chairman, or the public face of the party. Mr. Bush also nominated Mike Duncan, the RNC's general counsel, as chairman responsible for day-to-day operations, and asked Jo Ann Davidson to remain co-chairman.

Chairman Ken Mehlman is not seeking to remain in office.

Speaking to reporters after the Oval Office announcement, Mr. Martinez said he was "not going to do a post-mortem on the election here today." Moments later, though, he did a post-mortem on immigration, saying he saw a clear message on that issue.

"I think we have to understand that the election did speak to one issue, and that was that -- it's not about bashing people, it's about presenting a hopeful face," said Mr. Martinez, who won his seat in 2004.

He was one of the authors of the Senate compromise that would have allowed most illegal aliens to remain in the United States and pay small fines in return for a path to citizenship.

"Border security only, enforcement only, harshness only is not the message that I believe America wants to convey," Mr. Martinez said.

His proposal passed the Senate, though a majority of Republicans voted against it. The House, however, passed an enforcement-first strategy. Even the RNC voted unanimously in August to adopt a resolution calling for border and interior enforcement, and Mr. Pullen said Mr. Martinez as chairman would run contrary to that message.

Some RNC members had pleaded for Mr. Bush to nominate Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, a prominent black Republican who in his losing Senate campaign this year argued against amnesty for illegal aliens.

Rejecting Mr. Steele raised hackles among some RNC members, who traditionally rubber-stamp a sitting president's choice for chairman. Members wondered whether the choice of Mr. Martinez was a signal of Mr. Bush's desire to focus more on burnishing his presidential legacy, rather than on rebuilding a winning party for 2008.

"I don't know whether this is Harriet Miers and cronyism all over again, since I don't know that much about Martinez and his relationship with Bush and Rove," said Texas RNC member Bill Crocker, referring to the White House adviser.

"But I wish they wouldn't try to control this thing, the way this White House micromanages everything. We'd be better off with an independent voice to support the president and work for the good of the party."

Dr. Buddy Witherspoon, an RNC member from Columbia, S.C., said a black conservative such as Mr. Steele would have been an "excellent choice." But Dr. Witherspoon, who is white, worried just how much Mr. Steele, Mr. Martinez or anyone whom "Karl Rove chooses" will be able to speak for the future of the Republican Party.

As Mr. Bush pushes the RNC in his direction on immigration, House Republicans move the other way, with Rep. Mike Pence of Indiana, a contender for the House minority leader's post, saying yesterday that he will oppose Mr. Bush's bill.

"What is coming at us now is going to be a massive amnesty bill that will likely be propounded not only by Democrats in the House and Senate, but frankly also by the White House," he said in an interview with radio host Laura Ingraham.

Conservatives Wary Of Choice To Lead RNC (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten And Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush's decision to back Sen. Mel Martinez to help lead the Republican Party, a move intended to appeal to disaffected Latino voters, drew sharp criticism Tuesday from some of the party's core conservatives, who disdain the Florida lawmaker's support for liberalized immigration laws.

The decision to name the Cuban-born Martinez as Republican National Committee general chairman served as an acknowledgment that the GOP had lost ground among Latinos; in last week's midterm election, the Republican share of the Latino vote dropped to 30% from more than 40% in 2004. Party leaders have said they need to build more support among Latinos for the GOP to regain its dominance.

Martinez supported legislation to create a guest worker program and a path to citizenship for many immigrants who are in this country illegally; Bush and many Latinos also backed versions of that plan. But the legislation that passed the Senate this year created a firestorm of opposition among conservative Republicans and much of the House GOP leadership, who derided it as amnesty for lawbreakers.

Criticism of Martinez came Tuesday from several conservatives, including Curly Haugland, an RNC member from North Dakota, who said he believed the party was far too focused on pandering to minorities.

"We're losing our base in droves because they don't get campaigned to," he said, referring to GOP-leaning conservatives.

Randy Pullen of Arizona, another RNC member and an activist against illegal immigration, likened Martinez's selection to the episode last year in which Bush named his longtime friend and legal counsel to the Supreme Court, only to reverse himself after a furious conservative backlash.

"I'm hoping that it's not another Harriet Miers moment," Pullen said.

Another leading critic of Bush's stance on immigration, Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), chairman of the Congressional Immigration Reform Caucus, offered tepid support for Martinez.

Tancredo called the senator a "competent spokesman for our party," but added that if he "rejects the will of rank-and-file Republicans and uses the position to advocate for things like the president's amnesty proposal, then I believe the party could be headed for another shellacking at the polls in 2008."

Members of the Republican National Committee will meet in January to replace outgoing Chairman Ken Mehlman, who will leave after a two-year term in which an aggressive minority outreach effort was hampered by the immigration debate and other issues.

Despite the unhappiness among some RNC members over Martinez's selection, he is expected to win election as general chairman, making him the GOP's most visible spokesman leading up to the 2008 presidential election. The party's general counsel, Robert M. "Mike" Duncan, is expected to become RNC chairman and run day-to-day operations.

Bush introduced Martinez in a brief Oval Office ceremony Tuesday as his recommended pick for the party leadership.

The selection, which became public Monday, made it clear that Bush and his chief political strategist, Karl Rove, believed the party's future depended on striking a moderate image on immigration. It also suggested that the White House saw the party's support for get-tough legislation on the issue as contributing to its midterm election losses.

Conservative lawmakers not only stopped Bush's guest worker plan in Congress this year, but they passed a law calling for 700 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border. Bush signed the legislation in the waning days of the campaign in hopes of galvanizing conservative voters.

But the move failed to save several Republican candidates who had called for an illegal-immigration crackdown. And exit polls suggested that many Latinos abandoned the GOP as a reaction to rhetoric that they viewed as negative toward all immigrants, legal and illegal.

Martinez demonstrated Tuesday that he would not shy away from the vision of immigration laws that he and Bush had long supported. Emerging from his White House meeting with the president, he told reporters that his party struck the wrong tone on immigration during the election, a tone he promised to change. "Border security only, enforcement only, harshness only, is not the message that I believe America wants to convey," he said.

Martinez, 60, whose full name is Melquiades Rafael Martinez, fled Cuba at age 15 with assistance from a program that helped children leave the communist country. He lived with foster families until he was reunited with his family four years later.

A trial lawyer, he was the elected chairman of Orange County, Fla., and was later chosen by Bush to be housing secretary. In 2004, he became the first Cuban American to be elected to the Senate.

Latino leaders and Republican strategists said elevating Martinez's profile could rebuild goodwill among minority voters.

"You take a Hispanic senator who happens to be Catholic, and that's a direct response to a community that happens to be disappointed," said Al Cardenas, a former chairman of the Republican Party of Florida who, like Martinez, was born in Cuba but moved to the U.S. to flee Fidel Castro.

The Rev. Luis Cortes Jr., founder of the influential Philadelphia-based ministry Esperanza USA, who has been courted by the White House over the last six years, said Martinez's selection made an important statement to conservatives who had backed strict proposals, such as one that would have made it a felony to help illegal immigrants.

"A lot of the Republican candidates chose immigration as the wedge issue, and polls seem to bear out that it was an error for them to do that," Cortes said. "And I think Mel Martinez, because of his life story, is a perfect person to help them find their way back from that era."

White House political director Sara Taylor said Martinez could "communicate with the fastest-growing population in a way they can relate to."

She added that he would prove crucial in building Latino support in a post-Bush era. "We've seen in the last election that the president's popularity [with Latinos] is not transferable to House and Senate candidates," Taylor said.

Martinez will remain in the Senate. He won his seat there in 2004, after the White House urged him to run.

GOP strategists said Martinez would help build support for the party in Florida, a 2008 battleground state.

Martinez said he would remain neutral in the Republican presidential primaries, though he appeared during this year's campaign with one leading contender, Arizona Sen. John McCain, after they both endorsed Florida Gov.-elect Charlie Crist in his primary.

Even with Republicans soon to be in the minority on Capitol Hill, there is no assurance that an immigration overhaul package will pass. The Democrats preparing to take power in the House and Senate are also struggling with their approach to the issue.

Democratic leaders are trying to balance their desire to woo Latino voters with concerns from some labor leaders that new immigration laws would lead to lower wages.

Moreover, some in the party fear that passing a guest worker program and pathway to citizenship for illegal immigrants would leave Democrats vulnerable to being portrayed as soft on illegal immigration.

Martino: U.S.-Mexico Fence Plan Inhumane (AP)

By Frances D'emilio

AP, November 15, 2006

A top Vatican official on Tuesday denounced a U.S. plan to build more fences along the Mexican border as "inhumane," and compared the project to the Cold War-era Berlin Wall.

Cardinal Renato Martino, who heads the Holy See's office concerned with migrant and itinerant peoples, urged the United States to allow more foreigners to enter legally.

"I must note, unfortunately, that in a world which greeted with joy the fall of the Berlin Wall, others are being erected between neighborhood and neighborhood, city and city, nation and nation," he said at a news conference to present Pope Benedict XVI's annual message about migrants.

Bishops in the U.S. and Mexico have opposed Washington's plan to build 690 miles of additional fencing along the border and on Tuesday, Martino praised their stance against what he called an "inhumane" project.

The law authorizing the fence was signed on Oct. 26 by President Bush, who called it "an important step in our nation's efforts to secure our borders."

An estimated 11 million Mexicans live in the United States, about half of whom are undocumented.

Martino also denounced trafficking in humans — particularly women forced to become prostitutes and children forced into labor.

DOJ_NMG_0094747

"This trafficking in human beings has intensified, persons put into slavery because they depend on certain criminals who take possession of these human beings," he said.

He said human trafficking today is worse than the trade in African slaves of past centuries.

"It's worse than the slavery of those ... taken from Africa and brought to other countries," he said, but did not cite any figures.

A 2005 State Department report on human trafficking estimated that 600,000 to 800,000 men, women and children are trafficked across borders each year — 80 percent of them women.

The cardinal challenged countries to combat modern-day slavery.

"In a world which proclaims human rights left and right, let's see what it does about the rights of so many human beings which are not respected, but trampled," the cardinal said.

'Guest Workers' Sue Companies Over Pay (USAT)

By Laura Parker

USA Today, November 15, 2006

Armenio Pablo-Calmo, a Guatemalan national, spent six winters as a tree planter in the pine forests of the South as part of a "guest worker" program that is required under federal law to pay him the prevailing wage for such jobs.

That ranges from $6.32 an hour in North Carolina to $9.20 an hour in Alabama, according to the U.S. Labor Department. Pablo-Calmo says he and his co-workers were paid less than the federal minimum wage of $5.15 an hour, were not paid overtime and often were required to pay for their own tools, visas and travel costs. Last year, they sued Eller and Sons Trees, their employer, for back wages and reimbursement of out-of-pocket costs.

A federal judge classified the case as a class-action lawsuit on Sept. 28; the case now involves about 6,000 tree planters. It is drawing national attention as one of several legal challenges to the H-2B visa program, which admits 66,000 foreigners into the USA each year to do temporary manual labor. As President Bush has proposed tripling the number of such visas issued each year, the H-2B program has come under criticism from the Southern Poverty Law Center and other groups that say it has been used by employers to exploit guest workers.

The center, which filed the lawsuit involving Pablo-Calmo, also has sued three other forestry companies as well as a hotel chain on behalf of foreigners who have worked at 15 hotels in New Orleans since Hurricane Katrina. One of the forestry suits was settled in September, when Idaho-based Alpha Services agreed to pay a group of Latino workers an undisclosed sum for back pay and travel costs, according to court papers.

"We hope this has a huge impact and other employers see they cannot just choose to hire guest workers and then abuse them with no consequences," says Mary Bauer, an attorney at the law center.

Organized labor has long opposed the H-2B program and other guest-worker initiatives, arguing that they are used to abuse immigrants and undermine wages for U.S. citizens. Eller and Sons and other employers targeted in the lawsuits reject the notion of any abuse and say that such programs help fill jobs most Americans won't do.

Larry Stine, an Atlanta lawyer who represents the four forestry companies, says that the claims in the lawsuits are "overblown" and that the workers are overstating their hours on the job.

"This is not a case about people being exploited," he says.

The Ellers' suit also accuses the firm's recruiters in Guatemala of requiring laborers to hand over deeds to their property to get jobs in the USA. Stine says the company was unaware of the practice until the lawsuit was filed and that it has been stopped. He says workers were asked to leave deeds with recruiters temporarily to try to ensure the workers would return to Guatemala.

Border Vigilantism Alleged In Ariz. Case (WP)

By Tim Gaynor

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

BISBEE, Ariz., Nov. 14 -- A rancher accused of holding a Mexican American family at gunpoint went on trial in this southern Arizona town Tuesday in a case highlighting border vigilantism, rights groups said.

Roger Barnett is being tried at Cochise County Superior Court, 90 miles southeast of Tucson, in a civil suit brought by two local families seeking more than $200,000 in damages over an incident during a hunting jaunt two years ago.

Ronald and Renee Morales say their family was assaulted, battered and falsely imprisoned by Barnett during the deer hunting trip on Oct. 30, 2004. All are U.S. citizens of Mexican heritage.

In court documents, the family said Barnett loaded an assault rifle and leveled it at the group, then harangued and abused the couple, their two daughters and the daughter of another family also named in the suit.

DOJ_NMG_0094748

Barnett, who runs a tow-truck company in the rugged corner of southeast Arizona, denies the allegations and says the family was trespassing on his land.

Numerous incidents of vigilante violence have been reported on the U.S.-Mexican border in recent years, including some Hispanic voters being harassed by men in paramilitary combat gear in Tucson during the Nov. 7 midterm elections. Rights activists say the Barnett case is particularly disturbing because the Moraleses are U.S. citizens. Ronald Morales is a veteran who served in the U.S. Navy for six years.

"This lawsuit demonstrates that border vigilante violence has not been limited just to immigrant men, women and children crossing the Arizona border," said Jennifer Allen, director of the Border Action Network.

"In this case, Mexican American girls, their father and grandfather were afraid they were going to be shot and killed by a man who boasts that he's detained more than 10,000 immigrants," she added.

The suit names two other plaintiffs, Edward and Ana English, Their daughter Emma was traveling in the car stopped by Barnett, along with the Morales's two daughters, Venese, then 11, and Angelique, then 9.

Barnett faces another suit brought by the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund last year. It alleges that he held a group of illegal entrants at gunpoint on his property.

That suit asserts that he kicked an immigrant as she lay on the ground and threatened to set his dogs on anyone who tried to leave the area.

Barnett called the plaintiffs in that case "racist liars" and denied that the incident took place. The case has yet to be brought to trial.

Lawyers began jury selection in Bisbee Monday for the current trial, which is scheduled to continue into next week.

Texas Town Cracks Down On Illegal Aliens, Expects Suit (WT)

By Hugh Aynesworth

The Washington Times, November 15, 2006

FARMERS BRANCH, Texas -- City Council members Monday night unanimously passed ordinances they hope will curtail illegal aliens, but said they expected the new laws to be fought in court.

Hundreds were turned away from City Hall, and the council chamber itself was filled to legal occupancy as the city leaders passed the strictest set of ordinances against illegal entry in any Texas city.

Specifically, the 6-0 votes authorized fines for property owners who rent to illegal aliens and designated English as the official language -- a move designed to end printing and the conduct of city business in both English and Spanish.

Also passed was an ordinance authorizing city police to enter into an agreement with federal immigration officials to target criminal aliens. Opponents, including the League of United Latin American Citizens (LULAC) and the Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund (MALDEF), vowed to file a lawsuit.

"We are here not only to say that these ordinances violate federal law, but that these ordinances drive unnecessary tension in the city," said Marisol Perez, a MALDEF staff lawyer.

LULAC member Carlos Quintanilla said: "You can't promote Farmers Branch as a great city when you are denying people to live in apartments, when you are denying children the right to speak their language."

Mr. Perez said that forcing landlords to determine whether a person seeking to rent an apartment is an illegal alien makes the property owner "wear the shoes of an immigration officer. It's a very difficult position."

Council member Tim O'Hare, a trial lawyer who has been pushing hard for approval of the ordinance, said the city expects to be sued.

Mr. O'Hare, who was cheered by the mostly white citizens who agreed with him, said after the vote that the measures adopted would benefit all those who live in the small city just north of Dallas -- those he said, "who are legal citizens."

One originally proposed crackdown didn't make it to the table -- fining business owners who hire illegal aliens.

"Why not make business owners pay if they hire aliens?" read one sign at the council meeting.

"Guess they got some real heat over that one," groused Emmett G. Smith, who said he had lived in Farmers Branch for 61 years.

In the past three decades, Farmers Branch has grown from a sleepy community of a few thousand mostly white citizens to more than 28,000, 37 percent of whom are Hispanic. More than 75 corporate headquarters are located here, many of them minority-owned.

More than four dozen communities nationwide have considered or plan to consider similar legislation. An even more stringent set of ordinances was passed earlier this year in Hazelton, Pa., with restrictions and fines against landlords who rent to illegal aliens and the denial of business permits to those who hire illegal aliens.

Activists Rap New Test For Citizens (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, November 15, 2006

The federal government intends to replace the current test for U.S. citizenship with one that relies less on knowledge of specific facts and more on an applicant's grasp of democratic principles, but many immigrant-advocacy groups are up in arms about the change, which they worry may discriminate against those who don't speak English and with less education.

"We want to focus more on the building blocks of democracy, rather than the colors of the flag" or questions about the name of the form used to apply for naturalized citizenship, which are on the current test for citizenship, said Chris Bentley, a spokesman for the U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, which is making the change. USCIS is part of the Department of Homeland Security.

Mr. Bentley said USCIS officials want a new test that can ensure that those seeking to become American citizens know about "freedoms guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution and Bill of Rights, such as freedom of speech and freedom of religion."

"Our goal is not to make this test harder or easier for anyone, but to make it much more meaningful," he said.

Mr. Bentley said the proposal to redesign the test for naturalized citizenship came out of a report by a commission headed by former Rep. Barbara Jordan during the Clinton administration that "looked at all kinds of issues related to immigration."

The Jordan commission's report emphasized "effective Americanization of new immigrants, that is the cultivation of a shared commitment to the American values of liberty, democracy and equal opportunity," including policies to "help newcomers learn to speak, read and write English effectively."

The new citizenship test will be administered to all applicants for naturalization nationwide starting in January 2008. However, beginning this winter, at least 5,000 people in 10 cities will take part in a voluntary testing program featuring the new questions.

The number of potential questions will be narrowed from 125 to 100 during the pilot program. To pass, an immigrant must correctly answer six of 10 questions asked.

But more than 220 immigrant organizations, led by the Illinois Coalition of Immigrant and Refugee Rights, have signed a letter to USCIS Director Emilio Gonzalez denouncing the new test, which they worry will make it harder for "poorer legal immigrants with less English and less education" to win U.S. citizenship.

"Already immigrants must pass a citizenship test that many native-born Americans could not pass," say groups that include the National Council of La Raza, National Immigration Forum, Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund, the United Farm Workers of America and the International Brotherhood of Teamsters.

There are some tough questions on the current test and queries that could be described as meaningful. One of the more difficult asks a person to identify amendments to the Constitution guaranteeing voting rights. Others ask what is the "supreme law of the land" -- the U.S. Constitution -- and the Bill of Rights (the first 10 amendments to the Constitution).

Just because the test for American citizenship is being revised "does not mean all the current questions will be done away," said Mr. Bentley. He was unable to provide any sample questions from the new test.

Jack Martin, special-projects director of the Federation for American Immigration Reform (FAIR), a group that is critical of unlimited immigration, said there are both potential improvements and problems with the proposed changes.

"The effort at standardization makes sense ... the concept is good, and there really are some trivial questions on the current test," he said.

"Our only concern is that questions not be dumbed down" so that immigrants could become American citizens "without having a good understanding of U.S. history, culture and social systems, so they can vote intelligently," Mr. Martin said, adding that citizenship tests "should be designed to make sure citizens are prepared to participate in our political process."

As for those worried the new test might be harder or easier, Mr. Bentley said, USCIS intends to avoid those situations "by looking at pass-fail rates of the past."

Researcher Amy Baskerville contributed to this report.

A New Push To Raise Cap On H-1B Visa (NYT)

By Miguel Helft

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Nov. 14 — A coalition of business and education groups is making a renewed push to persuade Congress to raise the number of skilled foreign workers allowed into the United States this year.

DOJ_NMG_0094750

The coalition, which calls itself Compete America and whose members are drawn heavily from the technology industry, sent a letter to every member of Congress on Monday calling for an increase in both the number of so-called H-1B visas, which are used by skilled immigrants and the number of employment-based green cards given to foreign workers.

"The first part is to ensure that U.S. companies have the ability to hire the best and the brightest," said Jack Krumholtz, managing director for federal government affairs at Microsoft. "The second part is about making sure that we are able to retain them."

Microsoft's chairman, Bill Gates, is one of many technology executives who have advocated increased flexibility to hire educated foreign workers like engineers and scientists. He is expected to return to that theme at an industry conference on Wednesday at Stanford University.

Increasing the number of H-1B visas has long been a top legislative priority of technology companies, which say they cannot find enough skilled workers in the United States. After a temporary increase to 195,000 during the years of the Internet boom, the annual number of visas issued has been capped at 65,000. An additional 20,000 visas have been granted to foreign workers who have an advanced degree from an American university.

But in recent years, all the visas allotted for a given year were claimed on or before the start of the fiscal year on Oct. 1.

"We can't hire people," said Jenifer Verdery, director of work force policy at Intel.

The notion of allowing more skilled foreign workers in the United States generally enjoys bipartisan support in Congress. Earlier this year, the Senate passed a bill that would increase the cap on H-1B visas to 115,000 and would automatically raise the cap by a further 20 percent if all visas for a given year were claimed. The bill also would raise the number of employment-based green cards issued to 290,000, from 140,000.

But the bill stalled as the House and Senate deadlocked on broader immigration reform legislation. And not everyone agrees that raising the cap on visas is a good idea.

"We think that before raising the H-1B cap there should be reform of the H-1B system," said Ronil Hira, vice president for career activities at IEEE-USA, a professional organization representing engineers and computer programmers.

The organization, which includes many immigrants among its ranks, is not opposed to legal immigration. But Mr. Hira said that the H-1B visa program, which requires companies to pay foreign workers wages comparable to those they pay American workers, was riddled with loopholes that allow employers to pay subpar wages to immigrants. That, in turn, depresses the wages of American workers, Mr. Hira said.

Lynn Shotwell, chairwoman of Compete America, said there was virtually no chance that Congress would pass the Senate bill this year. But Ms. Shotwell said the coalition, which includes universities and the Chamber of Commerce, was asking Congress to raise the cap on H-1B visas and green cards for the remainder of the fiscal year.

Members of the coalition are hopeful that legislation modeled after the Senate bill could be enacted next year, when Democrats will control Congress. House Democrats have promoted what they are calling an innovation agenda that includes wide availability of visas for skilled immigrants.

The National Venture Capital Association, which is among those advocating an expansion in visas and green cards for skilled workers, is backing that case with a study, to be released Wednesday, that highlights the role of immigrant entrepreneurs in the American economy.

The study found that one in four publicly traded American companies that were initially financed by venture capitalists in the last 15 years included at least one immigrant among their founders. During the 1980s, immigrants were involved in founding one in five such companies, and prior to 1980 only 7 percent.

"The notion of being able to come here and shape your own destiny is tremendously appealing and, you have to believe, valuable for the economy, job creation and wealth creation," said Axel Bichara, a partner at Atlas Venture in Boston. Mr. Bichara came to the United States from Germany in 1986 to study at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. A year later, he became co-founder of a software company.

Judge Delays KPMG Tax Trial Over Legal Fees Dispute (NYT)

By Lynnley Browning

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

A federal judge has indefinitely postponed the trial of former employees of the accounting firm KPMG in a criminal tax shelter case, citing concerns that the defendants will not be able to pay their lawyers.

DOJ_NMG_0094751

The judge also hinted at sanctions against the prosecution for pressuring the firm to stop paying the defendants' legal fees. Any sanctions could have a major impact on the way white-collar criminal cases are handled in the future.

The ruling, made late Monday by Judge Lewis A. Kaplan of the Federal District Court in Manhattan, is the latest twist in the federal case against 16 former KPMG employees and an outside investment adviser and lawyer. Prosecutors say that the defendants made, sold and used questionable tax shelters that cost the Treasury $2.5 billion in unpaid taxes.

Judge Kaplan had previously pushed back the start of the trial from September 2006 to January 2007.

Prosecutors say the case is the largest criminal tax-fraud trial in history. But it has also become something of a referendum on the prosecutorial tactics adopted in the wake of Enron and other corporate scandals. Those tactics include urging firms under investigation to cut off the payment of legal fees of employees caught up in inquiries. KPMG abandoned its longstanding practice and cut off legal fees to the defendants in early 2004, before the employees were indicted and as the firm itself came under investigation for its work with tax shelters.

KPMG, which averted criminal indictment last year by reaching a $456 million deferred-prosecution agreement with the Justice Department, says that it has no intention of paying the fees because it was defrauded by the defendants.

In his ruling, Judge Kaplan again disagreed with KPMG and the government on the issue of legal fees.

"This court found, after a full evidentiary hearing, that the government violated the rights of the KPMG defendants by inducing KPMG — which otherwise would have advanced defense costs — to cut off payments upon indictment," Judge Kaplan wrote. "If KPMG is obliged to pay, payment could greatly mitigate the impact of the government's improper actions. This in turn could diminish the advisability of dismissal or other potentially serious sanctions. If KPMG is not obliged to pay, or if a prompt determination is not feasible, the issue of sanctions could be considered after exhaustion of that possibility."

Judge Kaplan has indicated in several rulings that he wants the fee issue resolved before the trial begins. He wrote in Monday's ruling that some of the defendants would not be able to afford their legal bills, which he said could amount to a million dollars or more a person, without help from KPMG.

The KPMG defendants were indicted last year on charges of conspiring to defraud the government by creating, selling and in some cases using for their own purposes questionable tax shelters. Judge Kaplan wrote that "while it appears that some of the KPMG defendants may be well off, there is a real and growing possibility that some and perhaps all lack funds necessary to their defense."

Both KPMG and the the United States attorney's office in Manhattan have denied coercing the defendants. Representatives for both the firm and prosecutors declined to comment yesterday. Several lawyers for the defendants, who include a former vice chairman of KPMG and a former chief financial officer, also declined to comment.

Judge Kaplan earlier allowed the defendants to file a related civil lawsuit against KPMG, seeking payment of the fees. KPMG is contesting the claim, and an appeals court will hear arguments on the issue this month.

ETJudge Postpones KPMG Tax Shelter Trial (FT)

Financial Times, November 15, 2006

One of the Department of Justice's most high-profile white-collar crime cases has been dealt a blow after a New York federal judge postponed indefinitely the criminal trial of 16 former KPMG executives accused of selling illegal tax shelters.

The ruling represents a setback for prosecutors in the US attorney's office in the southern district of New York, who have been heavily criticised by Judge Lewis Kaplan for their role in pressing KPMG, the accounting firm, to cut off legal fees to its former employees.

Judge Kaplan cited a dispute over whether KPMG would pay the fees in a five-page ruling on Monday.

"Given all of the current uncertainties, it is impossible now to predict with confidence when the charges in the indictment may be tried," he said, adding that there was a "real and growing possibility" that the defendants did not have the funds to pay for their own defence.

The dispute that caused Judge Kaplan to delay the trial centres on KPMG's unwillingness to pay the legal fees.

The firm has said the defendants "breached their fiduciary duties to the partnership and were indicted, thereby putting the future of the firm and its assets at risk".

But the ruling will also put intense pressure on the justice department to rethink its approach to some cases and is likely to spur debate in some quarters of Congress about the prosecution tactics that have been deployed in the Bush administration's effort to stamp out white-collar crime.

The justice department is at odds with the legal and business community over a set of principles known as the Thompson Memorandum, which the department adopted in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0094752

The memo says companies that are under investigation can avoid criminal indictment by agreeing to co-operate fully with prosecutors by cutting off legal fees to employees and waiving attorney-client privilege, which protects the confidentiality of discussions between companies and their legal counsel.

Some of the tactics have come under fire because critics say they force companies and individuals to waive their constitutional rights to avoid indictment.

The US Senate judiciary committee is currently working on bipartisan legislation that would severely constrain the tactics used by the justice department.

That legislation, which has not been finalised, could forbid the DoJ from penalising companies that pay attorneys' fees for employees in cases like KPMG, and prevent the DoJ from pressuring companies to waive attorney-client privilege in exchange for leniency.

The legislation, if passed, is likely to provoke a bitter battle between the Bush administration and the Congress and could be challenged in court as an unconstitutional exercise of congressional power.

Warehouse Owner, Two Other Men Face Tax Charges (MH)

By David Ovalle

The Miami Herald, November 15, 2006

The owner of the Liberty City warehouse where authorities say seven men plotted terror attacks has been arrested and charged with failing to pay taxes and not filing proper tax returns.

George Mobassaleh, 40, and two other men were granted bond Tuesday.

They are charged with failure to remit taxes, filing fraudulent returns, attempting to evade taxes and failure to file six consecutive returns.

The charges are unrelated to the high-profile terror investigation.

In June, seven men were indicted on terrorism conspiracy charges for allegedly plotting to blow up Chicago's Sears Tower and federal facilities.

Authorities say the men rented a Liberty City warehouse, owned by Mobassaleh, for training and to plan their plots. Mobassaleh said he knew nothing about the men.

The Florida Department of Revenue alleges Mobassaleh, Bashir Malouf and Joseph Imbasala failed to pay taxes on more than $100,000.

The men were operating Elegant Beauty Supplies, Joe's Beauty Supplies and two locations of Joe's Foodland Supermarket, all in Miami.

The investigation was spearheaded by the state revenue department, the Miami-Dade state attorney's office, Miami police, the FBI and the state's Division of Alcoholic Beverage Control and Tobacco Enforcement.

Louis J. Terminell, an attorney representing Malouf, said: ``I think most of all this is explainable. If history repeats itself, it's not going to be as nefarious as it seems."

Democrats May Eliminate IRS's Use Of Collection Agencies (WSJ)

By Tom Herman

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

Is the IRS's new private tax-collection program heading for an early death?

After years of congressional debate, the Internal Revenue Service recently began using private debt-collection agencies to help pursue people who owe taxes. The IRS has already turned over the names of more than 13,725 taxpayers who owe the government about $73.5 million.

But the program has run into renewed congressional attacks -- and could well be eliminated -- now that Democrats are poised to take control of the House and Senate. Among the strongest critics are several influential Democrats in line to take over powerful posts next year.

"I think it's a terrible program, and I'm going to let [IRS officials] know in as many political and legislative ways as I can," says Rep. Charles Rangel, the New York Democrat expected to be the next chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee.

Additional criticism has come recently from Sen. Max Baucus, the Montana Democrat who will take over as chairman of the Senate Finance Committee. "Tax collection is an inherent government function and the IRS ought to take care of it in-house," Sen. Baucus says.

The House has already voted to block funding for the debt-collector initiative for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1. The Senate hasn't acted yet. But among those concerned about the IRS program are Sen. Patty Murray of Washington, ranking Democrat on the Senate Appropriations subcommittee that includes Treasury funding.

"I'm deeply concerned that the IRS's plan would not adequately protect taxpayer privacy, would not ensure all taxpayers are treated fairly and respectfully, would not guarantee any cost savings to the U.S. Treasury, and would pre-empt the Senate's debate over outsourcing tax collection," Sen. Murray says. She has co-sponsored legislation with Sen. Byron Dorgan (D., N.D.) to prohibit the IRS from going forward with "this deeply flawed initiative."

IRS Commissioner Mark Everson has defended the program by saying the use of private agencies will help the IRS reduce the "significant and growing amount" of tax liabilities now deemed uncollectible. The private firms will be used to supplement, not replace, IRS personnel, says Mr. Everson, adding that the agency lacks the personnel to go after all outstanding tax bills.

IRS officials say they launched the first phase of the program in mid-September. Three private debt-collection firms are involved. So how is it going so far? "We're cautiously optimistic," says the IRS's Deborah Wolf. "Our experience is these companies are very professional firms" that have "done everything they can to make sure this program is run professionally." She emphasizes there will be a "high level" of oversight by IRS officials.

Here's how the program works: The IRS sends letters to people telling them they will be hearing soon from a private debt-collection company and explains the program. The private firms then follow up with a letter before they call the taxpayers. Ms. Wolf says the debt collectors aren't allowed to ring doorbells or make face-to-face contact with people.

But in the aftermath of the election, "this issue is being looked at differently by the new leadership, and there is momentum building in opposition" to it, says Colleen Kelley, president of the National Treasury Employees Union, which has long opposed hiring private debt collectors. * * *

MORE MUTUAL FUNDS plan unusually large capital-gains distributions in coming weeks.

Fidelity Investments, American Century Investments, T. Rowe Price Associates and several other major fund companies estimate more funds this year will be making year-end capital-gains distributions than a year ago. At some funds, payouts are likely to exceed 5% or 10% of the fund's net asset value -- an issue of concern to many investors in taxable accounts, who could effectively owe on someone else's capital gains. Among the key reasons: the stock market's resurgence, and the fact that more funds have used up capital losses amassed in prior years.

Some distributions are coming soon. The Federated Capital Appreciation fund is paying about 16% of net asset value to shareholders of record today. The pay date will be Friday. The payments are the same for the A, B, C and K shares. The per-share distribution will consist of about 79 cents of short-term gains and around $3.68 of long-term gains, says Meghan McAndrew of Federated Investors.

More Fidelity funds will pay distributions of capital gains this year than in recent years and the amount of the distributions "will generally be higher," a Fidelity spokesman says. Based on estimates through Sept. 30, about 63% of Fidelity's equity funds are expected to pay capital-gains distributions, up from 58% last year, he says. Fidelity says about 60% of its mutual-fund assets are held in tax-deferred accounts, such as 401(k) plans and IRAs.

Some of the biggest payouts come from funds that invest in overseas securities, which have posted especially big gains this year. Among the Fidelity funds planning big payouts that still are open to investors are the Fidelity Europe fund, which plans a payout of about 14% of net asset value, and the Fidelity Worldwide fund, which plans to pay out 12.7% of NAV. The Fidelity Europe Capital Appreciation, Fidelity Overseas and Fidelity Global Balanced funds also plan large payouts.

American Century expects 41 of its funds will make year-end capital-gains distributions this year, up from 35 last year, says the company's Brian Janssen.

Investors in taxable accounts should check carefully before making large investments in funds between now and the end of the year. * * *

IT'S OFFICIAL: The IRS confirms inflation-adjusted tax numbers for 2007.

By law, dozens of tax numbers are adjusted each year for inflation. For example, the IRS says taxable income of more than $349,700 for 2007 will be taxed in most cases at the top federal rate of 35%. That's up from $336,550 for this year. The basic standard deduction will increase to $10,700 for joint returns from $10,300 in 2006.

For most singles, it will increase to $5,350 from $5,150. * * *

IRS Working To Trim A Bit Of Form 1040's Red Tape (USAT)

By Kevin Mccoy

DOJ_NMG_0094754

USA Today, November 15, 2006

The federal government document that tens of millions of Americans love to hate is scheduled to get a face lift.

The IRS plans changes to Form 1040, which most taxpayers use to report their federal taxes, the agency said Tuesday. Taxpayers could begin using a revised form as soon as the 2009 tax filing season, said IRS senior spokesman Terry Lemons.

"What we are shooting for is a form that is simpler and easier to use for taxpayers," said Lemons, confirming mentions of the anticipated revision in a recent Government Accountability Office audit and a report by Tax Analysts, a non-profit organization that tracks tax issues.

As envisioned by the IRS, an as-yet-undetermined number of less-frequently used lines dealing with adjustments to income, credits, taxes and payments would be removed from the cover page of Form 1040 and relocated to a new Schedule O. That would simplify the current 77-line form, and free up space for any future tax reporting changes that could conceivably be approved by Congress and the White House.

Lemons said the changes are still evolving, explaining that "it's still really early in the (planning) process."

Although Form 1040 typically undergoes virtually unnoticed revisions from year to year, it hasn't been subjected to a major overhaul since 1977. According to the IRS, that revision scrapped a two-column format at the top of the tax-filing form and moved the signature line from the cover page to the final entry.

Lemons stressed that the changes being planned are expected to be less radical. Taxpayers "are not going to get a surprise when the new form comes in the mailbox," he said.

Although the IRS tentatively plans to introduce the changes for the 2009 tax filing season, the start date could be delayed by agency funding issues and other logistics, Lemons said.

Approximately 135 million federal tax returns are filed on Form 1040 or one of its variants each year, making it the IRS' most frequently-used filing document. However, the filers who submitted more than 73 million federal tax returns electronically in 2006 typically typed data into computer-generated boxes without ever actually seeing the Form 1040 that underlies the software.

That's a development the IRS makes clear it welcomes.

"We're hoping fewer and fewer people see the 1040 because they file electronically," said Lemons.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Political Motives Suspected As Jobs On Bench Go Unfilled (SEATIMES)

By David Bowermaster, Seattle Times staff reporter

The Seattle Times, November 15, 2006

Despite a process designed to keep politics out of judicial selections, some in the local legal community are wondering whether politics is behind a delay by the White House in filling two vacancies on the U.S. District Court in Western Washington.

A seat on the federal bench in Tacoma has been open since March 2005, and a seat on the federal bench in Seattle opened in July.

In both cases, a bipartisan panel of local attorneys screened applicants and sent three recommendations to the White House; since 1997, the president has picked his nominee from among three names chosen by such panels.

But the White House, in an unprecedented move, rejected all three candidates for the Tacoma vacancy. The office of White House Counsel Harriet Miers told the bipartisan panel that none of the candidates was sufficiently qualified and asked for three more nominees.

The decision troubled many local lawyers and judges who know the three spurned finalists. Sources close to the selection process, speaking on condition of anonymity, called the White House decision "appalling," "outrageous" and a "travesty," and suspect the White House already has a replacement in mind who was not on the list.

Republicans and Democrats alike said the candidates rejected by the White House were eminently qualified. One, confirmed by sources as Karen Strombom, is already a federal magistrate judge in Tacoma.

A new set of candidates for the Tacoma vacancy was sent to the White House in August, around the same time that candidates for the Seattle opening were proposed, sources said. A nomination still hasn't been made by the White House.

Finalists for the federal bench

A bipartisan panel of local lawyers has selected three candidates for a judicial vacancy on the U.S. District Court in Seattle. The White House did interviews in September but has yet to name a nominee. The finalists:

Marc Boman: Partner, Perkins Coie. Specialist in commercial litigation. Recipient of Washington State Bar Association's "Award of Merit" for long-term service to the bar. Served on Seattle Ethics and Election Commission from 1995 to 1998.

DOJ_NMG_0094755

Richard Jones: King County Superior Court judge since 1994. Named 2004 "Judge of the Year" by King County Bar Association and Washington State Bar Association. Assistant U.S. attorney in Seattle, 1988 to 1994, associate at Bogle & Gates, 1983 to 1987.

Michael Rickert: Skagit County Superior Court judge since 1992. Previously Skagit County prosecutor, 1986 to 1992.

Source: Seattle Times reporting

The finalists for the Seattle opening have heard nothing since they were interviewed by the White House in September. Nor has the selection committee, said co-chairs Jenny Durkan of Seattle and J. Vander Stoep of Chehalis.

According to several sources close to the merit panel, the candidates selected for the Seattle vacancy were King County Superior Court Judge Richard Jones, Skagit County Superior Court Judge Michael Rickert and Marc Boman, a partner at the Perkins Coie law firm.

Rickert confirmed he was interviewed at the White House on Sept. 6. Jones and Boman declined to comment.

"It's an honor to be considered," Rickert said. "To have a dog in the hunt is very nice."

The delay has raised questions in local legal circles about whether the White House might again reject a merit panel's recommendations, or choose its own nominee.

The questions intensified when rumors surfaced that John McKay, the U.S. Attorney for Western Washington, was also interviewed by the White House Counsel's Office. McKay said last summer he applied for the Seattle vacancy, and many local lawyers considered him the front-runner for the job.

The Seattle Times confirmed that McKay traveled to Washington, D.C., to meet with White House officials about the vacancy, but sources said it was not clear if it was a formal job interview.

McKay declined to confirm or deny that the meeting took place.

"I'm not in a position to comment on this midprocess," McKay said. "I'm going to wait for the White House to make a decision along with everybody else."

If President Bush nominates McKay rather than one of the three judges selected by the bipartisan merit panel, it would be the second significant snub of the process by the White House in less than a year, judicial observers said.

The merit-panel process started in 1997 after an agreement initially hammered out by Democratic Sen. Patty Murray, and former Republican Sen. Slade Gorton and the Clinton administration.

A letter from former White House Counsel Alberto Gonzales to Murray in March 2002 made it clear the Bush administration reserved the right to go its own way with judicial nominations.

"All parties have agreed that [bipartisan panels] can be a source for identifying and evaluating candidates," wrote Gonzales, who is now attorney general. "I also propose that neither the president nor you be bound to adhere to the [panels'] evaluations in all instances."

The White House declined to shed light on any of the developments.

"As far as nominations always go, we don't speculate or comment until the process has been completed and the president is ready to make his announcement," said Peter Watkins, a White House spokesman.

Vander Stoep said he does not know when Bush will select his nominees.

"I know the White House wants to move as quickly as possible, and I know the senators want to move as quickly as possible," Vander Stoep said. Durkan said she is hopeful that the White House will abide by the process that has worked to name judges in Washington for the past decade, but she is not making predictions.

"Any of the candidates [for the Seattle vacancy] would serve the president and the country incredibly well," Durkan said. "But that's what I thought about Tacoma."

Congress Unlikely To Wrap Up Budget Work (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - Republicans who are about to lose power in Congress began a long-shot bid Tuesday to finish budgeting nearly half a trillion dollars for domestic agencies. But GOP leaders have no game plan to do nearly a year's work in a lame-duck session likely to last just a few weeks.

The uphill task is made more difficult by GOP conservatives' distaste for pork-laden "omnibus" spending bills that have frequently been the means of wrapping up unfinished congressional business.

With nine of 11 spending bills still unfinished more than six weeks after the Oct. 1 start of the fiscal year, the House is slated to take up a stopgap funding bill funding through Dec. 8 agencies whose budgets have yet to pass. House leaders have promised lawmakers that the postelection lame-duck session will be over by Dec. 15.

DOJ_NMG_0094756

The Senate on Tuesday took up a $94 billion bill funding veterans programs and military construction projects, and farm belt lawmakers immediately tried to attach $4.9 billion worth of emergency farm aid to the bill.

The left outgoing Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg, R-N.H., complaining that Democrats were moving to bust the budget before even assuming control of the Senate.

"The first amendment brought to the floor of the United States Senate after the election increases the national debt by $4.9 billion," Gregg said. "This is a daylight robbery of the Treasury."

On the broader budget front, both Republicans and Democrats on the powerful Appropriations Committees would like to wrap up their work before Congress switches hands in January.

Republicans would like the chance to stamp a final imprint on the budget before losing control of Congress. Also at stake is control over thousands of parochial projects that are so important to lawmakers.

Democrats, for their part, want to wrap up the spending bills in order to get a fresh start on next year's business.

House Republicans leaders, including Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio, have yet to decide whether to even try to wrap up the spending bills, which would fund the Education, Interior, Transportation and Agriculture departments, among others.

Boehner is embroiled in a race to become minority leader, replacing Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois as the No. 1 House Republican, and he isn't making any moves yet to endorse the idea of a huge omnibus budget bill.

"Nobody knows for sure until leadership races get out of the way," said Rep. Joe Knollenberg, R-Mich., who chairs a panel responsible for transportation and housing funding.

Meanwhile, House Republicans stumbled in their efforts to give President Bush a victory on a Vietnam free trade bill as Bush headed to Vietnam Tuesday night. The measure failed to win a supermajority House floor vote Monday evening under procedures reserved for noncontroversial bills, and GOP leaders opted against bringing it back under regular rules requiring a bare majority.

The setback for the Vietnam deal could be a hint of the trouble facing the rest of Bush's trade agenda, which includes a string of free trade agreements and global trade liberalization talks.

Also Tuesday, the Senate approved by unanimous voice vote a move by Susan Collins, R-Maine, to keep alive an oversight office in Iraq responsible for exposing waste in U.S. efforts for rebuilding Iraq. The special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction tracks spending in the multibillion-dollar effort to rebuild Iraq, a process moving slowly because of corruption and overcharging as well as wartime violence.

House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., had moved to shut down the agency by October as Congress passed the annual defense policy bill.

Hunter's strong-arm move caught many lawmakers by surprise and prompted immediate calls for its reversal. The inspector general's work has resulted in four criminal convictions and, most recently, evidence that a Halliburton subsidiary exploited federal regulations to hide details on its contract performance.

Spending Bills Stall As Congress Focuses On Leadership Races (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

The House and Senate struggled yesterday to move ahead on major unfinished bills, amid the distractions of leadership elections and a growing impatience to end a long and bitter campaign year.

The Senate last night approved by voice vote a military-construction spending bill, but not before debate stalled for hours over an unrelated provision, disaster funding for farmers. The slow pace did not bode well for completing the nine 2007 spending bills that Congress left pending when it recessed a month before the Nov. 7 elections. The $94 billion military-construction measure, which funds housing and veterans programs, was supposed to be one of the easier votes.

Meanwhile in the House, a Vietnam trade measure that appeared to be cruising toward passage was shelved until next month after it failed Monday night to win the two-thirds support needed to pass under expedited circumstances. Republicans blamed Democrats for the defeat, although 66 GOP members also voted against it.

The bill, which would grant Vietnam permanent normal trade status, won a majority of House votes, 228 to 161, but it will not be revived until after the Thanksgiving break, House GOP leadership aides said. President Bush had hoped to have the completed trade deal in hand when he arrives in Hanoi this weekend for an Asian economic meeting.

Leaders in both chambers remained hopeful that most of the remaining spending bills can be completed soon. House Republicans yesterday set a deadline of Dec. 15 for leaving town, just long enough for Appropriations Committee negotiators to finish their work, if Democrats cooperate and other obstructions are kept to a minimum. Whatever does not pass would have to be bundled into a temporary funding resolution until the 110th Congress convenes in January.

One obstacle to a speedy wrap-up is the series of leadership elections for the next Congress that are taking place this week in the House and the Senate. Yesterday, Senate Democrats chose their slate, naming Harry M. Reid (Nev.) as majority leader and Richard J. Durbin (Ill.) as majority whip. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), who ran the Senate campaign committee that delivered his party the majority, was elevated to a new No. 3 position, in charge of policy and strategy.

Today, it is the Senate Republicans' turn. Mitch McConnell (Ky.) is expected to be named minority leader, while Trent Lott (Miss.) and Lamar Alexander (Tenn.) are vying for the job of minority whip. Lott has extensive institutional and procedural knowledge, but he was forced to step down as Senate minority leader in December 2002 after he made remarks at a birthday party for then-Sen. Strom Thurmond praising Thurmond's 1948 presidential campaign, in which he ran as a segregationist Dixiecrat.

House Democrats will elect leaders Thursday, with the spotlight on the No. 2 job of majority leader. The current Democratic whip in the House, Steny H. Hoyer (Md.), is being challenged by veteran John P. Murtha (Pa.), a leading Democratic spokesman in favor of withdrawing troops from Iraq. Murtha is a close ally of Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), the incoming House speaker, who issued a letter Sunday night endorsing Murtha for the job.

Several senior House Democratic aides reported that key Pelosi allies, including Rep. George Miller (Calif.), were campaigning hard for Murtha yesterday, in particular among more junior members eager for Pelosi's support in securing coveted committee assignments.

And Murtha played up his role as a chief Iraq war critic, with his office releasing a statement that said, "The record is clear: Jack Murtha has been a constant voice for change in Iraq and Steny Hoyer has not."

Hoyer released his own slate of heavyweight supporters, including nine incoming committee chairmen.

"We are convinced that Steny will be a tremendous majority leader," read a letter from the group, which included Reps. John D. Dingell (Mich.), Henry A. Waxman (Calif.), Barney Frank (Mass.), Tom Lantos (Calif.), James L. Oberstar (Minn.), Ike Skelton (Mo.), Bart Gordon (Tenn.), Bennie Thompson (Miss.) and John M. Spratt Jr. (S.C.). Charles B. Rangel (N.Y.), the next Ways and Means chairman, was not a signatory, but he declared his support for Hoyer.

Murtha dismissed allegations that he has repeatedly skirted ethics boundaries, through his senior position on the House Appropriations Committee. Murtha said the charges stem from his role in the 1980 Abscam scandal, when he was named as an unindicted co-conspirator and testified against two House colleagues.

"I am disconcerted that some are making headlines by resorting to unfounded allegations that occurred 26 years ago," Murtha said in an angry statement released yesterday. "I thought we were above this type of swift-boating attack. This is not how we restore integrity and civility to the United States Congress."

On Friday, House Republicans will choose their leaders. Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (Ill.) is not running for a minority leadership post, and the front-runner for the top job is John A. Boehner (Ohio), the current majority leader.

Final Days Of Majority Control Bittersweet For Republicans (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — Sen. Conrad Burns gave a practiced politician's grin and hearty “How are ya?” but some of his staffers were wiping damp eyes as the Montana Republican shepherded them on a climb of the Capitol dome, a tour only a member of Congress can lead.

Burns, who was defeated in last week's election, has until early January to exercise the privilege. He was less friendly earlier in the day to several reporters who cover him for Montana newspapers. Burns advised them to read Psalm 109, which includes the passage “the mouth of the wicked and the mouth of the deceitful are opened against me.”

For Republican members of Congress, these are bittersweet days. An unusual post-election session, called to pass unfinished spending bills, is likely to keep members of the 109th Congress at work well into next month.

It is as if the ghosts of Congress Past returned for one final, but not very convincing, hurrah. “There's sort of a stunned feeling in our caucus right now,” said Rep. Shelley Moore Capito, R-W.Va.

Other members were less resigned. Sen. Rick Santorum, a Pennsylvania Republican defeated last week by Democrat Bob Casey, delivered an acrimonious swan song by threatening to block a bipartisan plan for $5 billion for drought-stricken farmers in the Midwest.

Santorum said the plan violates rules on the federal budget. Sen. Kent Conrad, D-N.D., the incoming Budget Committee chairman, threatened to retaliate by holding up Republican legislation. “Things are going to get very tough around here,” Conrad warned. The dispute required an unusual intervention by outgoing Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, who promised Conrad a vote today.

DOJ_NMG_0094758

The lame-duck session gives Republicans a few more weeks to enjoy the perks of majority control they lost at the ballot box. It also creates the possibility for close encounters of the awkward kind: New members of the next Congress are at the Capitol for freshman orientation as the lawmakers they beat are back to cast their last votes.

Sen. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio, who lost to Democrat Sherrod Brown, said he doesn't mind. “I've always enjoyed the work,” DeWine said with a wan smile.

The Republicans who will return next year are also facing some harsh realities. Martin Frost, a former Texas congressman who was in the House when Democrats lost their majority in 1994, said his colleagues were initially so depressed he had a hard time convincing them to begin fundraising for the next election. “Democrats were in a funk for seven months,” he said.

Republicans are vowing not to let that happen. Rep. Chris Cannon, R-Utah, says he thinks some bills he's been pushing, on immigration changes and intellectual-property protection, have a better chance of passage in a Democrat-controlled Congress.

Others are seizing an opportunity to climb the rungs of leadership. Sen. Lamar Alexander of Tennessee is using the election as an argument in his race against Sen. Trent Lott of Mississippi for GOP whip, the party's No. 2 leadership post. “We need new faces on our team after the drubbing we took (last) Tuesday,” Alexander said.

Lott has not been speaking to reporters about the race. His spokeswoman, Susan Irby, said in a statement earlier this week that Lott, the Senate's former majority leader, is “closing in on victory.” Senate Republicans will choose today.

Dennis Hastert of Illinois, the current House speaker, will not run for the party's top leadership post. Current House Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio competes against Mike Pence of Indiana and Joe Barton of Texas on Friday to be GOP leader.

Republicans' lost majorities in Congress mean an end to their committee chairmanships, as well as a loss of many employees who serve them. In the House, Republicans will have to cut their committee staffs in half. Capito says she expects to lose her slot on the House Rules Committee. Rep. Patrick McHenry, R-N.C., is worried about his post on the House Budget Committee. “That's when it will really sink in,” he said, “when you're knocked off a committee and see the staff go.”

Democrats have said they intend to be generous in victory, but veteran lawmakers are preparing for the worst. Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., joked that GOP parking spaces will be gone.

“Fortunately,” said Davis, who represents the Washington suburbs, “I live near a Metro (subway) stop.”

Lawmakers Push Politician For UN Post (AP)

By Jim Abrams

AP, November 15, 2006

A House Republican and Democrat, in the new spirit of bipartisanship, are urging President Bush to name defeated Republican Rep. Jim Leach to be the next U.S. ambassador to the United Nations.

"He is the most diplomatic politician I have ever met," Rep. Earl Blumenauer, D-Ore., said of Leach, a moderate from Iowa known for his professorial sweaters, his low-key, nonpolitical approach to issues and his opposition to the war in Iraq.

"I can't think of any American better qualified to represent our interests before the United Nations," said Rep. Jim Walsh, R-N.Y., who on Tuesday joined Blumenauer in circulating a letter in the House seeking support for Leach if the acting U.N. ambassador, John Bolton, is forced to resign.

Bolton has been temporary ambassador since August 2005, but has never been able to win confirmation because of opposition from Democrats, and some Republicans, to his confrontational style.

The White House recently renominated Bolton to the post, but Senate supporters lack the votes and it appears Bolton will have to resign when Democrats take over the Senate in January.

Leach, 64, who refuses to take political action committee money or run negative ads, narrowly lost to college professor Dave Loebsack in last week's election, ending a 30-year career as a House legislator.

Leach, who has announced no plans for the future, does have the resume for the job. He was a foreign service officer at the State Department in the 1960s and served at the U.N. under then Ambassador George H.W. Bush in the 1970s.

He is currently chairman of the House International Relations subcommittee on East Asian and Pacific affairs.

"He clearly is flattered to be considered" as U.N. ambassador, said his chief of staff, Gregory Wierzynski. "As a former foreign service officer, it would be something of intense interest to him."

But Leach may not be helped by his record of being near the top of those Republicans who vote most often with Democrats. In 2002 he was one of six House Republicans to vote against the resolution authorizing the use of force in Iraq, and he was among the first Republicans to call for a military withdrawal from Iraq.

But Blumenauer said, "This is a time of reassessment, re-evaluation" on Iraq, and "I would think Jim's qualifications would actually help."

Bush Calls Meeting With Auto Leaders Constructive (FREEP)

By Justin Hyde

Detroit Free Press, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — President George W. Bush met with the heads of Detroit's automakers in what he called a "constructive and meaningful dialogue " at the White House this afternoon, while automakers said they agreed on many, but not all, issues.

General Motors Corp. Chairman Rick Wagoner said the automakers told the president they could increase their production of vehicles that can run on ethanol or biodiesel to half of their fleet by 2012, if they could be assured that such fuels would be widely available. The Detroit automakers said earlier this year they would double their output of such vehicles by 2010.

Vice President Dick Cheney, Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson and other officials joined Wagoner, Chrysler Group Chief Executive Tom LaSorda and Ford CEO Alan Mulally in the hour-long Oval Office meeting with Bush.

Bush said the executives "are making difficult decisions, tough choices to make sure that their companies are competitive in a global economy.

"And I'm confident that they're making the right decisions, and that's good news for the American people because the automobile manufacturers play such a significant part of our economy and a vital part of our employment base," he said.

Bush and the executives said they touched on health care, energy and currency, as expected. While Wagoner, LaSorda and Mulally praised the president for being open to their concerns, Wagoner indicated some areas of disagreement, especially on Detroit's concerns of Japanese currency manipulation.

"I can honestly say that it appeared the president didn't 100 percent see it that way," Wagoner said. "We had a good open dialogue. We agreed to continue that dialogue."

Bush said the meeting was a starting point for future conversations about the state of the industry. While not committing to discuss currency with Asian leaders next week, Bush said his message "to our trading partners is just treat us the way we treat you. Our markets are open for your products, and we expect your markets to be open for ours, including our automobiles."

The companies had pursued the long-awaited meeting, originally scheduled for May, after finding few sympathetic ears for their concerns in the administration, a problem exacerbated by the departure of former GM executive Andrew Card as White House chief of staff in March.

Michigan's Congressional Democrats, who will take over several important committees when the new Congress begins in January, have pressured the automakers to take a harder line with the administration. But the executives said the get-together was meant to improve relations, and succeeded.

"I was very impressed with the president's knowledge of the situation with competitiveness issues, and the fact we're taking the actions needed to have viable businesses going forward, and his commitment to partner with us on issues that are really important," said Mulally.

Bush Says He Wants A 'vibrant' Domestic Auto Industry (DN)

By David Shepardson

Detroit News, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- After months of delays, President Bush met today with the chief executive officers of Detroit's Big Three automakers and told them he wants a domestic auto industry that "is as vibrant and solid as possible."

"These leaders have, are making difficult decisions, tough choices to make sure that their companies are competitive in a global economy," Bush told reporters. "I'm confident that they're making the right decisions, and that's good news for the American people because the automobile manufacturers play such a significant part of our economy and a vital part of our employment base."

Bush met with General Motors Corp. Chairman and CEO Rick Wagoner, Ford Motor Co. CEO Alan Mulally and Tom LaSorda, president and chief executive officer of DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler Group, for about an hour in the Oval Office. Among the topics they discussed were health care, energy and trade.

In a joint statement, the executives said they appreciated having an opportunity to meet with the president on issues that are critical not only to the auto industry but to the ongoing competitiveness of American manufacturing.

"Overall, we were pleased with the exchange we had with the president and came away with a clear impression that he understands how vital these issues are to the American economy and our ability to compete successfully in the global marketplace," the executives said in their statement.

Also attending the meeting were Vice President Dick Cheney, White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, Transportation Secretary Mary Peters and the White House political advisor Karl Rove.

DOJ_NMG_0094760

Wagoner, Mulally and LaSorda sat side by side on a couch in the Oval Office, while the president and vice president sat in armchairs.

The three said the companies planned to have further follow-up meetings with the administration.

Bush said the CEOs had a "constructive and meaningful dialogue."

"We talked about our mutual desire to reduce our dependence on foreign oil," he said. "Obviously, as these automobile manufacturers begin to incorporate new technologies that will enable us to power our cars in different ways, it will make it easier for me to be able to tell the American people we're using less foreign oil.

"My message to our trading partners is just treat us the way we treat you. Our markets are open for your products, and we expect your markets to be open for ours, including our automobiles."

The Big Three noted that they had in June agreed to double production of the number of flexible fuel vehicles that run on biofuels by 2010. Wagoner said they might be willing to increase that number to 50 percent of total production if the administration offered certain incentives by 2012.

Currently, automakers get credits they can use to meet corporate average fuel economy standards by building vehicles that can run on E85 -- a fuel that includes 85 percent ethanol -- or other biofuels, even if drivers don't have access to alternative fuels.

On health care, Bush said he assured the executives that "the government is addressing rising health care costs through a variety of initiatives that I think over time are going to make a significant difference in not only their cost, but the cost to the U.S. taxpayer, as well."

While the CEOs all praised the president's comments, Wagoner noted that there were areas -- like currency -- where they didn't agree.

Bush: Automakers Face 'Tough Choices' (AP-Y)

By Ken Thomas

AP, November 15, 2006

President Bush told Detroit's auto industry leaders on Tuesday he knows they are making "tough choices" to shore up their companies in foreign competition and promised continuing dialogue as they seek help on trade and health care issues.

"The president clearly understands the importance of the business to the United States and the global economy," Ford Motor Co. Chief Executive Alan Mulally said later.

Bush said, "We found a lot in common."

Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and other administration officials met in the Oval Office for just over an hour with top executives of Ford, General Motors and DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler Group.

The automakers later told reporters the meeting was productive, hopeful that it would lead to more discussions with the administration.

"That's a door that we've been waiting to open," said Tom LaSorda, president and chief executive officer of DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler Group.

On Capitol Hill, lawmakers representing large numbers of auto workers said they hoped Congress would address reducing the cost of the health care on manufacturers, foster the research and development of alternative fuel vehicles and promote fair trade practices.

"The industry's ability to compete in the global marketplace will determine its future. Rising health care and retirement costs as well as America's dependence on foreign sources of energy are negatively affecting industry strength," said Sen. George Voinovich, R-Ohio.

Sen. Debbie Stabenow, D-Mich., who criticized Bush during her re-election campaign for not meeting with the executives earlier, said she hoped the meeting would be "an important first step toward a comprehensive American manufacturing strategy."

The auto executives said they pressed Bush about their concerns on health care, energy and trade issues, while making clear that the troubled industry does not want a federal bailout. The meeting had been delayed since last spring and had been widely anticipated in the auto industry.

Bush met with the leaders just hours before he was traveling to Asia to meet in Vietnam with Asia-Pacific economic partners. He said he would tell those partners, "Just treat us like we treat you. ... Our markets are open for your products and we expect your markets to be open for ours, including our automobiles."

He said of the U.S. executives, "These leaders are making difficult decisions, tough choices to make sure that their companies are competitive in a global economy. And I'm confident that they're making the right decisions."

General Motors Corp. and Ford are both undergoing significant turnaround plans after posting large losses last year. GM has persuaded about 35,000 hourly workers to leave the company under early retirement or buyout plans while Ford has offered buyouts and early retirement packages to all 75,000 U.S. production workers in hopes of reducing its hourly work force by up to 30,000.

The companies have faced hardships while Japan-based Toyota Motor Corp. is enjoying soaring profits and outlining plans to unseat GM as the world's largest automaker.

GM chairman and CEO Rick Wagoner said the automakers made the case that Japan's weakened yen makes imported goods from Japan cheaper and enhances profits Japanese automakers make in the U.S. He said they discussed the automakers' "strong conviction that the Japanese yen is systematically undervalued, which helps them to maintain significant trade balance surpluses in our industry."

"I can't honestly say it appears the president 100 percent saw it that way, but we had a good dialogue," Wagoner said.

On health care, Wagoner said they discussed the role of information technology in improving quality and reducing costs. He said they would study high-cost, catastrophic cases that often drive up health care costs.

LaSorda said the automakers stressed that "specific issues like health care" aren't limited to the automobile industry.

All three automakers spend more on health care per vehicle than steel, which adds about $1,000 to the cost of a car built by the manufacturers. GM, the nation's largest private provider of health care, spent $5.3 billion on health care last year for 1.1 million people.

David Healy, an auto industry analyst for Burnham Securities, said he expected the meeting would have little impact on trade and health care, two areas where the Bush administration and the auto industry have disagreed.

"I think what you saw was a nice piece of political theater," Healy said.

But David Cole, chairman of the Ann Arbor, Mich.-based Center for Automotive Research, said the meeting could have long-term potential because the executives were able to "convey an impression that what the auto industry is dealing with is much larger than the auto industry."

One area on which Bush and the industry agree is on pursuing alternative energy sources. GM's Wagoner said that by 2012, up to half of their vehicles could run on ethanol blends of up to 85 percent, known as E85.

Wagoner said automakers would need assurances that the alternative fuel would be adequately available. Currently, only about 700 of the 170,000 gasoline stations nationally offer E85; most are in the Midwest. The three automakers said earlier this year they would double their production of flexible-fuel vehicles by 2010.

Bush cited a "mutual desire to reduce our dependence on imported oil."

The executives said they were not interested in a bailout similar to the 1979 measure approved by Congress that helped preserve Chrysler Corp. Asked of any interest in a bailout, Mulally said, "Absolutely not. Because we really believe that the actions start with us, taking the actions that create a more competitive business going forward."

Detroit Automakers Get Bush's Ear, But No Promises (LAT)

By Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — The chief executives of Detroit's troubled Big Three automakers finally got to meet with the nation's chief executive Tuesday, and they emerged from the Oval Office saying they had received an understanding hearing.

"It was a very good dialogue," said General Motors Corp. Chairman and Chief Executive Rick Wagoner.

President Bush promised nothing, particularly in response to the executives' complaint that Asian countries, notably Japan, were holding the value of their currencies artificially low so that their cars would be cheaper.

Bush, who left hours after the meeting for a conference in Vietnam with Asian trading partners, was not about to roil the waters by complaining of Asian currency manipulation.

Instead, he said afterward that he would tell the Asian leaders: "Our markets are open for your products, and we expect your markets to be open for ours, including our automobiles."

As far back as April, the heads of GM, Ford and DaimlerChrysler's Chrysler Group had sought a White House meeting to air their problems.

Bush said the midterm campaign schedule made that impossible until after election day.

During her successful reelection campaign, Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.) had criticized Bush for not meeting with the automakers.

On Tuesday, she said she hoped the session would be "an important first step toward a comprehensive American manufacturing strategy that will keep us competitive."

In addition to trade and currency values, the automakers and the president discussed fuel efficiency, energy security and the increasing burden of healthcare costs.

DOJ_NMG_0094762

Tom LaSorda, Chrysler Group's president and chief executive, said the three executives emphasized that a small share of autoworkers and retirees were responsible for much of the costs.

"I assured these leaders that the government is addressing rising healthcare costs through a variety of initiatives," Bush said, including tax-sheltered accounts used to meet health costs when combined with high-deductible health insurance.

On fuel efficiency, the executives said they told Bush that half their fleets would be able to run on ethanol or biodiesel fuel, instead of gasoline, by 2012.

George Magliano, chief auto industry analyst for the economic forecasting firm Global Insight, said nothing would immediately come of Tuesday's meeting.

"Most of these issues are long-term," he said.

Brian Johnson, an auto analyst for the investment bank Lehman Brothers, said the outcome would depend on the coming tug-of-war between coastal Democrats and interior Democrats in the new, Democratic-controlled Congress.

Coastal Democrats tend to be environmentally oriented, he said, whereas those from the country's center are more sympathetic to the industry's plight.

And its condition is serious: In the third quarter, Ford reported a net loss of $5.8 billion and DaimlerChrysler's U.S. operations lost $1.46 billion. GM lost only $91 million, a sharp upturn after a $10.6-billion loss for all of last year.

Big 3 Auto Heads Get Little From President (WP)

By Sholnn Freeman

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

President Bush promised yesterday to deliver a message to Asian trading partners to "treat us the way we treat you" but offered top U.S. auto executives little help in their battle to turn their companies around.

The president met with the three chief executives of the Detroit-based auto companies for a little more than an hour at the White House after twice postponing the get-together in the past several months. In Michigan, where the economy is reeling from auto industry downsizing, the long wait came to symbolize the Bush administration's indifference to the manufacturing sector.

Alan R. Mulally of Ford Motor Co.; Thomas W. LaSorda of Chrysler, the U.S. division of DaimlerChrysler AG; and G. Richard Wagoner Jr. of General Motors Corp. laid out their concerns about fair trade, health-care costs, rising steel prices and alternative fuel development. After the meeting, Bush said the executives had "tough choices" to make. He said he was confident that they were making the "right decisions."

Bush, who was preparing to attend the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum in Vietnam this week, said he would tell Asian trading partners that "our markets are open for your products, and we expect your markets to be open for ours, including our automobiles."

At a news conference after the meeting, the three auto executives said they found common ground with the president on energy issues. The executives said they asked the administration to help expand the supply and distribution of alternative fuels such as ethanol. In a joint statement, the automakers said they could make half of their annual vehicle production capable of burning ethanol by 2012 to lessen the nation's dependence on foreign oil.

The auto executives said Bush made no pledges to support any specific industry initiatives. Other company officials had said they had limited expectations for the meeting, which was also attended by Vice President Cheney.

The auto executives said they were not able persuade the administration to challenge the Japanese government on its trade imbalance with the United States and the weakness of the yen, which makes Japanese products cheaper overseas. Wagoner and other auto officials have accused the Japanese government of artificially weakening the yen, providing a cost subsidy of $3,000 to $9,000 per vehicle for auto exports to this country for automakers like Toyota Motor Corp. and Honda Motor Co.

"I can't honestly say the president 100 percent saw it that way," Wagoner said after the meeting.

Kate Bronfenbrenner, director of labor education research at Cornell University, said part of the administration's inaction has been because Michigan is a Democratic-leaning state. She said organized labor played a major role in last week's elections and labor union members turned out in large numbers to help mobilize Democratic voters.

"But it's much bigger than that," Bronfenbrenner said. "Bush hasn't cared about health care, retiree benefits or pensions for any workers, and those are some of the issues that drove the Democratic victory in the last election."

The election put key allies of the industry into power, including Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), who is set to lead the House Energy and Commerce Committee, and Rep. Sander M. Levin (D-Mich.), who is to take the chairmanship of the trade subcommittee of the House Ways and Means Committee. In a written statement, Dingell said he was pleased automakers had a chance to present their concerns to the president. "The meeting is a first step," he said, "now we need action."

DOJ_NMG_0094763

Democrats are pushing a number of industry-related initiatives on trade and health care. Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) said he would continue to try to build support for a proposal to have the government pick up part of the auto industry's retiree health-care bills, if the carmakers promise to invest in new energy technologies such as hybrids.

"My hope is that the president and his staff are working to examine these approaches," Obama said yesterday in an interview. "I can assure you if the president doesn't take the lead, the Congress will."

Big 3 Automakers Commit To Reducing Oil Dependence (WT)

By Sean Lengell

The Washington Times, November 15, 2006

The nation's largest automakers told President Bush yesterday they are committed to developing vehicles that use renewable fuels to reduce the country's dependence on foreign oil.

But the automakers added that if the U.S. automotive industry is to be competitive with Asian imports, the federal government must take a leading role in helping lower the industry's health care costs, balance the trade deficit with Japan and end tariffs on imported steel.

"It was a very good dialogue -- very open, back and forth," said General Motors Corp. Chairman and Chief Executive Rick Wagoner. "In a number of areas, there was agreement in the things we could continue to work on."

Mr. Bush added he found "a lot in common" with the auto executives.

"These leaders are making difficult decisions, tough choices to make sure that their companies are competitive in a global economy. And I'm confident that they're making the right decisions," Mr. Bush told reporters.

The president, who didn't take questions from reporters, said the meeting was "the beginning of a series of discussions we'll have [with the auto industry] -- not only with me, but with people in our government."

The Oval Office meeting, which the automakers had been seeking for months, lasted more than an hour and was attended by Vice President Dick Cheney and other administration officials.

The automakers said they were committed to producing more cars that run on renewable and alternatives fuels. But they said the government must do its part to provide incentives that encourage the manufacture, distribution and availability of renewable fuels.

Mr. Bush said he shares a "mutual desire to reduce our dependence on imported oil."

Raising the fuel economy of vehicles would help lessen that dependence, but the average fuel economy in the U.S. fleet has been stagnant for years as consumers have opted for more power and luxury rather than fuel economy.

Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat, this summer helped introduce the Fuel Economy Reform Act of 2006, which calls for the fuel-economy standards for passenger cars and light trucks, which include sport utility vehicles, to increase by 4 percent annually, or about one mile per gallon.

But the executives, who included Ford Motor Co. Chief Executive Alan Mulally and Tom LaSorda, president and chief executive officer of DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler Group, said the president didn't agree with them on everything, particularly on how to balance trade with Japan.

"It's our strong conviction that the Japanese yen is systematically undervalued, which helps them to maintain significant trade-balance surpluses in our industry," Mr. Wagoner said. "I can't honestly say it appears the president 100 percent saw it that way ... . But we agreed to continue the dialogue."

Mr. Bush met with the leaders just hours before left on a trip to Asia and the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit in Vietnam.

The president said the message he will give those countries is "just treat us like we treat you ... . Our markets are open for your products, and we expect your markets to be open for ours, including our automobiles."

The auto executives said that upwardly spiraling health care costs are putting them in a serious competitive disadvantage with manufacturers in countries where workers receive government-sponsored health care.

All three automakers spend more on health care per vehicle than on steel, which adds about $1,000 to the cost of a car built by Detroit's Big Three. GM, the nation's largest private provider of health care, spent $5.3 billion on health care last year for 1.1 million employees, retirees and their dependents.

In a joint statement released by the three auto executives after the meeting, they urged the federal government to take a "leading role to improve health care and make it affordable and available."

But the executives insisted they don't want a government bailout similar to the 1979 measure approved by Congress that helped save Chrysler Corp.

"Are we interested in a bailout? Absolutely not, because we really believe that the action starts with us, and we're taking the action to create a more competitive business," Mr. Mulally said.

DOJ_NMG_0094764

Instead, the automakers said they advocate health care changes on a national scale, not specific help for the automotive industry.

"Health care is an issue that faces every company, every business, every level of government as well," Mr. LaSorda said. "So the same problems they have at the federal government, we have here in our industry."

The executives said the president agreed to study how to lower costs for those with serious illnesses or chronic diseases, which account for about 30 percent of the nation's health care bill.

Bush, Auto CEOs Agree On Some Issues (USAT)

By Justin Hyde

USA Today, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush met with the heads of Detroit's automakers at the White House Tuesday for what he called a "constructive and meaningful dialogue," while automakers said they agreed with the administration on many, but not all, issues.

General Motors CEO Rick Wagoner said the automakers told the president they could increase their production of vehicles that can run on ethanol blends or biodiesel to half their fleet by 2012, if they could be assured that such fuels would be widely available. Those fuels are made from plants along with petroleum. Substituting them for straight petroleum-based gasoline or diesel fuel would cut U.S. oil consumption. It also would funnel fuel dollars to U.S. agribusiness instead of to overseas oil producers.

In public remarks after the meeting, Bush made no pledge to push for wider availability of alternative fuels, which are hard to find outside the farm belt. But he said, "As these automobile manufacturers begin to incorporate new technologies that will enable us to power our cars in different ways, it will make it easier for me to be able to tell the American people we're using less foreign oil. And that's in our economic interests, as well as in our national security interests."

Vice President Cheney, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and other officials joined Wagoner, Chrysler Group CEO Tom LaSorda and Ford Motor CEO Alan Mulally in the 45-minute Oval Office meeting.

Bush said the executives "are making difficult decisions, tough choices to make sure that their companies are competitive in a global economy.

"And I'm confident that they're making the right decisions, and that's good news for the American people, because the automobile manufacturers play such a significant part of our economy," he said.

Bush and the executives said they touched on health care, energy and currency, as expected. While Wagoner, LaSorda and Mulally praised the president for being open to their concerns, Wagoner said there was some disagreement, especially on Detroit's allegations of Japanese currency manipulation.

"I can honestly say that it appeared the president didn't 100% see it that way," Wagoner said. "We had a good open dialogue. We agreed to continue that dialogue."

Bush said the meeting was a starting point for future conversations about the state of the industry. While not promising to discuss currency with Asian leaders in meetings next week, Bush said he will tell them: "Our markets are open for your products, and we expect your markets to be open for ours, including our automobiles."

The companies had pursued the long-awaited meeting, originally scheduled for May, after finding few sympathetic ears for their concerns in the administration.

Mulally, Ford's new CEO, said he "was very impressed with the president's knowledge" of the auto industry's competitive pressures.

GM And Ford, Hungry For Cash, Pledge Assets To Secure Loans (WSJ)

By Jeffrey C. Mccracken, John D. Stoll And John D. Mckinnon

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

Facing a deep financial crisis, Detroit's two top auto makers have had to pledge some of their most essential assets -- such as factories and equipment -- as collateral to win badly needed new loans.

For General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co., once such icons of American industrial prowess that banks and insurance funds stood in line to serve them, the need to provide lenders with collateral underscores the combination of woes now facing the industry: lean, effective competition from international auto makers, rising health-care, pension and steel costs, and unfavorable exchange rates that U.S. executives say give Japanese rivals an advantage.

Yesterday, chief executives of the two companies and of DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler Group -- the third member of Detroit's Big Three -- took their concerns to Washington in search of relief. But while President Bush promised to maintain a

"continuing dialogue," the auto makers walked away with scant sign that Mr. Bush is willing to help them on their big worry about soaring health-care costs.

"I assured these leaders that the government is addressing rising health-care costs through a variety of initiatives that I think over time are going to make a significant difference," Mr. Bush said. The executives said the president did agree, however, that he and the auto makers should "study" how high-cost care of "catastrophic" health problems is insured.

For Detroit, the challenges are stark. A chart released by Ford yesterday appeared to show a 2009 profit of a few hundred million dollars -- a fraction of what Japan's Toyota Motor Corp. earns in North America in one quarter. The forecast surfaced as part of a restatement of earnings from 2001 through 2005 to correct the accounting of interest-rate swaps in Ford's credit division and certain other derivative transactions. The restatement narrowed Ford's third-quarter loss to $5.2 billion from the previously reported $5.8 billion.

Such financial conditions provide the backdrop to the shift to collateralized loans by GM and Ford. Their long slide in the global auto industry has now put their balance sheets under pressure. Last year, the companies' declining market share and mounting losses in their core auto operations prompted Standard & Poor's Corp. and other credit-rating agencies to cut their debt ratings to "junk" status. That made it more expensive for the companies to borrow money, especially when they seek unsecured loans.

Now their depressed credit ratings are pushing the two auto makers to new sources of financing.

GM, which posted a $10.6 billion loss last year, in July extended a credit line from a syndicate of banks under new terms that give the company a $4.6 billion revolving loan backed by North American assets including inventory, plants and property.

GM CEO Rick Wagoner,2 Ford CEO Alan Mulally, and Chrysler CEO Tom Lasorda take questions about their White House meeting on what the auto industry can do to support energy and health-care initiatives. 3

WSJ Detroit deputy bureau chief4 Neal Boudette says he isn't sure Congress is going to be moving quickly to help the auto industry.

On Monday, GM used equipment in some of its U.S. plants to secure a $1.5 billion loan to be arranged by J.P. Morgan Securities Inc. and Credit Suisse Securities. Since secured loans are less expensive than unsecured financing, they are now a more attractive option for GM.

Gina Proia, a GM spokeswoman, said the move is intended to "enhance" the company's liquidity. "Given our credit rating, secured loans are the most cost-effective way of funding," she said. "We see it as a prudent move." She said GM has total debt of $32.8 billion, the majority of it unsecured.

Yesterday, Ford said it is moving in the same direction. As part of a conference call on its earnings restatement, Chief Financial Officer Don Leclair said Ford aims to put together a loan deal that is likely to be secured "by a significant portion of the assets of the company." Ford's losses amount to about $7 billion so far this year, and the company is on pace to approach GM's $10.6 billion 2005 loss.

Without specifying a time frame, Mr. Leclair said Ford would have a deal to announce "fairly soon." He added that Ford is pursuing the deal "because it is prudent to do so."

Mr. Leclair declined to specify how much money Ford is looking to borrow and wouldn't specify what assets Ford could pledge in order to secure new lines of credit, or whether that might include assets from the Ford family. The family owns about 3% of the company but has 40% of the voting rights.

He acknowledged that Ford's move to asset-backed loans reflects the company's difficult financial condition. This is the first time in Ford's 103-year history that it has resorted to such financing. "It is a recognition that we have some issues," he said.

The shift to secure asset-backed loans was in part prompted by a change in how large corporations must account for company-funded pension plans on their balance sheets. Starting Jan. 1, companies must recognize all future pension obligations as liabilities. Since GM has a large number of retirees, its liabilities will increase sharply and will outweigh the value of the company's assets. That will leave it with negative shareholder equity -- the difference between total assets and liabilities and a measure of net worth -- which will make it harder for GM to borrow money because terms with the company's bondholders could prohibit it from pledging certain assets to back loans.

Ms. Proia, the GM spokeswoman, said having negative equity is a balance-sheet issue and would have no impact on GM's operations such as cash flow.

Ford also expects the accounting change to leave it with negative shareholder equity, although it isn't bound by the same kind of bond terms as GM, Mr. Leclair said.

Ford has roughly $23 billion in cash and expects to end the year with about $20 billion -- a figure supplemented by $3.4 billion taken out of a fund employers set up to pay retiree health-care costs. For all of 2006, Ford will burn through $8.4 billion.

GM's cash will be fattened significantly when the company closes the sale of a controlling stake in its General Motors Acceptance Corp. unit to a group of investors led by Cerberus Capital Management. GM plans to close the sale by Nov. 30. GM will receive $10 billion upon closing, and also will hold on to $20 billion of GMAC automotive leases, which it plans to sell at a discount to raise some $4 billion in cash over three years.

For GM, Ford and Chrysler, an increasing amount of their cash flow gets eaten up by the cost of providing health care to their active and retired workers, along with their spouses and dependents.

After meeting with Mr. Bush, the car makers soon will take their health-care case to Capitol Hill, where newly empowered Democrats already are talking about a reinsurance plan that would help offset catastrophic-coverage costs. Democrats, who are more focused than Republicans on shoring up employer-based health care, also are talking about new tax breaks for employers. GM Chairman and Chief Executive Rick Wagoner suggested yesterday that he is hopeful the new majority would come up with a plan to help employers. He said he will know more about Democrats' receptivity "in about six months."

The fact that Mr. Bush left the door slightly open to a reinsurance proposal suggests he is reluctant to reject auto makers and their Democratic allies out of hand, after suffering the loss of both the House and Senate in this month's midterm elections.

On other matters, the president and the car makers appeared to agree that U.S. manufacturers continue to be unfairly shut out of some Asian markets. Mr. Bush, who travels to Vietnam this week for a meeting with Asian leaders, promised to raise the auto executives' concerns. "My message to our trading partners is, just treat us the way we treat you," Mr. Bush said in his post-meeting summary. "Our markets are open for your products, and we expect your markets to be open for ours, including our automobiles."

But there seemed to be a continuing difference of opinion on the auto makers' concerns that Japan is manipulating its currency, the yen, to undercut U.S. manufacturers. Bush administration officials say there is little evidence that valuation of the yen is a major factor for the auto makers. And Japanese companies point out that many of their cars are made in the U.S.

While the president and the executives found some grounds for agreement, there was clearly distance between them on a few matters high on the companies' list. Mr. Bush apparently agreed only to study their ideas on health care -- particularly a suggestion that an assigned-risk pool be created for catastrophic cases -- presumably to be funded by the government.

On energy, the White House and the manufacturers agreed on the need to continue expanding availability of gasoline alternatives such as ethanol and biodiesel. The executives even promised to make 50% of their new vehicles capable of running on either conventional gasoline or alternative fuels by 2012 if the pipes and pumps needed to sell the new fuels are available. That is likely to require continued government help and perhaps even new initiatives.

Senate Democrats Elect Leaders (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — Senate Democrats, meeting in the historic chambers where Daniel Webster and Henry Clay once orated, today elected a team of leaders for next year's session.

The team looks a lot like last year's lineup. Harry Reid of Nevada was elected majority leader and Richard Durbin of Illinois was chosen for the No. 2 slot of majority whip.

Charles Schumer of New York, who headed the cash-raising campaign committee that was triumphant in last week's elections, will continue in that role as well as taking on the No. 3 position — vice chair of the Democratic Conference. Patty Murray of Washington was elected conference secretary and Byron Dorgan of North Dakota continued as head of the policy committee.

What has changed in the lineup is that next year Democrats will be in charge of running the committees and setting the agenda for floor debate. Reid lost no time in emphasizing why that has already changed the dynamic of power in Washington — especially on Iraq.

"Three Americans were killed yesterday and 150 Iraqis in one incident [today] were kidnapped. That means they're going to be killed," Reid told reporters at the Capitol. The war is "costing us $3 billion a week. It's not going to go away."

Insisting that Democrats "are not making any threats toward the president," Reid called on the White House to "work with us" because "the American people want it and they deserve it."

Reflecting on their treatment at the hands of Republicans during the years out of power, Reid said pointedly, "We're going to treat the minority, the Republicans, as they did not treat us."

Noting that "a 51-vote majority is as thin as they come," Durbin said, "We not only want to move the right agenda, we want to do it in the right way."

Referring to a "steady deterioration" of civility in Congress, Durban said, "Now Democrats have the chance, even the challenge, to restore the dignity of this great American institution."

On policy issues, Murray said the new leadership will address rising college tuition, healthcare costs and what Reid described as "relieving the tax burden on the middle class."

Murray said Democrats hope to convey to American families that "we are at your back."

Senate Democrats Choose Leaders For Next Congress (NYT)

By David Stout

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 14 — Senate Democratic leaders were chosen today for the next Congress, and they allowed themselves a few gibes at Republicans before pledging to work for a new spirit of bipartisan cooperation on Capitol Hill.

"We're going to treat the minority, the Republicans, as they did not treat us," Senator Harry Reid of Nevada said at a news conference after being picked as majority leader by the Democratic caucus. "They'll be involved in decisions when we have legislation that passes this body."

Mr. Reid repeated his pledge to work with President Bush, and he said he supported a vote in the current lame-duck Congress on Robert M. Gates's nomination to succeed Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. "The sooner we can move it forward, the sooner we can get rid of Rumsfeld," he told The Associated Press.

Mr. Reid recalled that Mr. Bush said after the election that he wanted to work with Democrats. "He said that two years ago, and it didn't work," Mr. Reid said.

Mr. Reid has been minority leader, and he was not opposed for elevation to majority leader in the 110th Congress, which convenes in January. He called his new post "the opportunity of a lifetime for me" and said his goal is to re-establish the power of the legislative branch "as deemed to be so important in checks and balances by our Founding Fathers."

Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois will continue as Democratic whip, and Senator Charles E. Schumer will remain as the Senate campaign chairman, while also taking on the title of vice chairman of the Democratic caucus, a post that Mr. Reid said makes the New Yorker No. 3 in the party leadership ranks.

Mr. Durbin, too, said he hoped for bipartisan progress on Capitol Hill, and a lot more good will. "We have watched the steady deterioration of comity and cooperation in the United States Congress," he said. "Now the Democrats have a chance — even a challenge — to restore the dignity of this great American institution."

Amid the talk of bipartisanship, there was an unmistakable eagerness to advance a Democratic agenda in the next Congress, and assertions that Republicans did not do enough for middle-class Americans while they controlled the House and the Senate.

"The middle class is being squeezed," Mr. Reid said. "Squeezed. The rich are getting richer; the poor are getting poorer. We must do something about education. We must do something to relieve the tax burden on the middle class."

Senator Patty Murray of Washington, chosen as caucus secretary, said the new Democratic majority would try to "make sure that our country is once again strong, and our country once again says to American families, 'We are at your back.' That's the country I was raised in. That's the country I look forward to building once again."

Senator Debbie Stabenow, who won re-election in Michigan last week, will lead the party's steering and outreach committee, and Senator Byron Dorgan of North Dakota will be chairman of the policy committee. Senators Jeff Bingaman of New Mexico, Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Blanche Lincoln of Arkansas will also serve in "outreach" leadership posts.

Senate Republicans are to pick their leaders on Wednesday, House Democrats on Thursday and House Republicans on Friday.

Mr. Reid said Senator Barbara Boxer of California would become chief deputy whip, and Senators Thomas R. Carper of Delaware, Bill Nelson of Florida and Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin deputy whips.

And Senator Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia will be the Senate's president pro tem and will provide "leadership and experience gained from a lifetime of public service," Mr. Reid said. Mr. Byrd, who won another term last week, was first elected to the Senate in 1958.

Mr. Byrd, who will turn 89 on Monday, will be third in line for the presidency, after Vice President Dick Cheney and the incoming House speaker, Nancy J. Pelosi. The outgoing president pro tem is Senator Ted Stevens, Republican of Alaska, who will turn 83 on Saturday.

Mr. Reid described Mr. Schumer's function as vice chairman of the caucus as "a utility man — he'll be called upon to do lots of different things." Asked if the title amounted to "a tipping of the hat" because of his work in the campaign, Mr. Reid replied simply, "Yes."

Mr. Schumer said he liked the sound of "Majority Leader Harry Reid," and predicted that "over the next two years, it's going to sound great to the American people when Harry and his team show what we can do."

In the 2008 elections, Mr. Schumer will try to hold on to the Democrats' majority in the Senate, a fact that Mr. Durbin acknowledged. "We know that a 51-vote majority is as thin as they come," he said.

Schumer, The Victor, Wins New Leadership Position (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, November 15, 2006

Senate Democrats rewarded Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) yesterday for his success as chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) by giving him a specially created leadership position.

In return for the new title of vice chairman of the caucus, which ranks third among Democratic leaders, Schumer has agreed to serve another two years as chairman of the Senate Democratic fundraising committee.

Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) announced after a closed-door meeting of the Democratic caucus yesterday that Democrats had created the new position, which puts Schumer below only Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.), the incoming majority whip, and Reid, but means he outranks the Democratic conference secretary.

Though Reid will not formally take over as Senate majority leader until January, he has already reshaped the leadership. In addition to Schumer's new job, Reid created two other posts to foster better relations between elected leaders and committee chairmen.

"Sen. Schumer has many talents, one of which is helping to set the direction of the Democratic Caucus," said Reid when asked about Schumer's new responsibilities. Schumer would work as a "utility man," addressing challenges as they arise.

Schumer responded: "I want to thank my colleagues for electing me vice chair of the caucus, number three in the leadership. I want to thank Harry Reid in particular for the great job he has done for us. 'Majority Leader Harry Reid' sounds really good to us and over the next two years will sound great to the American people."

Senate Democrats yesterday also elected Sen. Patty Murray (Wash.) to replace Sen. Debbie Stabenow (Mich.) as the Democratic conference secretary, previously the third-ranking post in the Democratic leadership. It will now rank fourth.

Reid appointed Stabenow chairwoman of the Democratic Steering and Outreach Committee, a post that consults on decisions over committee assignments and heads outreach to allied coalitions such as labor unions and environmental groups.

Stabenow will replace Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who will assume a new minor position as vice chair of committee outreach. There, she will assist Sen. Jeff Bingaman (D-N.M.), chairman of committee outreach, in providing "a voice in the Democratic leadership for committee chairs. Clinton's appointment is curious because she, unlike Bingaman, will not chair a committee in the next Congress.

Bingaman's post as a liaison between the committees and the leadership is also new.

Schumer was still negotiating with other leaders over his new job Monday. This is the second time Schumer has used his prospective chairmanship of the DSCC as negotiating leverage with Democratic leaders. Two years ago, he nabbed a seat on the Senate Finance Committee after agreeing to forego a run for governor and instead head the DSCC. In that role, Schumer has been highly successful.

Schumer raised nearly $25 million more during the 2006 cycle than his Republican counterpart, Sen. Elizabeth Dole (N.C.). He also recruited talented candidates who defeated GOP incumbents in "red" states such as Montana, Virginia, and Ohio.

Reid reappointed several colleagues to lower-ranking leadership slots. Sen. Byron Dorgan (D-N.D.) will serve another Congress as chairman of the Democratic Policy Committee. Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) will serve again as chief deputy whip. Sen. Blanche Lincoln (D-Ark.) will again chair the Senate Democrats' rural outreach effort.

Sens. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.), Bill Nelson (D-Fla.), and Tom Carper (D-Del.) will assist Durbin next year as deputy whips. Feingold, one of the most liberal members of the Senate, will help corral the votes of liberal lawmakers, while Carper, a centrist, will work to persuade conservative-leaning Democrats.

Carper's appointment to serve as deputy whip is a small consolation for being passed over for a seat on the Senate Finance Committee. Carper had jockeyed hard for the assignment, but he lost out to Sen. Ken Salazar (D-Colo.), who has four fewer years of Senate seniority. Senate insiders said Salazar leapfrogged Carper because the panel's incoming chairman, Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), wanted more Western lawmakers on the committee.

Carper's fellow members of the freshman class of 2000, Stabenow and Sen. Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.), won the other two open seats on Finance.

Reid Pledges To Press Bush On Iraq Policy (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), who was elected Senate majority leader yesterday, said last night that President Bush still has not grasped the urgent need to change course in Iraq. Reid vowed to press quickly for phased troop withdrawals, a more international approach to Iraq's problems and a rebuilding of the depleted U.S. military.

DOJ_NMG_0094769

In his first extensive interview since the Senate Democrats' leadership election, Reid also said members of his party will have to think big on the nation's domestic issues. That includes tackling the budget deficit with strict new rules on spending, exploring an eventual expansion of Medicare to address the uninsured, and examining an increase in tax rates on upper-income Americans.

But it was on the issue of Iraq that he was most passionate. Voter anger over the war swept his party to power with the unlikely defeat of six Republican senators, he said. Democrats must respond to that anger, he added, with hearings to keep the heat on the Bush administration, and with calls for a regional Middle Eastern conference and a revitalized Iraqi reconstruction effort.

To that end, he said, one of the first acts of the new Democratic Congress will be a $75 billion boost to the military budget to try to get the Army's diminished units back into combat shape.

Democrats will not try, Reid pledged, to play the strongest hand they have -- using Congress's power of the purse to starve the war effort of money and force the president to move. Such an effort would only elicit a veto from Bush. But he said Democrats will marshal their newly acquired power -- in hearing rooms and on the Senate floor -- to stoke public opinion and drive the debate.

"Three Americans killed yesterday, four British; 150 Iraqis taken out of that building and kidnapped; 1,800-plus went through that one Baghdad morgue but that doesn't count all the dead," Reid recounted. "My displeasure with the president, he doesn't understand the urgency of this. It's all victory for him, but I don't know what that means anymore in Iraq. I do know what we are doing now doesn't work."

Reid said he will be able to work well with Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), the incoming House speaker, whom he described as resilient and "a very astute politician." But he said the Senate will work differently from the House, given the Senate Democrats' very narrow 51 to 49 majority, which will necessitate close cooperation with Republicans.

"The speaker of the House has to be aggressive," Reid said. "It's like the British Parliament. If you've got the votes, you ram it through. But the Senate works differently."

Democrats also elected Sen. Richard J. Durbin (Ill.) yesterday as assistant Senate majority leader. Durbin has been assistant minority leader since January 2005. Senate Republicans will elect their leaders for the 110th Congress today.

In January, after two years as a Senate minority leader who bedeviled the Republican legislative agenda and sharply criticized Bush, Reid will take the helm of a body that has been notoriously difficult to control.

To the casual observer, Reid comes across as a reserved, soft-spoken, deferential politician who appears more comfortable in the backrooms of the Capitol than in the spotlight. But to those who have watched him close up, Reid's reputation is quite different -- that of a brawler who moves with the alacrity he acquired in his days as an amateur boxer.

The consummate pessimist in a political world full of sunny optimism, Reid is fond of saying that he would rather expect the worst and accept the occasional pleasant surprise than forever live with disappointment.

Reid, 66, came by his dour outlook honestly. He grew up in a tin-roofed shack in the gold-mining hamlet of Searchlight, Nev. His father was a hard-rock miner and a hard drinker whose battles with alcoholism and depression ended in suicide at age 58. His mother was a laundrywoman. Reid hitchhiked to high school 40 miles from home.

Upon graduation, local merchants raised money for his college tuition. He helped put himself through George Washington University Law School, working nights as a U.S. Capitol police officer.

But most of Reid's adult life has been in politics, becoming city attorney in Henderson, Nev., in 1964; a member of the Nevada State Assembly in 1968; and lieutenant governor in 1970. He clashed with the mob as head of the state's Gaming Commission, then went to the House in 1982. He reached the Senate in 1986.

In that time, he has been beset by controversies that continue to pose political problems for him. A $400,000 land purchase in Clark County, Nev., that Reid made in 1998 with a friend and business partner grabbed headlines in October when the senator had to amend four years of ethics reports to Congress to more fully explain the transaction. The sale brought in $1.1 million, netting a $700,000 profit in six years.

"Windfall?" he bristled yesterday. "I shouldn't have sold it. That was my big mistake. You know what that property is worth now? Thirteen million dollars."

This week, the Los Angeles Times published a report suggesting that the $18 million that Reid secured for a bridge connecting Laughlin, Nev., to Bullhead City, Ariz., may have boosted the value of land Reid owns nearby. Again, Reid scoffed at any hint of wrongdoing. The bridge, he said, is needed because heavy truck traffic has been limited on the Hoover Dam since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. The land in Arizona has been in his family since the 1960s, he added, noting that he has never seen it, much less thought of boosting its value. He said that it could take until 2013 to build that bridge.

Last month, the National Republican Senatorial Committee cited the controversies around Reid as it goaded Democratic candidates to return the party leader's campaign donations.

Reid's loyalty to the mining industry, which plays an important role in his state's economy, has created run-ins with fellow Democrats who seek to raise royalty fees on federal land and impose stronger environmental standards. He also opposes abortion rights, a position derived from his Mormon religion, which has put him at odds with many other Democrats.

Yet, Senate Democrats have strong faith in their leader.

"We went through combat together; and when you go through combat together, you learn everything," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), who heads the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, which helped Democrats take control of the Senate.

In the run-up to the Nov. 7 midterm elections, Democrats kept their legislative agenda carefully circumscribed to a set of initiatives that conservatives, moderates and liberals could all agree on. But in yesterday's interview, Reid hinted that Democrats will have to go further to address what he sees as the widening gap between rich and poor, and a middle class squeezed by health care costs and rising tuition.

Budget rules will be passed to require that any new spending or tax cuts will have to be offset by equal spending cuts or tax increases, he said.

"We can do this," he added. "People might not like what we do," but Democrats will stick to the rules.

He pledged an "unalterable commitment" not to touch the middle-class tax cuts Bush secured in his first term. But he said Democrats "would be crazy" to rule out rolling back tax breaks that benefited the top 1 percent of earners. He also spoke volubly about federal health-care programs for the elderly and for veterans that he said should be a model as Congress looks to address the growing problem of the uninsured.

"We have to look at the uninsured because it's bankrupting our country," he said.

Asked about a proposal floated by former president Bill Clinton to expand Medicare for those who could buy into it, Reid said, "we're not there yet," but he added that it should be studied.

"Someday, someday," he said, "what we have to do is cinch up our belts and take on the insurance industry."

Exultant Chuck Says He'll Veto The Next Alito (NYO)

By Jason Horowitz

New Yourk Observer, November 15, 2006

More than the inability to influence Iraq policy or the President's tax cuts, Chuck Schumer says that the single greatest failure of the Democrats as an opposition party was allowing Samuel Alito to join the Supreme Court.

"Judges are the most important," said Mr. Schumer, who orchestrated the implausible Democratic takeover of the Senate last week. "One more justice would have made it a 5-4 conservative, hard-right majority for a long time. That won't happen."

From now on, all the President's judicial appointments will need to meet the requirements of Mr. Schumer, the Park Slope power broker who has happily accepted the mantle of chief architect for the Democrats' effort to build a majority for the 2008 elections and beyond.

The Senator also intends, in the coming months, to rework the federal government's funding priorities in New York's favor, to steer the Democrats toward a radically new position on Iraq and, while he's at it, to cement his position as the unofficially declared tactical guru for the national party.

And in case anyone's wondering, yes, Mr. Schumer is entirely comfortable with this sort of power.

With his Gold Toe–stockinged feet dangling, the 55-year-old slumped in his armchair on Friday morning as if it were a leather throne. On his apartment's front door, a neighbor taped up a front page of The New York Times heralding the Democrats' success and scrawled "Congratulations Schumers!" across the cover.

The candidates that Mr. Schumer recruited, groomed and bankrolled had won a comprehensive victory over the incumbent Republicans, giving the Democrats a narrow majority in the Senate to complement a rout in the House. Since the election, Mr. Schumer has been awash in attention from the media, his Democratic colleagues and even from the President, who called, quite sportingly, soon after the results were finalized.

For Mr. Schumer, who was installed on Tuesday as Vice Chairman of the Democratic caucus and officially reinstated as head of the DSCC, the attention couldn't be coming at a better time.

Advertisement

"I am writing a book, about how to build a permanent—a long-term majority," Mr. Schumer said during an early-morning interview in the pink den of his apartment near Grand Army Plaza. He sat between a view of lower Manhattan and portraits of Democratic icons Franklin Delano Roosevelt and Al Smith. "I generally have an eye toward longer-term strategy and politics, and I think my colleagues rely on me for that."

DOJ_NMG_0094771

His book, Positively American: Winning Back the Middle Class Majority One Family at a Time, will be released right around the President's State of the Union address, and will fit neatly into the role that Mr. Schumer now envisions for himself as tactician in chief for the newly ascendant Democrats.

"I've always had some influence, and I guess now, because of what we've been able to accomplish, I have some more influence," Mr. Schumer said. "So when I say we shouldn't do this or we should do that, I guess people will pay a little more attention. Or go along with it, even if they don't agree."

Certainly, the party wasn't united behind Mr. Schumer's election strategy this year. He championed a traditional approach: directing the bulk of the party's financial and logistical resources toward handpicked candidates in a few competitive races. Howard Dean, who heads the Democratic National Committee, advocated a "50-state strategy," spreading money around toward the longer-term goal of making the party viable even in areas that have been Republican strongholds.

After the victory—the Democrats picked up six Republican-held seats and defended every Democratic one—Mr. Schumer hardly seemed ready to concede the point.

"Fifty-state is a good thing to do, but it didn't help us in this election," said Mr. Schumer. "My only disagreement with Howard is that he should help us fund taking back the majority, because it would make a difference with things like the Supreme Court. And he came through—he ended up giving us $7.5 million. We tried the honey approach rather than the vinegar approach, and it worked."

Pelosi Pulls Out The Stops For Murtha (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, November 15, 2006

Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) is imploring her colleagues to support Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) for majority leader, multiple House Democrats said yesterday, dealing an unexpected but not necessarily fatal blow to Murtha's opponent, Rep. Steny Hoyer (D-Md.).

It had been unclear until yesterday whether Pelosi would use her clout to turn votes to Murtha. She endorsed him in a letter Sunday, but some dismissed it as a nod to personal loyalty rather than a statement of her intentions.

But by yesterday, her intent was clear, several lawmakers said; she hopes to oust her onetime rival Hoyer from the leadership.

"She's committed. If they thought she was just going to endorse his candidacy, they were mistaken," said Rep. Bill Pascrell (D-N.J.), a Murtha ally. "She didn't have to do this. It's called courage."

By throwing her full weight behind Murtha, Pelosi risks suffering an early setback with her colleagues if Hoyer wins; however, a Murtha victory would cement her total control.

Pelosi called incoming Ways and Means Committee chairman Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) yesterday morning just hours after he had told the New York Sun, "I think Steny has done his job. I cannot think of any reason why this is happening," prompting the paper to run the headline "Rangel Backs Hoyer for Leader."

"I don't know what article she had seen, but she had thought it was an endorsement of Steny," Rangel said.

Rangel told her it was not an endorsement but reiterated his earlier statement that "nobody had given me any reason not to support Steny."

Rangel would not discuss the details of his conversation with Pelosi, but he said that that statement remained true even after their conversation. "I'm not supporting anyone right now," he said.

Yet nine other incoming full committee chairmen are supporting Hoyer. Reps. John Dingell (D-Mich.), Barney Frank (D-Mass.), Bart Gordon (D-Tenn.), Jim Oberstar (D-Minn.), Tom Lantos (D-Calif.), John Spratt (D-S.C.), Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.) and Henry Waxman (D-Calif.) signed a letter yesterday backing Hoyer.

"There simply is no question: Nancy and Steny have been a terrific team … we believe that Nancy and Steny not only deserve great credit for bringing us to this point, but also will be the best team to lead our caucus as we move forward in the majority," they wrote.

Murtha and Pelosi were working the crowd together Monday night at Murtha's reception at the Library of Congress.

The two of them spoke to Rep.-elect Tim Walz (D-Minn.), who said afterward that he was "still undecided" but appeared to be leaning toward Murtha.

"To be honest, I was waiting for the Speaker," Walz said. "When the Speaker speaks, you listen. I take that into heavy consideration."

Still other freshmen remained steadfast in their support of Hoyer despite intense lobbying by Murtha's allies. Reps.-elect Ron Klein (D-Fla.), Kathy Castor (D-Fla.) and Phil Hare (D-Ill.) were vigorously supporting Hoyer yesterday.

Klein said the new members were ready to have the issue decided.

DOJ_NMG_0094772

"I think most of the freshman class [supports bringing] this forward. Get this done and let's get on to business," he said.

Rep. Paul Kanjorski (D-Pa.) said he hoped Pelosi's endorsement would have an effect, "especially on freshmen."

The intense lobbying has put some freshmen in uncomfortable situations. The Murtha camp was infuriated Friday when Rep.-elect Paul Hodes (D-N.H.) signed a letter with other freshmen supporting Hoyer, charging that Hodes had told them he would remain uncommitted.

"I really can't comment on what anybody else thought," Hodes said yesterday. "I consider my word as my bond and I am continuing to support Congressman Hoyer."

Rep. Jim Moran (D-Va.), a Murtha supporter, said Monday night that Pelosi is playing for keeps.

"She will ensure that they [the Murtha camp] wins. This is hardball politics … We are entering an era where when the Speaker instructs you what to do, you do it," he said. "Yes, she's making calls to people. She is contacting people and letting them know that it's an unequivocal letter."

Hoyer's camp was aware of the calls, said one lawmaker supporting the Democratic whip.

"She's making calls, so don't be shocked," the lawmaker said.

Another House Democrat supporting Hoyer was incensed that Pelosi was exerting her influence in the caucus, asserting that it will further divide House Democrats.

"It's an incredible display of hubris," the member said, using a phrase Pelosi herself sometimes employs. "It's incredibly egotistical. We all got us here. We all got us to the promised land and Steny's not going to the promised land?"

The member said regardless of who ultimately wins the Thursday election, the effect of Pelosi actively getting involved in the race would reverberate for some time.

"Either way, it's damaging," the member said. "She will have a tremendous road to hoe to repair the damage she's done."

Leader Race Heats Up (RC)

By John Bresnahan And Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, November 15, 2006

The race for House Majority Leader between Democratic Reps. Steny Hoyer (Md.) and John Murtha (Pa.) got nasty on Tuesday, as Murtha accused Hoyer's allies of spreading allegations that he was corrupt while Murtha tried to tie Hoyer to President Bush's policy on Iraq.

The back-and-forth between the two senior Democrats came as Hoyer released the names of another 35 supporters, bringing the total number of Members who have backed him for the second-highest position in the House to roughly 80. Murtha has released the names of 22 of his his supporters, meaning approximately 130 Democrats have not openly stated their preference at this point. Murtha would have to capture the vast majority of those undeclared Members to claim victory in the leadership campaign.

Murtha avowed Tuesday that he was a victim of "swift-boating" by Hoyer and his allies via news stories linking him to the Abscam scandal of the early 1980s, as well as more recent reports that he did legislative favors for clients of his brother's lobbying firm and another firm where a former top aide worked.

In the Abscam case, Murtha was caught on videotape being offered a $50,000 bribe by an undercover FBI agent, and although he was a member of the House ethics committee, he failed to report the bribe offer to authorities. Murtha was never charged in the case but was named an unindicted co-conspirator. Six Members and one Senator went to prison in the Abscam probe.

While not accusing Hoyer of spreading the corruption stories himself, Murtha and his advisers suggested that Hoyer had done "oppo research" on the veteran lawmaker and was now feeding negative information on Murtha to the press to damage the Pennsylvania Democrat's campaign for Majority Leader.

"I am disconcerted that some are making headlines by resorting to unfounded allegations that occurred 26 years ago," Murtha said in a statement released by his office. "I thought we were above this type of swift-boating attack. This is not how we restore integrity and civility to the United States Congress."

Murtha then attempted to shift the focus of the leadership battle from ethics to Iraq. Murtha asserted that Hoyer refused to back a November 2005 proposal from Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and other anti-war Democrats, including Murtha, to pull all U.S. troops out of Iraq.

"Of the critical issues we are faced with today, the war in Iraq is the most crucial," Murtha said. "The Pelosi-Murtha position on the war is the reason the Democrats are in the majority today. Congressman Hoyer's position has been to stay the course with President Bush from the very beginning and, like Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), he advocates sending in more troops."

Hoyer refused to personally address Murtha's comments at a press conference on Tuesday, but his office later released a statement pointing out that the Maryland Democrat had co-signed three letters in recent months along with Murtha calling for American forces to be redeployed from Iraq to other countries.

When asked about Murtha's remarks on his Iraq stance, Hoyer said, "That's not accurate."

"Congressman Hoyer and Congressman Murtha have joined other Democratic leaders from both the House and Senate in signing three letters to the president that outline the consensus among Democrats regarding Iraq," added Stacey Farnen Bernards, Hoyer's press secretary.

"Any representation that Congressman Hoyer endorses a 'stay-the-course' strategy or advocates sending more troops to Iraq is wrong."

However, on Nov. 30, 2005, Hoyer released a statement saying that "a precipitous withdrawal of American forces in Iraq could lead to disaster, spawning a civil war, fostering a haven for terrorists and damaging our nation's security and credibility." Hoyer even suggested that additional U.S. troops may have to be sent to the troubled country last year, according to documents still posted on his Web site.

By July 30, 2006, when the first Democratic leadership letter went to Bush, Hoyer had joined with other party leaders in rejecting the "stay-the-course" approach for Iraq. Similar letters were sent to Bush in September and October, and both Murtha and Hoyer co-signed them.

While Tuesday was dominated by the skirmishing over Iraq and corruption, Hoyer continued to publicly demonstrate a broad base of support throughout the Democratic Caucus, releasing a letter from 33 moderates endorsing his candidacy for Majority Leader.

Hoyer also received an important endorsement from Rep. Charlie Rangel (N.Y.), incoming chairman of the powerful House Ways and Means Committee.

But Murtha's supporters continue to claim their man will win in the end, and they caution against reading too much into Whip counts with two days still left in the race.

"He is going to shock everybody," said Rep. Mike Capuano (Mass.). "Don't count Jack out of anything."

One unanswered question is how far Pelosi will go in campaigning on Murtha's behalf following her endorsement of him on Sunday. She is speaking to incoming Democrats about Murtha's candidacy for Majority Leader, according to several Democratic sources, but it does not appear that she is lobbying veteran Democrats at this point. Those in Hoyer's camp continue to claim that Pelosi's statement had relatively little impact on the race so far, and they predict that Murtha cannot win unless Pelosi engages in a full-scale campaign to push him into the post.

Members "greatly respect Nancy Pelosi's leadership, but most of them have made commitments to Hoyer," said Rep. John Dingell (Mich.), who already has publicly endorsed Hoyer.

"I think Hoyer is the best," Dingell added, but declined to discuss whether he was actively lobbying Members on his behalf, stating only: "I am not being shy in saying so."

Another Democratic lawmaker who is backing Hoyer, but spoke on the condition of anonymity citing the sensitive nature of House leadership elections, said lobbying efforts were evident on the House floor earlier this week.

"No one knows the impact of the Speaker-to-be's intervention in the race," the lawmaker added.

But a second Democratic lawmaker, who is also supporting Hoyer in the leadership battle suggested that aggressive "bullying tactics" — involving the loss or award of valuable committee assignments — employed Tuesday have roiled some lawmakers.

"The anger is based on the fact that we should have never been in this position," the Member said. "If [Pelosi] doesn't get this under control soon, it will be her fault."

Rep. Bill Pascrell (N.J.), who issued a "Dear Colleague" letter in support of Murtha on Tuesday, asserted that the questions over Murtha's personal ethics are unfair, although he acknowledged the charges have drawn unwanted media attention to Murtha's past.

"It is an obvious distraction," Pascrell said, holding a folder bearing Murtha's image against a patriotic background, embossed with the words: "John Murtha: Leadership That Makes a Difference."

"To me, he's a man of integrity," Pascrell added.

Another Democratic lawmaker who has endorsed Murtha asserted that the allegations have failed to tarnish the Pennsylvania lawmaker in his own elections, and are unlikely to do so now.

"I think it ought to be instructive to people that none of that has stuck," the lawmaker said.

But one of the Democrats backing Hoyer suggested that highlighting those issues still could be effective.

"The fear among a number of Members is there could be revelations after the [leadership] election," the Democrat said.

Despite mulling the possibility for several days, Rep. Diana DeGette (Colo.) announced Tuesday that she will not campaign for the Majority Whip's office.

With the Colorado lawmaker's decision, it is expected that Caucus Chairman James Clyburn (S.C.), the only declared candidate for the post, will easily win the in the Thursday leadership elections.

"She felt it was in the best interest of the Caucus," said a DeGette spokesman. "Another divisive race was not needed." DeGette is currently the one of seven Chief Deputy Minority Whips.

Although Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) had been expected to seek the Majority Whip office, at the urging of Pelosi, he agreed to instead seek the Caucus chairmanship.

G.O.P. In House Gears Up For New Leadership Fight (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 14 — House Republicans may be divided and dispirited as they prepare to choose new leadership this week, but they seem to agree on the chief qualification they seek in the leader of the new minority party.

"We need the person who can get us back in the majority the fastest," Representative Jeb Hensarling of Texas said.

Still in shock over losing their 12-year-old majority to Democrats, House Republicans are engaged in their second leadership fight in a year, this one part of a soul-searching over how they lost the election and what they can do about it.

The current majority leader, Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the top candidate for minority leader, said Republicans focused too much on simply retaining power.

A rival, Representative Mike Pence of Indiana, said Republicans needed to return to their small-government ideology.

Another rival, Representative Joe L. Barton of Texas, said House Republicans had to restore a more open leadership style with increased involvement from the rank and file.

All want the reversal in fortune to be temporary and say they can be the strongest foil for Democrats who will have to deliver legislative results and in two years defend seats gained this year in Republican territory.

"What is the job of Republican leader in the minority?" Mr. Boehner asked colleagues in a letter that boiled it down succinctly. "It's to hold the job for as short a time as possible."

While Republicans struggled to select their leaders, House Democrats focused on their own fight for majority leader as Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland released the names of new supporters. They brought his publicly disclosed total to more than 70 out of the 118 or so required, depending on whether Democratic candidates awaiting recounts are allowed to vote.

His rival, John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, on Tuesday accused critics of his ethics record of "Swift-boat style" attacks and questioned the depth of Mr. Hoyer's opposition to the Iraq war.

Mr. Murtha has far fewer public endorsements than Mr. Hoyer. But he has one very significant one, that of incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California. Ms. Pelosi appeared at a reception that Mr. Murtha held on Monday night for new Democrats and pressed colleagues to support her candidate on Tuesday.

After a watchdog group criticized Mr. Murtha on Monday for past ethics lapses and new attention focused on his involvement in the Abscam scandal in 1980, he said that he was "disconcerted that some are making headlines by resorting to unfounded allegations that occurred 26 years ago."

Mr. Murtha was never charged.

Mr. Hoyer told reporters, "The majority of the members are for me."

He disputed Mr. Murtha's portrayal of his stand on the war, saying he had a central role in developing the Democratic leadership's consensus position that questions the war.

In the Senate, Republicans faced a new contest as a former Republican leader, Trent Lott of Mississippi, sought a comeback by seeking the No. 2 position, minority whip, in an election on Wednesday. Mr. Lott will be challenging Senator Lamar Alexander of Tennessee.

Mr. Alexander said he had sufficient commitments to win, but Senate Republicans may be newly attracted to the tactical expertise of Mr. Lott, who was forced out in 2002 after a racially insensitive comment.

Senate Democrats formalized their new leadership structure, naming Harry Reid of Nevada as majority leader and retaining Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois in the No. 2 slot.

In a reward for his work in capturing the Senate, a new No. 3 post, vice chairman of the party conference, was created for Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York. Mr. Schumer will again head the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

The House Republican fight was initiated by Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's decision to leave the leadership when control shifts to the Democrats in January. But considering the losses for House Republicans, it was inevitable that some lawmakers would call for a shakeup.

DOJ_NMG_0094775

"Given the beating we took, there has to be a reckoning," said Representative Steve King, Republican of Iowa, who is supporting Mr. Pence and his fellow conservative, John Shadegg of Arizona, for the No. 2 slot.

Mr. Boehner, the affable veteran chosen at the beginning of the year to succeed Tom DeLay, is widely considered the favorite for his managing the House for the last year and for his work to limit Republican losses in Ohio, his home state.

Mr. Boehner has urged his colleagues to confront the reasons behind their losses, regroup and try to offer a "compelling alternative" to the Democrats. Mr. Pence, who has led the House conservative wing, argues that Republicans need to attack the spending increases under the Republican majority and work harder to differentiate themselves from the opposition. In a conference call with Internet bloggers on Tuesday, Mr. Pence said he would aggressively push back against the White House if he believed that the administration was wrong.

"As Moses said famously, I've been burned by a Bush before," said Mr. Pence, who is viewed by his supporters as being a strong communicator who could carry the party message.

Mr. Barton, a surprise entry in the race, will try to build on his support from fellow Texans and members of the Energy and Commerce Committee, which he has led. He promised to have an "open door policy" that guarantees every Republican the chance to meet directly with the leader each week, and he wants to be more aggressive in policing suspected misconduct, an issue that dogged Republicans in this election.

In the race for the second spot, Mr. Shadegg is challenging Representative Roy Blunt of Missouri, the current whip, who lost the contest for majority leader to Mr. Boehner this year.

Many House Republicans say that Mr. Blunt can hold his post, but that the wild card will be whether the party sees the need for a major change in leadership if Mr. Boehner holds on to the top spot.

House Democrats Trade Iraq Charges (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey And Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — Injecting the Iraq war into the escalating fight for the No. 2 spot among House Democrats, Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania on Tuesday attacked his opponent for not backing a push last year for withdrawal of U.S. troops.

Rep. Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland disputed the criticism of his position on the war. Murtha's charge was an effort to turn an antiwar message central to Democratic gains at the polls last week into a wedge issue in determining the party's leadership as it prepares to take control of the House in January.

Murtha's broadside also raised the prospect that the showdown with Hoyer for the majority leader's post would have a larger ideological element than often is the case. Usually, the leadership contests turn more on matters of personality and style than issues.

House Democrats are scheduled to select their leaders for the next Congress on Thursday.

The Murtha-Hoyer contest already was an acrimonious note amid the joy among House Democrats after they picked up more than two dozen seats in the midterm election.

Rep. Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco, who as the head of House Democrats is in line to become the chamber's speaker, surprised some of her colleagues by publicly endorsing Murtha over the weekend.

Hoyer has served as Pelosi's chief lieutenant in the Republican-controlled House and has enjoyed broad support in his bid to continue in that role as majority leader. But Pelosi and Hoyer have never been close, though Murtha is a longtime Pelosi ally.

Murtha, a former Marine and staunch supporter of the military, gained national attention a year ago when, at a Capitol Hill news conference, he excoriated the Bush administration's policies in Iraq and called for troop withdrawal to begin.

Hoyer was not among the Democrats who rallied to his side, and that formed the basis of Murtha's criticism Tuesday.

A statement issued by Murtha's office said, "The record is clear: Jack Murtha has been a constant voice for change in Iraq and Steny Hoyer has not."

A Murtha spokesman added that the lawmaker's position on the war, backed by Pelosi, "is the reason the Democrats are in the majority today" in Congress. "Hoyer's position has been to 'stay the course' with President Bush from the very beginning."

A Hoyer spokeswoman dismissed Murtha's accusation, saying, "Any representation that Congressman Hoyer endorses a 'stay-the-course' strategy or advocates sending more troops to Iraq is wrong."

Later on Tuesday, Hoyer's office released a letter of support for him in the leadership race from nine senior Democratic House members who are expected to become powerful committee chairmen in January. They included Ike Skelton of Missouri, who is expected to lead the House Armed Services Committee, and Tom Lantos of Burlingame, the likely head of the House International Relations Committee.

The House GOP also face an ideological choice when they select leaders Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0094776

Rep. John A. Boehner of Ohio, who took over as majority leader after Rep. Tom DeLay of Texas resigned, is battling to retain his leadership post. But the party's election losses are helping fuel a challenge by Rep. Mike Pence of Indiana, seen by many as a more doctrinaire conservative than Boehner.

Senate Democrats, facing none of the jockeying that is dividing House members, on Tuesday quickly selected Nevada's Harry Reid to be the new majority leader and Illinois' Richard J. Durbin to serve as his deputy.

The two men — with New York Sen. Charles E. Schumer, who will assume the leadership's No. 3 position — played key roles in engineering the party's election-day gains that surprised most experts and gave it the majority in the next Senate.

Democrats also designated their new committee chairs, with California's two senators among them. Barbara Boxer will head the Environment and Public Works panel; Dianne Feinstein will head the Rules Committee.

On the other side of the aisle, Republicans will choose their new Senate leader today. Kentucky Sen. Mitch McConnell, who served as majority whip under outgoing Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, faces no competition in his bid to become minority leader. Sen. Trent Lott of Mississippi is challenging Sen. Lamar Alexander of Tennessee for the No. 2 post.

Choosing Murtha Is No Way To Start The Most Ethical Congress (RC)

By Norman Ornstein

Roll Call, November 15, 2006

Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has done nearly everything picture-perfectly right since the elections swept her into imminent power. From her statements the night of the elections to those the day after, to her approach to the new House to her adroit handling of possible leadership turmoil over the Majority Whip, Democratic Caucus chairmanship and vice chairmanship, she has said and done the right things and acted with finesse to prepare for her Speakership.

I know she means it when she says that she will change the way the House operates, making it more transparent, more honest, more deliberative and more productive. She has spine, drive, intelligence and the passion to be a historic figure in more ways than one.

I winced only a little when she said in a burst of election-eve exuberance that under her leadership, the 110th Congress would be the most honest and ethical in history; that is a rather high bar to set and then successfully leap. But having set that standard, it is fair to bring it up as the House Democrats consider the one intraparty contest Pelosi did not avert — the race for Majority Leader. Now that the contest between Reps. John Murtha (Pa.) and Steny Hoyer (Md.) is on full-bore, I want to elaborate on some comments I made in a column in mid-October, when most Members were not around and the incoming freshmen were just candidates.

There is one thing every House Democrat must do before going into the Caucus to cast that vote for Majority Leader: Go to video.google.com, search for “American Spectator John Murtha,” and then take 53 minutes and 40 seconds to watch the video that comes up.

It is a Jan. 7, 1980, video taken by the FBI during the Abscam sting, and it shows Murtha meeting with agents disguised as Middle Eastern businessmen running an outfit they called Abdul Enterprises and offering cash for political favors, including asylum for one posing as an Arab sheik. They offered $50,000 in cash to Members of Congress for helping them, and a number of Members took the money eagerly. One Senator and six House Members ultimately were convicted of charges including bribery and conspiracy.

Murtha was one of the lawmakers targeted by the FBI. He ultimately was not charged after he cooperated with the FBI and helped implicate some of the other Members. The ethics committee voted along party lines not to bring ethics charges against him — causing the panel’s special counsel, E. Barrett Prettyman Jr., to resign in protest. Murtha since has talked proudly about how he resisted the offers of cash for favors, portraying himself as a hero.

Watch the video, read the transcript and you will see a different story. The Murtha talking to the FBI did refuse to take the money — but here is what he said: “I want to deal with you guys a while before I make any transactions at all, period. ... After we’ve done some business, well, then I might change my mind.”

Murtha spent some time trashing the legislative abilities of his colleagues to whom the “sheik” had already talked, boasting of his own skills.

“I’m going to tell you this. If anybody can do it — I’m not B.S.-ing you fellows — I can get it done my way,” he bragged. “There’s no question about it.”

Why not take the money? “All at once,” he said, “some dumb bastard would go start talking eight years from now about this whole thing and say, ‘Jesus Christ, this happened.’ Then in order to get immunity so he doesn’t go to jail, he starts talking and fingering people. So the [S.O.B.] falls apart.”

After some back-and-forth about how much money might be involved, Anthony Amoroso, one of the disguised FBI agents, offers $50,000. Murtha responded: “I’m not interested.”

DOJ_NMG_0094777

Amoroso: "OK."

But Murtha did not stop there. He added: "At this point, you know, we do business together for a while. Maybe I'll be interested and maybe I won't. ... Right now, I'm not interested in those other things. Now, I won't say that some day, you know, I, if you made an offer, it may be I would change my mind some day."

I must confess I had forgotten about Murtha's role in Abscam, vaguely remembering that he had been one of those involved but not charged. The full transcript of his video, and the video itself, had not been available in the past. They now are — courtesy of The American Spectator and some right-wing blogs. It doesn't matter where the video comes from, of course — only that it is legitimate. It is not a pretty picture, in any way.

OK, this was more than 25 years ago; people change. So let's fast-forward to May 2006. The House Republicans brought up a lobbying and ethics reform package that was a bad joke — one that appalled and embarrassed even many of their own Members. The rule on the package was the typical one from the Rules Committee — no meaningful amendments allowed. But before the vote on final passage, there was a vote on a motion to recommit with instructions, which became a vote on a much more robust and meaningful Democratic alternative. To newcomers to the House: The motion to recommit with instructions usually is a joke itself — framed by the majority leadership not as a real alternative but as a procedural vote that demanded party unity in opposition.

The ethics package was the only occasion in which more than a tiny handful of Republicans bucked their leaders and voted for the Democratic alternative — 20 of them did so in this case, providing an opening for a real reform to pass the House. Except that four Democrats voted against their own party, killing ethics and lobbying reform all by themselves. Among them: John Murtha. Why? We recently learned from The New York Times that Murtha traded away lobbying and ethics reform in return for earmarks from the Republican leaders.

Murtha is a skilled and experienced legislator, a war hero and an articulate and passionate opponent of the Bush administration policy toward Iraq. He also is deeply ethically challenged. Electing him as Majority Leader is no way to start out the most ethical Congress in history.

Some Defense Lobbyists See Win In A Murtha Loss (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, November 15, 2006

Some defense lobbyists who have worked with Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) are hoping that Murtha loses his high-profile majority leader race against Rep. Steny Hoyer (D-Md.).

Murtha, the ranking member of the defense appropriations subcommittee, is a longtime favorite of the defense industry, which has contributed significantly to Murtha's campaign war chest.

While Murtha would stay a strong ally to the defense industry as majority leader, several lobbyists said in recent days — as the competition for the No. 2 House position has intensified — that they would much rather see Murtha hold the gavel of the defense appropriations subcommittee. As such, he would have direct influence on the industry's interests.

Rep. Norm Dicks (D-Wash.), a Boeing proponent who would replace Murtha as chairman of the defense appropriations subcommittee, is also considered a friend of the industry. However, Murtha shells out far more earmarks.

As majority leader, Murtha would be under the spotlight with every move the Democrats make to reform ethics and lobbying practices. Murtha voted against the House Democratic substitute on lobbying reform and has strongly defended the use of earmarks.

In a Sept. 29 C-SPAN "Newsmakers" interview, Murtha said, "… just because a member wants something that is beneficial to their district or to the country in many cases, I don't define that as earmarked."

Murtha has also been known to trade earmarks for votes on the floor, which has become a regular practice in Congress.

In the wake of the former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) scandal – which centered on defense earmarks – some believe that earmark use will drop significantly in the new Congress.

"There is going to be some reduction in the number of earmarks, there is going to be greater scrutiny, which is going to yield a much better product," said Steve Ellis of Taxpayers for Common Sense. "We would much rather see a system, which is a meritorious system."

The Democratic leadership is expected early next year to introduce much of the Honest Leadership and Open Government Act, which it unveiled last January.

Several lobbyists said that they feel they are taking the hit for a few bad apples. Some are balking at the proposed public disclosure of lobbying activities, which under the Democrats' proposal requires lobbyists to file quarterly reports with more information than is required now, including campaign contributions, fundraisers and other events and the name of each member contacted.

"If lobbyists are required to put on their lobbying reports their fundraising activity and the offices that we go to, it would be impossible for any of these members to solicit money from any of these lobbyists that lobby their office," said one defense lobbyist.

"It hurts us as well as it hurts them and it hurts the process. Lobbyists are an essential part of the process. We serve a very important function and that should not be overlooked," the lobbyist added.

Some have said that it may be harder to meet new members, and if they hold fundraisers for them at the beginning of the year, when the budget comes out, that fundraising could be interpreted as a quid pro quo.

The American League of Lobbyists (ALL) yesterday called on Congress to proceed cautiously with lobbying legislation. Watchdog groups, meanwhile, are pushing hard for far-reaching reform bills.

"We're concerned that the message being sent by members of the new Congress about the lobbying profession is unfairly negative," said Paul Miller, ALL president. "Lobbyists should not once again become the target of overreaching reforms that won't achieve a goal of openness and transparency."

Miller also said that new legislation is not necessary and that rules changes in the House and Senate would be sufficient.

Under the Democratic plan, lobbyists would also be barred from arranging, sponsoring and participating in trips for lawmakers. But one defense lobbyist said that could backfire as legislators may resort to military flights if they want to visit a site, thereby charging the taxpayer.

Unfit For Majority Leader (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

The videotape is grainy, dark and devastating. The congressman and the FBI undercover agents -- the congressman thinks they represent an Arab sheik willing to pay $50,000 to get immigration papers -- are talking business in the living room of a secretly wired Washington townhouse.

Two other congressmen in on the deal "do expect to be taken care of," the lawmaker says. But for the time being -- and he says repeatedly that he might change his mind and take money down the road -- he'd rather trade his help for investment in his district, maybe a hefty deposit in the bank of a political supporter who's done him favors.

"I'm not interested -- at this point," he says of the dangled bribe. "You know, we do business for a while, maybe I'll be interested, maybe I won't, you know." Indeed, he acknowledges, even though he needs to be careful -- "I expect to be in the [expletive] leadership of the House," he notes -- the money's awfully tempting. "It's hard for me to say, just the hell with it."

This is John Murtha, incoming House speaker Nancy Pelosi's choice to be her majority leader, snared but not charged in the Abscam probe in 1980. "The Democrats intend to lead the most honest, most open and most ethical Congress in history," Pelosi pledged on election night. Five days later she wrote Murtha a letter endorsing his bid to become her No. 2.

Not the most promising start.

For years Murtha has relied on the Abscam bottom line to argue that the case is not a problem for him: He wasn't indicted. But he was named a co-conspirator in the bribery scheme. The feckless House ethics committee didn't take action against him, though the outside investigator it hired quit in disgust after the panel rejected his recommendation to file misconduct charges.

"I am the guy that didn't take the money," Murtha said this summer when his opponent raised the issue.

Yes, but: He's the guy who, brought into the deal by two other House members -- Frank Thompson (D-N.J.) and John Murphy (D-N.Y.) -- agreed to meet with men offering money in return for official action. He's the guy who knew these two colleagues expected a payoff and even vouched for them with the would-be bribers ("Both of them are solid.").

He's the guy who, when offered a bribe, still wanted to do a deal. "I'm delighted to do business with him and do every goddamn thing I can within bounds, you know, so I don't get myself in jail, in order to get him into the country and whatever needs to be done," he says on the video, unearthed by the conservative American Spectator. (You can watch at http://www.spectator.org/.) He's the guy who -- as a member of the House ethics committee-- did nothing to stop the scheme.

Sorry, but I'm not buying Murtha's argument that he's the victim of a "Swift-boating attack" over "unfounded allegations that occurred 26 years ago." On its own, Murtha's Abscam conduct is disqualifying.

Even if it weren't, though, everything in Murtha's post-Abscam life is of a piece with the back-scratching, dealmaking style on display in the video. In a story last month, the New York Times described how Murtha has operated "a political trading post" in a back corner -- the Murtha corner, it's called -- of the House floor, where Democrats and Republicans alike come to get Murtha's blessing for earmarks or his help on close votes. As Pennsylvania Democrat Paul Kanjorski told the Times, "nobody ever leaves completely disappointed."

DOJ_NMG_0094779

Murtha is one of 12 Democrats who voted against the McCain-Feingold campaign finance reform bill. He's one of four who killed a strong Democratic ethics package earlier this year. He is a one-man earmarking factory whose beneficiaries have included a lobbying firm that employed his brother and another founded by a former top aide.

The biggest puzzle, and biggest disappointment, in all this is Pelosi, who was pitch-perfect in her first several days as speaker-elect. Now comes this lose-lose move.

If she gets her way and helps Murtha win a come-from-behind victory against Maryland's Steny Hoyer in tomorrow's leadership election, she's buying herself -- and the Democratic caucus -- endless news stories about Murtha's ethics. If, as he says, Hoyer has the votes, Pelosi has made herself look weak within the caucus -- not a smart move for any new leader, and certainly not for the first woman in the job. Perhaps the late timing and measured phrasing of Pelosi's endorsement were meant to ensure that it would have little impact. If so, Pelosi failed to recognize that once she weighed in, the vote for majority leader would inevitably be seen as a gauge of her clout.

I wrote a few weeks back that Pelosi's first test as speaker would be whether she picks Florida's Alcee Hastings -- who was removed from his federal judgeship for agreeing to take a bribe -- to head the intelligence committee. As it turns out, I was wrong. Pelosi's first test was how to handle Murtha. Whatever happens tomorrow, she flunked. Whether she'll get another failing grade on Hastings remains to be seen.

Meet The New Boss (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi's endorsement of Rep. John Murtha for majority leader, the No. 2 position in the Democratic leaderhsip, has roiled her caucus. "She will ensure that they [Mr. Murtha and his allies] win. This is hardball politics," Rep. Jim Moran, a top Murtha ally, told the Hill, a congressional newspaper. "We are entering an era where when the speaker instructs you what to do, you do it."

But several members are privately aghast that Mr. Murtha, a pork-barreling opponent of most House ethics reforms, could become the second most visible symbol of the new Democratic rule. "We are supposed to change business as usual, not put the fox in charge of the henhouse," one Democratic member told me. "It's not just the Abscam scandal of the 1980s that he barely dodged, he's a disaster waiting to happen because of his current behavior," another told me.

As for Abscam, a recent book by George Crile, a producer for CBS's "60 Minutes," provides damning evidence that Mr. Murtha escaped severe punishment for his role in the scandal only because then-Speaker Tip O'Neill arranged for the House Ethics Committee to drop the charges, over the objections of the committee's outside prosecutor. The prosecutor quickly resigned in protest.

Outside observers are equally aghast that Mr. Murtha could win tomorrow's election. Thomas Mann, a Brookings Institution scholar who is co-author of "The Broken Branch: How Congress Is Failing America and How to Get It Back on Track," told the Los Angeles Times that "John Murtha is not the right poster child" for a Democratic House that says it wants to sweep away corruption.

Melanie Sloan, the liberal head of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, was cheered on by Democrats six weeks ago when she helped reveal the Mark Foley scandal. Now she says that "Ms. Pelosi"s endorsement of Rep. Murtha, one of the most unethical members of Congress, show that she may have prioritized ethics reform merely to win votes with no real commitment to changing the culture of corruption."

Former members are also speaking out. Chris Bell, a former Democratic House member from Texas who was his party's unsuccessful nominee for governor this year, told the Washington Post that Mr. Murtha was instrumental in making Rep. Alan Mollohan of West Virginia the top Democrat on the House Ethics Committee. Mr. Bell says Reps. Mollohan and Murtha both helped to slow ethics reform to a crawl for much of the last two years. This spring, Mr. Mollohan was forced to step down from his Ethics Committee position after The Wall Street Journal reported that he had underreported personal assets and steered earmarks to various West Virginia entities founded or controlled by his close political allies.

Mr. Murtha has also been front and center in the controversy over earmarks, the individual portions of pork members of Congress often secretly secure for their districts or favored constituents. Mr. Murtha is the ranking Democratic member of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee and for the past three years has been the House's top recipient of defense industry cash. Few in Washington are surprised that his lobbyist brother, Robert "Kit" Murtha, was until his retirement this summer an enormously successful "earmark specialist" for the Beltway firm KSA Consulting. In recent years, Kit Murtha brought in a mother lode of earmarks for at least 16 defense manufacturers with business before the Appropriations Committee.

Last year, the Los Angeles Times reported that "most of KSA's defense contractor clients hired the firm in hopes of securing funding from Rep. Murtha's subcommittee, according to lobbying records and interviews. And most retained the firm after Kit Murtha became a senior partner in 2002." Kit Murtha told the Times that he saw Rep. Murtha only infrequently, but said the congressman knew he was a KSA lobbyist. "I don't think that influences him," Kit said of his brother. "I certainly would hope not."

Mr. Murtha isn't talking much about all of these controversies, no doubt hoping that the clock will run out on questions about them when Democrats vote for majority leader tomorrow. For now his surrogates are brushing aside all inquiries. "There is no substance to it," says Rep. Linda Sanchez of California, a key Murtha ally. Ms. Pelosi's office will only say that Mr. Murtha "has addressed these issues." But he really hasn't, and Ms. Pelosi should know better.

Take the Abscam probe, in which Mr. Murtha was named an unindicted co-conspirator in the late-1970s FBI sting operation in which agents posed as Saudi sheiks and offered members of Congress bribes for help in securing asylum in the U.S. and getting money out of Saudi Arabia. In the end, a U.S. senator and six representatives accepted the cash and were convicted of bribery or lesser charges.

I spoke with Mr. Murtha's press secretary last Friday and emailed her Abscam-related questions. I followed up with a phone call yesterday. She never responded. Yesterday Mr. Murtha did issue a statement attempting to deflect questions: "I am disconcerted that some are making headlines by resorting to unfounded allegations that occurred 26 years ago. I thought we were above this type of swift-boating attack. This is not how we restore integrity and civility to the United States Congress"

Mr. Murtha was among those who were offered the Abscam bribe money. He declined it, but the late columnist Jack Anderson said the Pennsylvania congressman's conduct was "perhaps the saddest scene on the secret Abscam videotapes. He refused to take the money, but his reason was hardly noble."

The 54-minute Abscam tape shows Mr. Murtha functioning as a cynical backroom operator, telling the FBI undercover agents: "You know, you made an offer. It might be that I might change my mind someday." Later, he explained how that might happen: "I want to deal with you guys awhile before I make any transactions at all, period," he told the fake sheiks. "After we've done some business, well, then I might change my mind. I'm going to tell you this. If anybody can do it--I am not BSing you fellows--I can get it done my way. There's no question about it."

Mr. Murtha has said his only interest in the purported Saudi sheiks' money was that he hoped it would be invested in businesses in his district. But the full tape makes clear that Mr. Murtha was primarily interested in talking about such investments as a possible cover should he later decide to have the money transferred.

"And what I'm sayin' is, a few investments in my district, a few you know, is big to me, to this guy apparently is not too big, to a couple of banks which would get their attention. And investment in a business where you could legitimately say to me--when I say legitimately, I'm talking about so these bastards up here can't say to me, well, why, in eight years from now, that's possible, we'd never hear a thing for eight years, but all at once, ah, some dumb bastard would go start talking eight years from now, ah, about the whole thing and say, '[expletive], ah, this happened,' then he, then he, in order to get immunity so he doesn't go to jail, he starts talking and fingering people and then the [expletive] all falls apart."

The undercover FBI agent in the meeting then spoke up and said "You give us the banks where you want the money deposited."

"All right" Mr. Murtha responded. "How much money we talking about?"

"Well, you tell me" replied the FBI agent.

A few moments later in the tape, Mr. Murtha continues his discussion of how "a business commitment" in his district would be structured: "A business commitment that makes it imperative for me to help him. Just, let me tell you something. I'm sure if--and there's a lot of things I've done up here, with environmental regulations, with all kinds of waivers of laws and regulations. If it weren't for being in the district, people would say, 'Well that [expletive], I'm gonna tell you something this guy is, uh, you know, on the take.' Well once they say that, what happens? Then they start going around looking for the [expletive] money. So I want to avoid that by having some tie to the district. That's all. That's the secret to the whole thing."

It appears that what Mr. Murtha was referring to was a form of investment not for the sake of investment, but because "that's the secret" to how you can take a bribe and get away with it. Mr. Murtha was never indicted for his role in Abscam, even though he testified in federal court that he had called his "immigration guy" to determine what could be done to help the fake sheik with his immigration problems.

But in 1981, the House Ethics Committee became concerned that Mr. Murtha had, at a minimum, violated House rules that required he report any attempt at bribery, which he had not. A special prosecutor, Barry Prettyman, was appointed to oversee the committee's investigation. He soon expanded his probe beyond the six House members who were directly involved and began moving against Rep. Murtha. He was also rumored to be offering deals in exchange for testimony that would take the scandal inside the office of Speaker O'Neill.

That was the final straw from the irascible O'Neill. He determined to shut the investigation down, and the story of how he did it makes up a fascinating part of Mr. Crile's book, "Charlie Wilson's War" (Atlantic Monthly Press, 2003). Crile died earlier this year of cancer, but his story of how the larger-than-life Rep. Charlie Wilson of Texas single-handedly steered money from the defense subcommittee that Rep. Murtha chaired to the anti-Soviet mujahadeen in Afghanistan is so riveting that it is being made into a major motion picture produced by Mike Nichols and starring Tom Hanks and Julia Roberts.

Crile reported that in early 1981 Speaker O'Neill called Rep. Wilson into his office and told him he wanted him to join the Ethics Committee right away. The Texas congressman had been pestering him for years to get a lifetime seat on the board the Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts. "It's the best perk in town," Mr. Wilson told Crile. "It means that I get the box right next to the president's box for the ballet when I want it. I get to go to all the cast parties, meet all the movie stars, and I get an extra invitation to the White House every season."

O'Neill made it clear he would appoint Mr. Wilson to the board he coveted, but that he would have to joni the Ethics Committee to take care of the Murtha matter. "It's a package deal, Chally," O'Neill is said to have told Mr. Wilson.

"The word on Charlie was that he didn't talk," ex-Rep. Tony Coelho, who became majority whip after O'Neill's retirement, told Crile. "From time to time the speaker needed to mount irregular operations, and Wilson was one of those irregulars Tip could count on." Mr. Wilson didn't need any prodding for his task: "He was a happy warrior as he raced to the rescue of his imperiled friend John Murtha," Crile wrote.

Crile reported that prior to Mr. Wilson's arrival on the Ethics Committee, it had largely given Mr. Prettyman, the special counsel, a free hand in his probe. That quickly changed: "Before Prettyman could fully deploy his investigators to move on the Murtha case, he was informed that the committee had concluded there was no justification for an investigation." The Ethics Committee chairman, Rep. Louis Stokes of Ohio, suddenly declared "This matter is closed."

Mr. Prettyman, who had already likened the Ethics Committee to "a misdemeanor court faced with a multiple murder," was furious at the dramatic change of course. He abruptly resigned his post the same afternoon the committee voted to clear Mr. Murtha. While Mr. Prettyman continues to refuse to discuss the case, he told Roll Call newspaper in 1990 that it would be "a logical conclusion" that he resigned over the committee's exoneration of Mr. Murtha. Crile's book notes that "a teary Murtha had confided to a colleague that Wilson's effort had saved his life." Crile concludes that the Murtha "rescue operation" had far-reaching consequences. "For O'Neill the intervention ended the threat to his hold on the House and unleashed him to become Ronald Reagan's liberal tormentor."

Two decades later, In 2002, ex-Rep. Don Bailey, a Democrat who had sat on the Ethics Committee (and who lost to Mr. Murtha in a Democratic primary in 1982, after decennial redistricting put them in the same district) released a public letter to Mr. Murtha: "I was, to be honest, critical about how you misled me about Abscam where you convinced me you had voluntarily told federal agents about the offer of money to you." Mr. Bailey continued: "I learned later, after I had successfully defeated the ethics charges against you, that you had merely manipulated the system to cooperate with federal agents to avoid prosecution."

For his part, Mr. Wilson was quite pleased by his role in burying the Murtha probe. Crile reported that Mr. Wilson told him he "laughed off the incident as if it had been an entertainment." Mr. Wilson said, "It was the best deal I ever made. I only had to be on Ethics for a year, and I get to stay on the Kennedy Center for life."

When I spoke with Crile last year, he confirmed that he stood by his account of the spiking of the Murtha ethics probe. Last night Mr. Wilson assured me that the Crile book was "completely accurate." (The only complaint about any facts in it, he said, had come from the heirs to a Texas oilman who was briefly mentioned in it.) Mr. Wilson told me he and George Crile were 50-50 partners in the movie deal.

When I asked Mr. Wilson about the portions of the book that dealt with his efforts to squelch the Ethics Committee probe of Mr. Murtha, he tersely said, "I have no comment." He reiterated that Mr. Murtha remains his good friend--they appeared together at a Pennsylvania fund-raising event for Democratic candidates--and said that Mr. Murtha has been unfairly attacked for his record in promoting earmarks.

In contrast to Sen. John McCain, whose experience in the 1990 Keating Five scandal turned him into a good-government reformer, Mr. Murtha's brush with infamy stirred in him a conviction that members of Congress deserve more protection from ethics probes. In 1997 Mr. Murtha joined with Rep. Billy Tauzin, a Louisiana Republican, in blocking outside groups and private citizens from filing complaints directly with the House Ethics Committee.

Mr. Murtha also pushed for a law that would require the Justice Department to reimburse the legal bills of any member of Congress it investigated if it was shown the probe was not "substantially justified"--a privilege no other American enjoyed. Only after Henry Hyde, then chairman of the Judiciary Committee, objected was the bill amended to allow reimbursement for anyone--member of Congress or not--acquitted in a "bad faith" prosecution.

Gary Ruskin, director of the liberal Congressional Accountability Project, told Roll Call that "when it comes to institutional policing of corruption in Congress, John Murtha is a one-man wrecking crew." Now with the support of Ms. Pelosi, that "wrecking crew" stands just one ballot away from becoming House majority leader. Should he win the sealed-ballot election of his peers tomorrow, Democrats may have a hard time explaining just what has changed regarding the Congress's "culture of corruption."

Ultra-liberals Rise On Moderate Wings (HILL)

By Dick Morris

The Hill, November 15, 2006

The results of the '06 election are in. The left wing of the Democratic Party has taken over Congress. Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) is the Speaker. Rep. Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) is the new chairman of the Ways and Means panel. Sen. Harry Reid (D-Nev.) is majority leader, and Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) runs the Environment Committee. The left is empowered.

But how did it achieve these majorities? It did so lifted by the wings of moderate, centrist Democrats who mastered their GOP opponents throughout the country. It was not liberals who defeated Republican incumbents in the House and Senate. It was moderates, future members of the Democratic Leadership Council (DLC).

The only reason Pelosi is Speaker is that a fresh crop of moderate Democrats ousted Republican incumbents in the House. A majority of these new congressmen and -women have announced their intention to join the DLC.

It is only because pro-lifer Bob Casey beat Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), former Reagan Navy Secretary Jim Webb defeated Sen. George Allen (R-Va.), and gun-control opponent Jon Tester triumphed in Montana that Harry Reid is the new Senate majority leader.

Moveon.org, party chairman Howard Dean, and the blogger left had nothing to do with the '06 victory. Democrats who study the election results carefully will reaffirm the lessons learned by the defeat of Walter Mondale and Michael Dukakis — the American people will not elect liberal Democrats, but will turn to moderates.

The irony is that the expressed will of the American people has been so radically ignored in the shaping of the 110th Congress. The fact is that the elevation of Nancy Pelosi to the speakership is no more a legitimate expression of the voters' will than would be the retention of Dennis Hastert. The seniority system, rigidly applied by Pelosi in violation of the spirit of the Gingrich reforms of 1994, has ordained that a liberal establishment will run Congress, whatever the voters say.

Is there anyone who will sanely maintain that Rangel represents the broad middle of American views on tax reform, or that Levin speaks for most Americans on national security? All that has happened is that the ranking members have become the chairmen, regardless of their views or qualifications. It is a gesture of homage to seniority that would have the approval of the segregationists that used to run Congress by applying the same ground rules. Back then, no matter how loudly voters demanded integration and an end to racism, the Democratic majority kept apartheid firmly in place. The distortion of the electorate's will taking place now on Capitol Hill is no more extreme.

Will the Democrats pay for their imperial overreach? Not if, despite taking the majority, they stay in opposition, use their power to oppose the Bush administration, investigate it endlessly, and continue the negative criticism that embodied their '06 campaign.

But such is not the nature of the Democratic Party. Power will likely go to their heads. Their constituencies will not be appeased by mere partisan criticism of Bush. Had the Democrats been fortunate enough to win only the House, they could have hidden behind the wall of Senate obstructionism and pleaded their inability to pass legislation. But having won both, they have no excuse but to pass legislation that will reflect the will of their issue-group masters and expose the differences between the views of their party and those of the voters.

Bush will still be president, so their output will face a daunting succession of presidential vetoes. So will there be a backlash? No. There will only be the beginning of a backlash. Bush's likely intransigence on Iraq, global warming, and a host of other issues will shield the Democrats from the political consequences of their own legislative initiatives.

Rather, we have to see 2007 and 2008 as the beginnings of a massive Republican revival. Only when the likes of Hillary Clinton take the White House in 2008 — still my bet — will the resurgence be fully evident. Just as she saved the GOP in 1994, she'll repeat the favor in 2010 and 2012.

Morris and McGann, husband and wife, have written several books together, including Rewriting History, a rebuttal to Living History by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

House GOP Scrambles For Leader (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, November 15, 2006

House Republicans in search of someone to lead them out of the minority wilderness are growing increasingly frustrated with their choices in the leadership elections as Senate Democrats yesterday swiftly approved a slate of top leaders.

Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada was picked to be majority leader and much of the rest the Democratic leadership also remained in place -- a clear sign of gratitude for orchestrating last week's six-seat pickup that just last year Mr. Reid predicted would require a "miracle."

DOJ_NMG_0094783

"Two years ago, we had an opportunity for new leadership on the Democratic side of the Senate, and we chose as our leader Harry Reid," said Sen. Richard J. Durbin, Illinois Democrat, elected yesterday to be majority whip. "We could not have made a better choice to unify this caucus, to make certain that we came to the floor every day with a purpose, and most importantly, that we took a message to the American people, a message of hope."

Today, Senate Republicans are expected to approve Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky to be the minority leader. Sen. Trent Lott of Mississippi, a former Senate Republican leader, and Sen. Lamar Alexander of Tennessee, are locked in a tight but very quiet race for the No. 2 slot.

In the House, things aren't as quiet, as the Democratic race for majority leader grows bitter and the Republicans remain divided over who should lead their party.

Rep. John P. Murtha, the Pennsylvania Democrat who has become the face of his party's anti-war stance and is running for majority leader, harshly criticized Rep. Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the current No. 2 Democrat. Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California will almost assuredly become House speaker in January.

"The Pelosi-Murtha position on the war is the reason the Democrats are in the majority today," Mr. Murtha said. "Congressman Hoyer's position has been to stay the course with President Bush from the very beginning."

Mr. Hoyer's office noted that he and Mr. Murtha both signed three letters urging Mr. Bush to withdraw troops from Iraq. Mr. Hoyer yesterday declined to respond to questions about whether Mr. Murtha's past ethical and legal troubles might undermine the party's declared aim of cleaning up what Democrats called "the culture of corruption" in Congress.

"I am not looking back," Mr. Hoyer said. "My role is to look forward."

Among House Republicans, members remain divided over their top post, and one of the most frequently floated names for the No. 2 position isn't even running.

Most insiders say Rep. John A. Boehner, the Ohio Republican and current majority leader, is favored to win the top spot, but Rep. Mike Pence, Indiana Republican, has been widely praised by conservatives off the Hill as a fresh face.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois has declined to run for the leader position.

Some Republicans have expressed reluctance to return Mr. Boehner to leadership after last week's disastrous elections, and some are opposed to Mr. Pence for forging a compromise on immigration that critics dismissed as "amnesty." Yesterday, Mr. Pence renounced those efforts.

"All those debates about compromise are a thing of the past," he said in an interview with talk-radio host Laura Ingraham.

"I reject any form of amnesty, even if we've got border security," he said. "I really reject the idea that people whose first act in this country was a violation of the law ought to be able to get right with the law without leaving the country."

In the race for Republican whip, many members say they are far less enthusiastic.

The current whip -- Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri, who hopes to retain the position -- has talked about the need for "cultural change in Washington," but is an old ally of ousted leader Tom DeLay. It didn't help that he attended a fundraising golf tournament last weekend, just days after his party lost 30 seats amid charges of corruption.

"Mr. Blunt is proud of the significant financial assistance he has given to hundreds of Republican members and candidates and believes that fundraising is a necessary part of recapturing our majority in 2008," his spokeswoman said.

Challenging Mr. Blunt is Rep. John Shadegg of Arizona, a conservative who lost his bid earlier this year for majority leader.

"He was one of the guys who got here in the '94 Republican revolution and didn't go native," said Rep. Paul D. Ryan, Wisconsin Republican, who supports Mr. Shadegg.

But others say Mr. Shadegg is uninspiring and aloof. Many have settled on Rep. Eric Cantor of Virginia, Mr. Blunt's chief deputy whip, who actively supports Mr. Blunt's re-election.

"Everybody is asking why Cantor is not running," said one Republican staffer who requested anonymity to speak freely about the leadership race.

Mr. Ryan, who is friends with Mr. Cantor, said, "Most people would say Eric would win, but he doesn't want to win that way. He's Roy's deputy, and he's being loyal. That's who Eric is."

Indeed, Mr. Cantor declined to comment on the growing "draft Cantor" movement, except to say he's not running and supports Mr. Blunt.

"The fact that Cantor won't go back on his word to Blunt is exactly why he should be in leadership," said a frustrated Republican aide. "For the future of this party, Blunt should step aside."

House GOP May Go Back To The Future (HILL)

By Patrick O'connor

The Hill, November 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0094784

Former Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) is gone, Democrats will soon control the floor and House speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) will be just another member of the minority — if a member at all.

As much as last week's momentous loss ushered in a new era for Republicans in the House, the GOP is on the brink of returning some familiar faces to the leadership.

With Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) all but assured of retaining the title of leader when Republicans assume the minority next year, suspense hangs on the race for whip between Reps. Roy Blunt (R-Mo.), the current occupant, and John Shadegg (R-Ariz.), a darling of the conservative media.

Blunt has told supporters in private that he has the votes to preserve his leadership post when members cast their secret ballots this Friday, members and an aide said yesterday, but some of those same supporters question the strength of his backing. Blunt made a similar prediction before losing to Boehner in their majority leader race earlier this year.

Some of Blunt's allies are desperate for him to step aside in order to clear the way for his chief deputy, Rep. Eric Cantor (R-Va.), a prolific fundraiser and established vote-counter who has been making phone calls in support of the Missouri Republican since last Wednesday.

These supporters are concerned that Blunt's tally is soft heading into the election and that some of his confirmed votes will buck him on the secret ballot. Whips rank their votes on a number scale to account for the level of support, and many of the whip's supporters are not hard commitments, one ally said yesterday.

"If you're the incumbent and you don't have the support locked down to hold your job, you're screwed," the same backer said yesterday. "You have to understand you're screwed and get out of the race."

Concerned that Shadegg would fumble some of the procedural responsibilities required of a whip, these Blunt supporters are weighing their options to elevate Cantor to the No. 2 slot in the Republican hierarchy.

"A sizable percentage of Blunt supporters are supporting Blunt because of Cantor," the same lawmaker said.

Blunt's staff is dismissive of these suggestions to step aside.

"Congressman Blunt is extremely responsive to the members of his conference, and he is staying in the race to win it because he believes he has the support from the majority of his colleagues," his spokeswoman, Jessica Boulanger, said.

Internal rules governing the election process allow members to nominate limitless candidates on the day of the election. Cantor has pledged not to challenge Blunt, but members could nominate him even though he has not campaigned.

The Virginia Republican has not had any role in this movement to elect him, his spokesman and a number of outside members said, but he could stem the speculation with a public statement of support for Blunt.

There is some concern on a staff level that a loose group of senior staff and established outside lobbyists are feeding much of the buzz about Cantor and Rep. Adam Putnam (R-Fla.), who is vying for the conference chairmanship against Reps. Marsha Blackburn (R-Tenn.), Jack Kingston (R-Ga.) and Dan Lungren (R-Calif.).

While evidence is scant that such a group is coordinating votes behind-the-scenes, the perception concerns those members and staff with limited input on leadership decisions and could foment discontent over the next two years.

Members and staff from all ends of the conference believe Boehner has the race for leader wrapped up, but his two opponents, Reps. Mike Pence (R-Ind.) and Joe Barton (R-Texas), continue to work for support in anticipation of the Friday ballot.

"Personally, I am not willing to wait for the Democrats to make their own mistakes to take back the majority," Rep. Joe Pitts (R-Pa.), a prominent social conservative, wrote to members of the Values Action Team yesterday. "We need a leader who can, as Newt Gingrich did and as President Reagan did, communicate ably and earnestly with the American people about what we believe. I believe Mike Pence is that man."

Most of the candidates running from outside the leadership were expecting stronger discontent from Republicans following last week's rout on Election Day.

Pence, the chairman of the conservative Republican Study Committee who characterizes his confrontations with leadership as "cheerful pugilism," said Republicans have not yet grasped the enormity of last week's loss and what that means when Congress resumes next year.

"One thing our colleagues have yet to completely absorb is that the environment is completely different," Pence told a small group of reporters yesterday.

Given that shift, Pence said the conference, and particularly its leaders, should stake their own position on issues and battle the administration publicly whenever necessary, something past leaders have been reluctant to do.

Conservatives throughout the party have seized on last week's results to argue that Republicans have strayed from their principles in recent years, and many of these members hint that the conference should make some bold steps during its reorganization.

DOJ_NMG_0094785

Rep. Tom Feeney (R-Fla.), an outspoken conservative who is not publicly backing either candidate in the whip race, is concerned that Republicans will send a bad message to angry GOP voters who either didn't show up or voted against them on Election Day for ethical transgressions and failing to reduce federal spending.

"We got in trouble with voters outside the Beltway for things we did inside the Beltway," Feeney said. "We have to show them Republicans inside the Beltway understand that."

Centrist Republicans are concerned that this conservative shift will alienate them even further from the decision-making process.

During a dinner of the centrist Republican Main Street Partnership on Monday, which was attended by numerous centrists who lost, such as Rep. Nancy Johnson (R-Conn.), members lamented their diminished influence in the conference. Most members present were backing Boehner in the race for leader, according to one attendee, but few were enthused about their choices in many of the top races. Only members who won their Election Day races can vote in the leadership races.

In general, centrists are concerned that leaders have ignored their priorities in the past, and a conservative resurgence would continue to endanger their seats.

"I don't think a rightward shift is the way to go," Rep. Mike Castle (R-Del.), who often negotiates with leaders on centrist concerns, said last week on the brink of Election Day.

As members fight for the upper hand in races for whip and conference chair, Rep. Thaddeus McCotter (R-Mich.) is expected to release the names of 105 supporters tomorrow that would lock up his bid for chairman of the Republican Policy Committee, the seat Putnam abandoned in his bid for conference chair, spokesman Bob Jackson said. Rep. Darrell Issa (R-Calif.), McCotter's opponent, released his own list of 60 public supporters yesterday.

As Friday approaches, Blunt's supporters are encouraging members to stand with him because he has proven himself in the role during such a difficult stretch for Republicans.

Rep. Kevin Brady (R-Texas), a loyal Blunt supporter, thinks it would be foolish for members to replace their current whip because he is proven at corralling tough votes, particularly among conservatives, and because Republicans will need to unite against Democrats in the minority.

"Democrats took a page from our playbook by unifying, and that's when it was difficult to govern," Brady said. "We would be foolish to miss our own lesson."

GOP Term Limits Rule Challenged (RC)

By Ben Pershing

Roll Call, November 15, 2006

Former President Bill Clinton once famously questioned "what the meaning of the word 'is' is." For a pair of House Republican chairmen, their fate in the 110th Congress may rest on the definition of another tricky two-letter word — "or."

With the GOP majority gone, most current chairmen are preparing to move into their panels' ranking member slots. But two committee heads — Judiciary Chairman Jim Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.) and Transportation and Infrastructure Chairman Don Young (R-Alaska) — are prevented by Republican Conference rules on term limits from keeping their party's top panel posts next year.

Or maybe not.

Republican sources said Sensenbrenner and Young have told the GOP leadership that they would like to keep their jobs even though both have served a full six years as chairmen, the maximum under the current rules. Their argument: The rules don't really say what they seem to say.

"It's a sticky issue," said a Republican leadership aide, who nonetheless expressed confidence that "it's all being sorted out."

The "term limitation" section of Conference Rule 14 — which was implemented at the start of the 104th Congress and has not been changed since — reads, "No individual shall serve more than three consecutive terms as chairman or ranking member of a standing, select, joint or ad hoc committee or subcommittee."

The standard interpretation of that rule has been that there is a six-year limit on serving in the top GOP slot on a committee, period. But Sensenbrenner and Young have made the case that the phrase "chairman or ranking member" suggests that a Member should be able to put in up to three terms in one job, and then another three in the other.

"The rules are ambiguous," said a Republican aide who has been involved in discussions of the term-limit issue.

Allies of Sensenbrenner and Young argue that the "or" was inserted to allow the Conference some flexibility on the matter. They also point out that senior lawmakers might hesitate to serve as ranking members in the minority if that means they will be eating into their potential service time as future chairmen. Theoretically, a Republican could put in six loyal years as a stalwart ranking member and then — if the GOP takes back the House — would not be able to reap the reward of a gavel.

DOJ_NMG_0094786

The potential controversy applies only to Young and Sensenbrenner, as the other term-limited panel heads are all leaving Congress. Both men have made their cases to leadership, though neither's office wanted to comment for this story.

One Member who does not share their interpretation of the rules is Rep. Lamar Smith (R-Texas), who is in line to take over the Judiciary ranking membership in the 110th Congress.

"The rule seems clear and unambiguous," said Smith spokeswoman Beth Frigola. "Congressman Smith is looking forward to making his case to the Steering Committee why he should be the ranking member of the Judiciary Committee."

Sensenbrenner generally has gotten good marks from panel members and from leaders for his stewardship of the panel, though his stubbornness on certain issues has sometimes rubbed leaders the wrong way.

Young, meanwhile, has made more enemies in his stint as Transportation chairman and may not retain enough goodwill to win the ranking membership even if the rules say what he thinks they do. In September 2005, Young made a pitch for the Homeland Security Committee gavel that was not well-received by the Steering panel, and Rep. Peter King (R-N.Y.) ended up winning that post.

GOP Reps. John Mica (Fla.), John Duncan (Tenn.) and Tom Petri (Wis.) are all competing to succeed Young on the Transportation Committee.

No decisions on ranking memberships will be made until at least early December, after this week's leadership elections are done, Conference rules for the 110th are written and the Steering Committee is constituted.

When the new rules are written, leaders are expected to revise Rule 14 to make the term-limit guidelines a bit clearer.

"The party definitely has something to think about," said a GOP committee aide.

Alexander, Lott Count Whip Votes (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, November 15, 2006

The Senate's marquee GOP leadership bout will be decided this morning, as Republicans choose a new whip amid heightened campaigning by Trent Lott (R-Miss.), Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) and their core supporters in the conference.

While few Republicans would discuss their votes as their lame-duck session officially opened, Lott and Alexander appeared alternately confident and cautious, both aware that today's secret ballot would put their head counts and promises to the test.

"I want to be helpful," Lott said yesterday, calling his unusually covert comeback effort "a family thing" and giving a nod to his close relations with past Democratic leaders, which his supporters believe would be crucial in next year's majority-Democratic Senate: "We've got to try to keep a check on them and find a way to work with them … I could do that."

Alexander has billed himself as a more natural No. 2 than Lott, known for his comfort in the media spotlight since his House leadership rise in the 1980s. But Lott avowed his commitment to the agenda of current Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), a lock to become minority leader.

"I know the leader needs loyalty," he said. "I'm trying to convey the message that I can do this job without always running to the press."

McConnell continues to stay neutral in the contest, reiterating yesterday that he was playing no role in the whip race. While he and Alexander are close allies, appearing together yesterday to welcome Sen.-elect Bob Corker (R-Tenn.), McConnell came to Lott's defense during the racial controversy that forced the Mississippian out as GOP leader in 2002.

Alexander and Lott both acknowledged McConnell's desire to remain above the whip fray. Lott recalled that he stayed out of the 2002 whip race, fought just weeks before his departure as majority leader, in which McConnell overcame Lott friend Sen. Larry Craig (R-Idaho).

Alexander even reached deeper into the past yesterday, pointing out that he and Lott were roommates during the 1960s, when both were starting out as Hill aides.

"We know each other well, and we will be good friends after [today] ," Alexander said yesterday, adding that Republicans were in need of "fresh faces … after the drubbing we took [in the midterms]." Corker was at his side, subtly underscoring Alexander's hands-on role in orchestrating the Republicans' sole victory in a closely fought Senate race this year.

The whip rivals are both relying on core backers within the conference for momentum and help securing votes. The Alexander camp cited as supporters Sens. Richard Lugar (Ind.), Mike Enzi (Wyo.), Jim Bunning (Ky.), George Voinovich (Ohio), Michael Crapo (Idaho), Pete Domenici (N.M.), Bob Bennett (Utah), Saxby Chambliss (Ga.), Johnny Isakson (Ga.) and Mel Martinez (Fla.), whom President Bush officially tapped as head of the Republican National Committee yesterday.

Lott's office did not return a request for comment by press time on his public supporters, although Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) said he would be voting for Lott, his former House colleague. Sen. Richard Burr (R-N.C.) is also backing Lott.

DOJ_NMG_0094787

Sens. Richard Shelby (R-Ala.) and Kit Bond (R-Mo.) both declined to tip their hands yesterday, and outgoing Senate president pro tem Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) couched his silence in advice for both candidates.

"When I ran for leader and thought I had the votes [against former Sen. Bob Dole (Kan.) in 1984] … I learned that you don't talk about votes before the election," Stevens said.

The whip race has captured the attention of staffers, lobbyists and pundits since last fall, when Lott began openly flirting with a return to leadership and Alexander began his bid as the underdog to Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), who lost reelection to Democrat Bob Casey Jr. last week. Lott's reputation as a savvy vote counter since his days as a House whip sparked some debate yesterday over whether he would bow out in the waning minutes, should victory appear out of reach.

"I would not be totally surprised if he pulls back at the last minute if he doesn't feel he's got the votes," said a source supportive of Alexander. The source also expressed disappointment among some Alexander backers about reports that Lott had privately bashed his opponent during the campaign.

One former Senate GOP leadership aide during Lott's previous stint pointed out that Lott is the only sitting senator who has served as a Republican minority whip during a Republican administration. The aide said Lott is likely to revive the whip lineup he brought from the House to the Senate, with a chief deputy whip and eight others keeping tabs on members' personal issues to ensure good morale.

"The idea that he wouldn't be supportive of: one, the leader; two, unity in the conference; and three, the president's agenda," is false, the aide said.

Lott, Alexander Battle To The End (RC)

By Erin P. Billings And Emily Pierce

Roll Call, November 15, 2006

With this morning's vote on the next Senate Minority Whip still nip-and-tuck, Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) said Tuesday that he was using the last hours of campaigning to make sure Senators who already had committed to him were not switching to the insurgent campaign of Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.).

"I'm spending almost all of my time on that," Alexander said of his efforts to reinforce support Senators lent him before Republicans lost control of the chamber last week.

Alexander is set to square off against Lott this morning for the No. 2 GOP leadership slot, a position for which both Senators have been furiously campaigning in recent days. Republican Senators will convene in the Old Senate chambers to decide the outcome, along with cementing the rest of their leadership lineup for the 110th Congress.

Lott's late entry into the Whip race, while not unexpected, has left the outcome in doubt, despite Alexander's claim that he has a solid majority of his colleagues behind him. As of Monday night, the Tennessee Republican and his allies reasserted that those numbers had held, and then some, while Lott's backers predicted an extremely close secret-ballot vote that ultimately would turn for the former Majority Leader.

"As of today we are definitely tied," said one source close to the Lott operation. "It is an even match."

But one of Alexander's top supporters, Sen. Bob Bennett (R-Utah), said Alexander has a solid advantage, counting 27 firm commitments in the Tennessean's camp. Bennett said that unless there is a seismic shift in support in the waning hours, Alexander should emerge as the next Republican vote counter.

"He's been working at it a good long time," Bennett said. "He has the commitments of Senators who made commitments to him at a time when Lott wasn't sure he was running for re-election, let alone running for Whip."

Bennett is just one of several Republican lawmakers helping count backers for Alexander. Sens. Johnny Isakson (Ga.), Dick Lugar (Ind.), Pete Domenici (N.M.), Saxby Chambliss (Ga.), Mel Martinez (Fla.) Mike Crapo (Idaho), Mike Enzi (Wyo.), Jim Bunning (Ky.) and George Voinovich (Ohio) also are among those mentioned as part of his campaign team.

"I had a majority of votes on Thursday, and I have more votes today than I did then," Alexander said Tuesday.

Alexander entered the race more than a year ago when the only other candidate was Sen. Rick Santorum (Pa.), the current Republican Conference chairman who lost his bid for a third term. Lott had hinted he might be interested in the Whip job months ago, but he said he would not challenge Santorum, his longtime friend and ally.

Lott didn't formally enter the race until Monday night, but he quietly has been reaching out to his colleagues for some time. That outreach became more aggressive in the wake of Santorum's electoral loss last Tuesday.

The Mississippi Senator so far has kept his supporters private, but those close to him have laid out the names of a team of close to a dozen Members helping him make phone calls and corral commitments for the Whip job. Lott's allies insisted Tuesday that the one-time Majority Leader is within striking distance of winning and said he continued to meet with undecided Senators on Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0094788

One source close to Lott said that “Lamar started at a decided advantage,” but the race is now “a dead heat.” This source suggested that there are fewer than five Senators who remain uncommitted and predicted the final result would be determined by one or two ballots.

“It is a very close race,” the source said. “But I think he’s going to have the votes to win.”

Both publicly and privately, Senators agreed that Alexander walks into today’s secret ballot with an edge. But they also insisted that Lott, a former House and Senate Whip with long-standing relationships, cannot be discounted. And, they note repeatedly, the balloting is secret.

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas), who is publicly neutral because of his own bid to become Conference vice chairman during today’s voting, said, “My sense is that Alexander has the advantage.”

One Alexander ally echoed that, saying, “We’ve double checked, triple checked and quadruple checked” our votes.

While all eyes remain on the vote for the Conference’s No. 2 spot, Republicans also will elect the rest of their leadership for the 110th Congress at this morning’s meeting. Atop the list is an all-but-certain climb for Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), who is expected become Minority Leader without opposition.

McConnell likely will be the first elected this morning, and will be nominated by Sens. Judd Gregg (N.H.) and Gordon Smith (Ore.). McConnell, the current Whip, will succeed retiring Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.) if elected.

Santorum will chair the meeting, as he remains the Conference chairman through the end of the year. Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (Texas), vice chairwoman of the Conference, is charged with announcing the winner of each ballot.

Following the vote for Minority Leader, Senators will then proceed to the casting of ballots for Whip, followed by Conference chairman, Policy Committee chairman, Conference vice chairman and National Republican Senatorial Committee chairman. Those seats are expected to go to Sen. Jon Kyl (Ariz.), Hutchison, Cornyn and Sen. John Ensign (Nev.), respectively.

Lame-Duck Texas Rep. Gets Down To Work Without DeLay (WP)

By Peter Carlson

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

Shelley Sekula-Gibbs was sworn in as a congresswoman on Monday night and already she's a lame duck. Because of a weird electoral quirk, her brief term in office expires next month.

But you couldn't tell that by listening to her.

"I'm working hard to accomplish the things I'm working for," she said yesterday. "For tax cuts. For immigration reform. To make sure we have a good solution for the war in Iraq."

All that? In a few weeks?

"If there's a way to do it, I'll do it," she said, smiling beneath her bright blond hair. "I'll deal with the leadership to get as much done as possible."

Sekula-Gibbs (R-Tex.) won a race for Congress on Nov. 7. She also lost a race for Congress on Nov. 7. It's a long story:

Tom "The Hammer" DeLay, the former House majority leader who was indicted on money-laundering charges, resigned from Congress last spring after winning the Republican primary. Last week, voters in DeLay's old district, the 22nd, got to cast two votes for Congress. The Texas voters elected Sekula-Gibbs to fill the remaining portion of DeLay's term -- but they elected Democrat Nick Lampson to succeed DeLay in the Congress that takes office in January, a race that Sekula-Gibbs had to run as a write-in candidate.

That makes for a very short congressional career for Sekula-Gibbs, 53, who is a member of the Houston City Council and a dermatologist -- probably two or three weeks, if you don't count recesses. But she'll retain all the perks that any other ex-member gets, such as use of the House gym and access to the House floor.

On Monday evening, just before she took the oath of office, Sekula-Gibbs held her first congressional news conference in her new office, which is DeLay's old office. Wearing a blue pantsuit with a fuchsia blouse and a string of pearls, she quickly proved that she has mastered the art of the well-worn political bromide.

She said: "I'm proud that the people of the 22nd Congressional District honored me with their votes."

She said: "I'm blessed by God. This really is a gift from God."

She said: "I'm looking forward to rolling up my sleeves and getting as much done as I can accomplish."

What does she think of her accommodations?

She looked around. The dull beige walls were nearly bare. The only pictures were stored on the floor of a closet.

"These are splendid accommodations," she said, smiling. "All we need are the bare essentials to get things done."

She won't be doing any redecorating, she added. And she'll scrape by with a small staff -- a few DeLay holdovers, plus a couple of ex-campaign workers. Meanwhile, she'll spend her tenure living in a hotel. "I have no plans to have a permanent residence here," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0094789

But this was no time for idle chitchat. Sekula-Gibbs had to hustle over to the Capitol.

There, after being sworn in, she addressed her distinguished colleagues: "I look forward to getting to know each of you and working on the initiatives that will help strengthen our country."

Getting to know all 434 of them? That's a lot to do in a few weeks.

In the next hour, Sekula-Gibbs cast three votes. The first was on a bill to "suspend the rules and agree to the Senate amendment" to something called the Trail of Tears Study Act. She stuck her brand-new voting card into a machine and voted yes. Then she looked up at the big screen behind the House speaker's desk and saw a little green light appear next to her name.

It was a courageous vote for Sekula-Gibbbs. If she ever runs for office again, that vote could inspire a vicious attack ad. It's not hard to imagine it: The worst photo ever taken of Sekula-Gibbs appears on the TV screen and an ominous voice says, " She voted to suspend the rules of Congress . . . "

When the voting ended, Sekula-Gibbs rose to make the first official motion of her congressional career: "Mr. Speaker," she said, "I move that the House now adjourn."

The motion carried, and she stepped out into the Speaker's Lobby, where reporters were poised to ask her how it felt.

"It was very exciting," she said.

How did she feel, asked a reporter from the Houston Chronicle, when Democrats came over to greet her?

"I welcome that," she said. "I welcome bipartisan support."

Amazing! In one short night in Congress, Sekula-Gibbs had already done most of the things that our elected representatives do. She'd held a news conference, she'd voted, she'd endorsed bipartisanship, and she'd pledged to "work with my colleagues." To experience the full gamut of congressional life, about all she needed now was a committee meeting and a breakfast meeting.

Alas, she hadn't been assigned to any committees yet. But yesterday she did hold a breakfast meeting in her office for constituents. Her staff provided Danish pastries and a Dunkin' Donuts Box o' Joe.

Houston attorney Robert Gibbs was there. He is Sekula-Gibbs's third husband. "The first husband died," he said. "And the second husband died. And I'm still here."

Jon and Lillian Keeney were there, too. They are constituents and friends of Sekula-Gibbs. They are also the proud possessors of Tom DeLay's first dinette set. They got it from DeLay's daughter, they said, when they helped her clean out DeLay's Texas office.

"It'll be on our ranch in Dime Box, Texas," said Jon.

Is it the kind of thing, a reporter asked, that might someday appear in a Tom DeLay museum?

"Absolutely!" Jon said.

Texas's senators, John Cornyn and Kay Bailey Hutchison, both Republicans, dropped by to welcome Sekula-Gibbs to Congress. So did Rep. Ted Poe (R-Tex.) , a former judge who once sentenced a burglar to stand on a sidewalk wearing a sign that read, "I stole from this store." Poe is a big fan of Sekula-Gibbs.

"I think she can get down in the pits, so to speak, and start working immediately," he said. "She has the energy to do it."

"And this is an energy state," Sekula-Gibbs added, smiling.

By then, she'd been in office for 15 hours. A reporter asked, "Have you been corrupted by power yet?"

"No, I haven't," she said. And she burst out laughing.

But only for a moment. A second later, she was serious again. "It's been a rewarding experience," she said, "and I'm looking forward to making a difference and providing a solid voice for conservative values."

Uprising By Ex-DeLay Staff (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers, Roll Call Staff

Roll Call, November 15, 2006

The woman who was sworn in this week as the interim Republican successor to ex-Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) was, shall we say, not a hit with holdover DeLay aides.

In fact, they showed their feelings about their new boss Tuesday by walking out of the office en masse and resigning, effective immediately. The DeLay refugees, who included

DeLay's personal chief of staff, David James, walked out of the office, Von Trapp family-style (though without the singing) and huddled at Starbucks to get their wits about them.

The interim Member, Shelley Sekula-Gibbs (R), who won the special election to replace DeLay but lost a write-in campaign for a full two-year term, only will be serving in Congress until Jan. 3, when Democrat Nick Lampson, who won the general election, takes over. But even just for these few weeks, it appears, Sekula-Gibbs wants things just so.

DOJ_NMG_0094790

She showed up to take over DeLay's old office on Thursday and, according to sources familiar the office dynamics, was "mean" to the staff. On Tuesday, at her new Member's open-house reception in the office, sources charged that she was less than pleased that neither President Bush nor Vice President Cheney showed up with the rest of the welcome wagon, despite the fact that others who stopped by included Texas GOP Sens. Kay Bailey Hutchison and John Cornyn and Texas GOP Reps. Kevin Brady and Michael Burgess. (Apparently, according to sources, she was under the impression that the president of the United States would be there to greet the seven-week Congresswoman.)

One source said, "This is a highly professional and well-seasoned staff who has worked with the best, and worst, of Members, but you'll need to promise a Congressional Medal to anyone willing to take this one on."

Carl Thorsen, who is now a lobbyist, hired most of the DeLay aides who stormed out of the new Congresswoman's office when he was DeLay's general counsel and in charge of staffing the Hammer's personal office. He said he couldn't imagine what it must have taken to provoke the staff to quit all at once.

"I know them. They're exceptional and talented," he said. "They've been loyal to that district and they've worked really hard. They're just not a group of loose cannons.

Sekula-Gibbs' chief of staff, Lisa Diamond, told HOH that the DeLay aides were only there "for transitional purposes," not for the mini-Congresswoman's full seven-week tenure, which surely will be hectic given the number of days the lame duck is scheduled to be in session.

Asked about the aides storming out of the office she said, "Ooh, oh ... I don't know what we can say about that." Diamond said she would not comment on personnel issues.

But she said she has worked for Sekula-Gibbs for many years and said, "I think she is wonderful to work for."

Corker, Top Class. Too soon to say whether he's at the top of his class, but Sen.-elect Bob Corker (R-Tenn.) is certainly top-class. He's wasting no time getting used to living the high life of a Senator, considering how he arrived in Washington, D.C., on Monday for freshman orientation.

Corker, a millionaire who poured $2 million of his own money into his race against Rep. Harold Ford Jr. (D-Tenn.), and his wife, Elizabeth, traveled first-class on a U.S. Airways flight to Washington Reagan National Airport, a regular HOH informant reports.

Our informant said Corker and his wife sat in seats 4C and 4A. "I didn't get to see if he was partying at all," the informant said.

But the informant did notice that Corker was the last passenger to get on the plane, as he was busy "working the phones to the bitter end" before the gate closed.

Our informant said it sounded as if the Senator-elect was calling supporters and thanking them. At one point he heard him say, "I'm on my way to orientation."

Well, it turns out, Corker and his wife lucked out getting those first-class tickets, according to Corker spokesman Todd Womack.

He told HOH that the Senator bought coach tickets, but that his connecting flight in Charlotte, N.C., was "very delayed" and when he went to rebook seats, "the only seats available were in the other class."

Much Ado About Nothing. There is much buzz inside and outside the Beltway about Stephen Colbert of Comedy Central's "The Colbert Report" being a kingmaker. After all, it has been said, every House Member who appeared on his "Better Know a District"segment won re-election last Tuesday. The Los Angeles Times even called him the "biggest election season winner."

Wa wa wee, as another fake journalist might say.

What's more, Democrat John Hall appeared on the show after his opponent, Rep. Sue Kelly (R-N.Y.), refused to, and ended up unseating her.

Could it be that Colbert is truly the magic man? The answer, of course, is no. Of all the many House Members who actually appeared on the show, only two of them won their race by less than 63 percent — and many of them were unopposed entirely or not even running for re-election.

Who can forget Rep. Robert Wexler's (D-Fla.) appearance on Colbert where he said doing cocaine and picking up prostitutes are fun things to do? But when you don't have any challengers in the upcoming election, it makes it a whole lot easier to say such things and still get re-elected. He could have partied it up with Rep. Harold Ford, Jr. (D-Tenn.) at a Playboy party and still won.

As for the case of Rep.-elect Hall, it turns out that he is the only House challenger who appeared on Colbert's show and actually won. The other four challengers who appeared went down in fiery flames. Yet, somehow, Colbert exerts a loyalty that is unmatched since the era of Stalin.

Despite losing decidedly to Rep. Jim Saxton (R-N.J.) after appearing on Colbert's show, challenger Rich Sexton's (D) campaign still praises the fake TV pundit.

DOJ_NMG_0094791

"We were very pleased with what happened with Colbert," a spokeswoman for Sexton's campaign said. "It certainly was a help ... I don't know that he was the magic man."

No he was not. Sexton lost by 17 points. Good job, Colbert.

And what about the Senate? Ned Lamont appeared on Colbert's show after Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.) declined to. We all know how that turned out for him.

What's On The Agenda For Student Aid (WSJ)

By Anne Marie Chaker

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

College affordability is high on the agenda for the newly elected Democratic leadership in Congress, and that could mean good news for families worried about the rising cost of college.

Among the measures Democrats have proposed is halving the interest rate on some federal student loans, which could save students thousands of dollars over the term of their loans. Parents could benefit from a proposal to allow tax deductions for tuition paid by families earning up to $160,000 a year. And lower-income families could get added help from a possible expansion of the federal Pell Grant program.

Rep. Nancy Pelosi, the likely new House speaker, has set college affordability as one of a handful of priorities in the Democrats' New Direction for America program. To build momentum, Democrats are including the proposed student-loan rate cut among a number of measures they plan to introduce on the first day of the new Congress and to pass within the first 100 hours Congress is in session. (Other measures on the "100 hours" list include raising the minimum wage and rolling back subsidies for big oil companies.)

The Democrats' college-affordability proposals are expected to gain backing from outside the party. "Pelosi has picked apple-pie issues in higher ed that both sides of the aisle can come around," says Sarah Flanagan, vice president for government relations at the National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities. "But the debate will be whether it's the best use of scarce federal resources," she says. Indeed, the Republican-led Congress this year lopped nearly $12 billion from student-lending programs as part of a deficit-reduction act, infuriating Democrats.

Some of the proposals may draw opposition from banks and other for-profit lenders if the interest rate reductions eat into their profits. While Democrats haven't yet said so, "we are nervous that they will attempt to...reduce lender returns," says John Dean, special counsel for the Arlington, Va.-based Consumer Bankers Association, a group of student-loan providers.

Some experts also say the Democrats' proposals could encourage colleges to raise tuition further. "Anytime you make it easier, cheaper for kids to borrow money...that tends to push prices up," says Richard Vedder, director of the Center for College Affordability and Productivity in Washington.

Despite the efforts to make higher education more affordable, paying for college likely will continue to become increasingly difficult for many students. Average total tuition and fees at four-year private colleges increased 5.9% to $22,218 in the current academic year. The average undergraduate leaves school more than $20,000 in debt, compared with about $16,000 in 1999-2000, according to an analysis of the Education Department's National Postsecondary Student Aid study.

What's more, caps on how much federal assistance is available per student means that students could continue to rely more heavily on private student loans, which typically carry higher interest rates. In the last academic year, private student lending, which is separate from federal loans distributed through banks, amounted to about $17 billion in new loans, up more than three times since 2001-02. Federal student loans originated in the 2005-2006 academic year totaled $69 billion.

The federal government's student-lending programs include the popular Stafford loans, which allow students to borrow as much as $23,000 for an undergraduate education and $65,500 for undergraduate and graduate school combined. Other programs include the Parent Loan for Undergraduate Students and the Pell Grant, which gives needy students money that doesn't have to be repaid. Loans are either issued directly to students or are distributed through private lenders.

Democratic leaders may scale back some of their ambitions in a bid to help move measures through Congress. The New Direction document calls for cutting interest rates in half for student and parent loans. But now Democratic aides say lawmakers might seek to cut rates only for certain student loans. Rep. George Miller (D., Calif.), expected to be named leader of the House education committee, said in a postelection statement last week that among the "first three priorities" for the committee is to improve college affordability by cutting interest rates in half on student loans.

Stafford loans currently carry an interest rate of 6.8%. For a typical $20,000 loan over 10 years, cutting that rate in half would save a student about $4,000, according to an analysis by Mark Kantrowitz, publisher of FinAid.org.

Democrats also want to raise the limit that needy students can receive from the Pell Grant program to $5,100 a year from $4,050, which has been the limit for four years. Sen. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.), who will head the Senate education committee, has unsuccessfully tried to raise that cap in recent years. President Bush in his 2000 election campaign spoke about an increase in the Pell Grant program, when he said he would raise the limit to $5,100, but just for first-year students. That promise never materialized.

Rep. Miller and Sen. Kennedy helped introduce legislation last year that would have provided financial incentives for schools that encourage students to borrow directly from the government, rather than obtain federal loans that are distributed through private banks. The lawmakers are expected to revive the idea. Currently, just one-fourth of federal loans are made directly to students. Democrats point to reports by the Congressional Budget Office and the Government Accountability Office that say direct lending saves the government money, though those reports are contested by the loan industry.

Under the proposal, the government would hand over a portion of the money that it saves to the schools, on condition that it be directed to need-based student-aid programs.

Democrats also want to restore a tax deduction, which expired last year, that used to benefit families who earned up to $160,000 a year. That measure would allow tuition-paying families to deduct as much as $4,000 a year. Other existing tax incentives, including the Hope and Lifetime Learning programs, provide tax credits for families with annual incomes of up to $107,000.

"The bottom line is these proposals will require an infusion of money," says Mr. Kantrowitz of FinAid.org. "So they will need to either increase taxes or cut costs elsewhere to pay for it."

Big Oil Headed For Tougher Congress (CSM)

By Ron Scherer

The Christian Science Monitor, November 15, 2006

NEW YORK

So far this year, 40 bills have been introduced in Congress about alleged gasoline price gouging. Twenty-one bills have addressed windfall profits by oil companies. Few have gotten past the press-release stage.

But next year, Big Oil is likely to feel as if it's wearing one of those "kick me" signs.

The Democratic leadership has already indicated it will try to repeal earlier tax breaks for oil companies. A gusher of new legislation could develop as well, as Democrats get a chance to see their energy bills move past the trash can. In fact, the Democrats will try to put together their own version of a comprehensive energy bill that tackles everything from gas-mileage standards to tax breaks for alternative energy sources, some congressional analysts believe.

"The oil companies are a big target for the Democratic majority," says Steven Smith, a congressional expert and professor at Washington University in St. Louis. "There is virtually near unanimity among the Democrats to do something about company tax breaks, but they will almost certainly seek a package of energy and environmental proposals in this Congress."

Congress is expected to move despite the fact oil and gasoline prices have been falling. Oil is now less than $57 a barrel, compared with more than $70 last spring. Gasoline is about $2.23 a gallon - 6 cents a gallon lower than a year ago, and more than 75 cents lower than in the spring.

"The surge in legislation earlier this year was due to the gas prices, as virtually every member of Congress wanted to go on the record as doing something about it," says Mr. Smith. "I don't think anyone lifted a finger to get that legislation passed."

Still, the oil industry is bracing for a new battle, particularly over tax breaks. "That will be seriously considered: They are sure to have hearings. It will go to markup, that sort of thing," says Jim Ford, a lobbyist for the American Petroleum Institute (API) in Washington. "As policymakers start to look at where the money goes, they will ask practical questions, such as why [the tax breaks] are in the tax code now."

Some of the tax breaks are relatively recent. In the Energy Policy Act of 2005, Congress allowed refiners to expense 50 percent of the cost of capital projects that would increase capacity by at least 5 percent.

"This came about when there were concerns about the adequacy of refining capacity in the US," says Mr. Ford. "It was put there to [create further incentives] and perhaps make it economically viable for capacity expansion."

Another tax break, given during the Clinton administration, gives the oil industry relief from paying the government royalties for deepwater drilling in the Gulf of Mexico. "When it was put in place, we had $20 [a barrel] oil, and you could not afford to drill in a mile of water," says John Felmy, chief economist at the API. "If anyone looks at it fairly, it has been a very successful program."

On the other hand, industry critics maintain the tax breaks haven't worked. The refineries have failed to expand, says Mark Cooper, research director at the Consumer Federation of America in Washington. Royalty relief is now a bad idea, he adds: "At the current price of oil, deepwater drilling is plenty profitable. And the finds in the Gulf have not significantly improved the worldwide supply-and-demand balance."

But the debate over energy policy is likely to go well beyond taxes, says Mr. Cooper, since many of the potential 2008 presidential candidates - some prominent members of Congress - have already drafted energy plans or have well-defined positions. Many of these lawmakers focus on fuel efficiency or the use of biofuels. On the Democratic side, says Cooper, one of the main themes is "efficiency, efficiency."

This spring, Sen. Barack Obama (D) of Illinois (along with Sen. Richard Lugar (R) of Indiana) proposed an energy policy of loan guarantees for those producing biofuels and a requirement that all new cars have fuel flexibility by the end of 2010.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D) of New York has also put together a plan heavy on alternative fuels and efficiency. On the Republican side, Sen. John McCain of Arizona wants to press for 100,000 hydrogen-powered vehicles by 2010.

Even though Congress will be in a lame-duck session for the rest of the year, some members of the energy sector hope it will take up the issue of allowing drilling for oil and natural gas in the eastern part of the Gulf of Mexico. To get the states on board, lawmakers would offer them enhanced revenue sharing.

"It virtually assures the reelection of Sen. Mary Landrieu [(D) of Louisiana] in 2008," says David Parker, president of the American Gas Association in Washington, which favors the proposal. "We're hoping the House passes it before adjournment."

The shift in congressional leadership may also mean additional funding for the Low Income Home Energy Assistance Program, which is currently funded at $2.1 billion for 2007. Says Mr. Parker: "They might add some extra money to get it to the same level as last year," which was $3.2 billion.

Why The Next Congress Will Be 'Greener,' But Only By A Few Shades (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker

The Christian Science Monitor, November 15, 2006

ASHLAND, ORE.

After years in the political wilderness, activists and their champions in Congress are poised to take environmental policy and lawmaking in a decidedly greener direction.

Climate change and renewable energy, land conservation, endangered species protection, pollution prevention - all will get a fresh look as Democrats take over key committees and subcommittees in the US House and Senate.

At the same time, activists don't expect the new Congress to make radical changes.

"We have cause for good cheer and optimism," says Betsy Loyless, senior vice president of the National Audubon Society. "But even with significant congressional changes, there will likely be limits to what's achievable."

Among other things, she says, Congress faces tight fiscal constraints, industry interests continue to hold sway with the Bush administration, most incoming Democrats are moderate rather than liberal, and pro-environment interests will have fewer middle-of-the-road GOP allies (such as defeated Sen. Lincoln Chaffee of Rhode Island) on Capitol Hill.

Still, expect a weakened effort to drill for oil and gas in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in Alaska and in the Rocky Mountain states, less of a push for expansive offshore oil drilling, and more resources to bolster the Endangered Species Act and clean up toxic sites on the Superfund list. The ethanol debate

Among important related issues will be the five-year farm bill, set to expire next year, and crop subsidies connected to ethanol production.

As with other major environmental and energy issues, the ethanol issue presents activists with a political dilemma. Using more ethanol can help reduce reliance on foreign oil, but it can also mean more use of fertilizers and pesticides and less interest in the federal program to set aside agricultural land in conservation reserves to protect wetlands and wildlife habitat.

"The whole [farm bill] debate will be over how much money goes to conservation," predicts Ken Cook, president of the Environmental Working Group.

In other areas, too - the energy and pollution associated with motor vehicles, for example, or power generation impacting fish and wildlife habitat - local interests could conflict with long-term goals of environmentalists. New committee chairs to watch

The biggest immediate changes will be in committee leadership. Rep. Richard Pombo (R) of California lost his reelection bid to political novice Jerry McNerney, a wind energy engineer. It was an indication of the clout the Sierra Club, Defenders of Wildlife, and other activist groups had in this election. Mr. Pombo will be replaced as House Resources Committee chair by longtime environmental champion Rep. Nick Rahall (D) of West Virginia, a leader in the effort to reform the hardrock mining law of 1872, which left thousands of polluted sites across the West.

In the Senate's Environment and Public Works Committee, Barbara Boxer (D) of California will assume the chairmanship from James Inhofe (R) of Oklahoma, who has called the Environmental Protection Agency "a Gestapo bureaucracy" and who once called global warming "the greatest hoax ever perpetrated on the American people." The Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee will be chaired by Democrat Jeff Bingaman of New Mexico, another advocate of dealing directly with climate change.

Much has been made of the centrist - sometimes even conservative - stance of the new crop of lawmakers. But their campaign statements and records on environmental issues would indicate that most are quite green. Related to this, voters in many states passed pro-environment ballot measures, an indicator of political support. And in some ways, the old guard - and not just Democrats - is likely to have even more prominence. Two important Senate proponents of addressing global warming have been Republican and likely presidential candidate John McCain of Arizona and Democrat-turned-Independent Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut.

On the other hand, some of the Democratic old guard may put roadblocks in the way of environmentalists' goals. Rep. John Dingell (D) of Michigan, whose Detroit home district includes Ford, General Motors, and Chrysler, is set to take over the House Energy and Commerce Committee. Mr. Dingell can be expected to resist attempts to stiffen fuel-efficiency standards for autos.

Meanwhile, the White House reportedly will launch an "energy independence" initiative focusing on fuel made from plant waste. This may have been in the works before the election, but the "thumping" President Bush acknowledges having taken on Election Day may help to focus his attention on energy issues.

"Energy was definitely a factor in many of the most competitive races," says Anna Aurilio, Washington office director of the US Public Interest Research Group. War in an oil-rich part of the world and unusually high gasoline prices earlier this year were part of that, she says.

Advocates of renewable energy resources received a boost this week from a new report by the RAND Corp. Researchers at the nonprofit organization find that by 2025 wind power, solar power, the burning of agricultural waste, and other renewable resources could produce 25 percent of the electricity and motor-vehicle fuels used in the US at little or no additional cost while achieving "significant reductions in carbon dioxide emissions from fossil fuel combustion."

As lawmakers and the White House discuss their new relationship regarding energy and the environment, such information sharpens the focus.

"I actually think from talking to Democrats they have the same concerns we do," White House economic adviser Allan Hubbard told the Financial Times last week. "They are concerned about energy, and recognize that we need to accelerate our efforts to cure our addiction to foreign oil."

In the end, agrees Audubon official Betsy Loyless, "Environmental progress can only be made to the extent that the various sides desire to find common ground."

Historian Says Peak Oil Production Is Still A Quarter-century Away (MCT)

By Kevin G. Hall

McClatchy Newspapers, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - Far from being a nearly exhausted resource, the world's oil reserves are three times bigger than what some popular estimates state, and peak global oil production is still about a quarter-century away, according to a new study by Pulitzer Prize-winning oil historian Daniel Yergin.

The remaining oil resource base is about 3.74 trillion barrels, according to a report released Tuesday by Cambridge Energy Research Associates, which Yergin runs. That's more than three times the 1.2 trillion barrels that "peak-oil" theorists suggest.

CERA's report, titled "Why the Peak Oil Theory Falls Down," challenges an increasingly popular view that the world is about to run out of oil. On the contrary, CERA argues that the world is likely to begin running out of oil between 2030 and the middle of the century. Even so, CERA says, efforts are needed now to push that date back, such as new oil field discoveries, new technologies, energy conservation and alternative energy sources.

Peak-oil theorists warn that the world is on the cusp of a disastrous and rapid decline in oil production. A leading proponent of the theory is oil banker Matthew Simmons, who in the popular book "Twilight in the Desert" suggested that the world's top producer, Saudi Arabia, has entered an oil-production decline and will take the world down with it. Last month, Simmons told a forum that the world might have reached peak oil production last December.

The peak-oil theory has gained supporters since late 2004, when surging global demand for oil began tightening up available supplies and driving up world oil prices. The price hit $78.40 a barrel in July, but has fallen to less than $60 a barrel in recent months.

The CERA study debunks the so-called Hubbert Peak Oil Theory, first espoused in 1956 by geologist M. King Hubbert. Working at the time for Shell Oil Co., he predicted that world oil production would follow a bell-shaped curve in which production grows steadily until it peaks, followed by a rapid decline.

Hubbert was pretty accurate on the timing of U.S. peak oil production, coming within two years of 1970, the year experts now recognize as the peak of continental U.S. production.

DOJ_NMG_0094795

But his theory failed to recognize that new technologies enabled reserves to grow over time. His theory preceded the exploitation of massive oil reserves in Alaska and the Gulf of Mexico.

That's why Yergin dismisses talk of peak oil.

"This is really the fifth time we've `run out of oil,'" Yergin said in a teleconference with journalists on Tuesday. He recalled past predictions dating back to 1880 of an end to oil or gasoline production.

Yergin's views carry weight because he won the Pulitzer for his 1991 book "The Prize," an exhaustive history of oil economics.

He and colleagues believe that the decline in oil availability will play out as an "undulating plateau," in which annual production produces a series of ups and downs, eventually peaks and then declines slowly.

"We see the undulating plateau existing one or two decades, rather than a sharp decline," said Peter Jackson, CERA's director of oil industry activity. He sees outright decline beginning no earlier than 2030 and perhaps after 2050.

Future oil supplies, said CERA, will be accessible by new technologies that permit drilling more than 7,000 feet below the ocean's surface or extracting oil from tar-like deposits in sandy soil found in western Canada.

"Ours is not a view of endless abundance of resources," said Jackson, cautioning that he doesn't want CERA's findings to "distract us from addressing real issues."

Another source of optimism for this energy-hungry world emerged from another report this week, this one a technical paper from the Los Angeles-based think tank Rand Corp. It ran 1,500 simulations of varied energy prices and technology costs to estimate future supplies of both renewable and nonrenewable fuels.

It concluded that up to one-quarter of the electricity and motor fuels consumed in the United States in 2025 could be produced from renewable sources, up from only 6 percent today. For that to happen, the price of fossil fuels must remain high and the costs of producing alternative energy must keep falling.

"The renewables case could displace about 2.5 million barrels a day of petroleum products in the United States in 2025, or 20 percent of total consumption," the Rand report said.

Together, the two reports give hope that energy will be plentiful for another generation or more.

"I've never seen so much activity in terms of energy technology all along the spectrum," Yergin said. "I think the system is responding."

Enter, Pariah: Now It's Hugs For Lieberman (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 14 — Senator Joseph I. Lieberman strode into a Democratic caucus gathering like he owned the place or, at the very least, like someone who is a flight risk and could leave at any minute, taking the Democrats' new majority with him.

In other words, everyone was extra-special nice to the wayward Democrat on Tuesday.

"It was all very warm, lots of hugs, high-fives, that kind of stuff," said Senator Ken Salazar of Colorado.

Senator Ron Wyden of Oregon marveled, "One senator after another kept coming up and shaking his hand."

And Senator Blanche Lincoln of Arkansas noted, "I gave him a hug and a kiss."

Mr. Lieberman received a standing ovation at a caucus luncheon after Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, who is poised to become the majority leader, declared, "We're all family."

All of which is particularly touching in light of recent history. It was, after all, just three months ago that Mr. Lieberman became something of a party pariah after losing the Democratic primary in Connecticut but continuing his re-election bid as an independent.

Mr. Lieberman won re-election last week without help from most of his Democratic Senate colleagues, who backed Ned Lamont, his Democratic rival, over their "good friend Joe Lieberman."

These would be many of the same good friends "who were happy to leave my dad by the side of the road," as Mr. Lieberman's son, Matthew, put it in an election night speech. These, presumably, would include "friends" like Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, John Kerry of Massachusetts and Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut, all Lamont supporters.

"It's clear that the Democrats need him at this point more than he needs them," said Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, whom Mr. Lieberman genuinely does consider a close friend. "How sweet is this?"

Indeed, it is hard to imagine how Mr. Lieberman could have emerged better from last week's election. He was re-elected comfortably, and the Democratic Party he still belongs to is now in the majority, assuring him the chairmanship of the powerful Homeland Security Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0094796

Yet that majority is slim enough, 51 to 49, to turn Mr. Lieberman into arguably the Senate's most influential member. If he defects, the Senate would effectively be under Republican control because Vice President Dick Cheney would cast tie-breaking votes.

"It was very painful to him to have all these people he thought were his friends embrace his opponent," Ms. Collins said. "They just threw him overboard. But now, not only is he re-elected resoundingly, but he is also the key to which party controls the Senate."

Mr. Lieberman's situation underscores the precarious calculus of political friendships. People close to him say he remains miffed, if not bitter, about what he considers the betrayal of allies who supported an unknown, untested and unfamiliar candidate.

In recent months, Mr. Lieberman has frequently invoked the Harry Truman maxim that if you want a friend in Washington, get a dog.

Mr. Lieberman has suggested he has felt especially wounded by Mr. Dodd, Connecticut's senior senator, with whom he had shared a close bond since arriving in the Senate in 1989. Mr. Dodd had supported Mr. Lieberman in the primary, but endorsed Mr. Lamont after he won. Mr. Dodd's appearance with Mr. Lamont at a Democratic "unity" rally and in a campaign commercial infuriated Mr. Lieberman, friends said.

Mr. Dodd said in a brief interview Tuesday, "We all make decisions, and those decisions have consequences."

Earlier in the day, he attended a Capitol Hill news conference that drew every Democrat in Connecticut's Congressional delegation except Mr. Lieberman.

Friends said the strains between Mr. Lieberman and his Democratic colleagues show.

"It will take a little time for the room to really warm up from both ends," said Senator Mary L. Landrieu of Louisiana, one of the few Senate Democrats who supported Mr. Lieberman in his general election campaign. "I would not be forthright if I didn't say there was some healing and work that has to be done."

During the campaign, Mr. Lieberman said repeatedly that he would continue to vote with the Democratic caucus, but there were calls from the left for the Democratic leadership to strip him of his seniority and committee assignments if he won.

But as Mr. Lieberman claimed a healthy lead in polls, Mr. Reid reached out to him. Over time, Mr. Reid's and other Democratic leaders' support for Mr. Lamont became half-hearted, or nonexistent, according to Mr. Lamont's campaign.

Mr. Lieberman classifies himself as an "independent Democrat" and has said that recent events left him feeling "liberated" and "unshackled," not exactly reassuring words to Democrats.

He stirred more anxiety Sunday, when in an interview on NBC's "Meet the Press," he refused to rule out becoming a Republican (while adding, "I hope I don't get to that point").

In brief remarks to reporters Tuesday, Mr. Lieberman said he had refused to rule out switching parties largely because Tim Russert, the show's host, "kept pressing me on it."

But Mr. Lieberman also said that while "most of my vote clearly came from independents and Republicans" in Connecticut, "it's fair to say that I couldn't have won without Democratic support."

Mr. Lieberman restated that it was possible he could join Senate Republicans, but he added, "I'm not going to threaten on every issue to leave the caucus."

Clearly, friends say, he is relishing his sudden ascent from Democratic reject in Connecticut to Senate kingmaker in Washington. "He is just sitting there in the catbird seat, and it must be delicious for him," Ms. Collins said.

Mr. Lieberman was asked Tuesday if he viewed his position as similar to a swing vote on the Supreme Court, a role often played by former Justice Sandra Day O'Connor or Justice Anthony M. Kennedy. The parallel had not occurred to him, Mr. Lieberman replied, but he considered it "a complimentary analogy."

He beamed as he said this, as he did for much of the day.

Top 2 Census Officials Resign (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

The two highest-ranking officials in the U.S. Census Bureau quit yesterday, putting management of the agency in flux as preparations for the next census enter a critical phase.

The departures of Census Bureau chief C. Louis Kincannon, a statistician appointed by President Bush to lead the agency in 2002, and Hermann Habermann, a career statistician who runs the census operation, could complicate a revision of the counting process in 2010 -- to produce a detailed picture of the U.S. population every year, rather than once a decade.

The census determines such key issues as congressional representation to highway expenditures, so it draws intense scrutiny from lawmakers.

DOJ_NMG_0094797

"This will hurt the agency as it tries to roll out the planning process," said Columbia University professor Kenneth Prewitt, a former Census Bureau director. "The 2010 census is a very big operation that involves detailed planning spread over a number of years."

The open positions will likely take at least six months to fill, he said.

Kincannon officially cited family responsibilities for his departure. But in an interview he mentioned "different views perhaps about priorities" at the agency.

"My perception is that I don't have the same level of trust that I did a year or so ago," said Kincannon, who began his career at the agency in 1963. "The relationship has changed, and that relationship I regard as essential." There was no official reason given for Habermann's departure and no letter was released. Habermann could not be reached to comment.

Kincannon will stay on until his replacement is found and is confirmed by the Senate. Habermann will stay until early January. His successor will likely come from the bureau's career ranks, though a political appointment is possible.

In his resignation letter to Bush, Kincannon defends the Census Bureau's finding in 2003 that it used the best methods possible in counting Americans from communities -- including minorities, renters and immigrants -- that are the most difficult to tally and tend to vote Democratic. Because the census forms the basis for apportioning congressional districts, past efforts to adjust the numbers in undercounted areas ignited partisan battles that have raged on and off for decades.

Addressing the issue, Kincannon's resignation letter cites extensive scientific documentation, "should my successor have need of it."

One person with knowledge of the situation suggested that the two officials -- especially Habermann, a career employee -- were targeted by Republicans who would want to install an official who could better protect against Democratic congressional efforts to reinvigorate adjustment efforts -- a move some think could favor Democrats.

"I think there persists among congressional Republicans a concern about that, but if they look at the facts they will see that's not a likely thing," Kincannon said.

One Hill staff member with knowledge of census operations said the resignations anticipated the release in coming weeks of a congressional report on lost laptop computers at the agency. The Census Bureau is part of the Commerce Department, which revealed several weeks ago that the Census Bureau has lost 672 laptop computers since 2001. One-third of the computers contained personal data, though no evidence has emerged that the information has been misused.

"I don't think the laptop situation was a determining factor" in the resignations, Kincannon said. "We've had some problems and we've taken steps to address that problem."

The Census Bureau has also repeatedly run into budget problems on the Hill.

Kincannon said the agency had $50 million trimmed from its 2007 budget request of $878 million. The budget is not final, but without the money, "We can wind up limited in our ability to achieve the automation required to carry out the census in 2010 at lower cost."

Neither Commerce nor the Census Bureau issued statements on the departures. While Kincannon's letter was released, neither agency would confirm that Habermann, who is not required to write a resignation letter, issued one.

Commerce spokesman Dan Nelson refused to comment on the unusual timing of the departures. "They've both done a great job," he said. "The 2010 census is on track and on schedule."

Some members of Congress weren't so sure. "Changing management at a time like this is very dangerous," said Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney (N.Y.), a member of the Government Reform Committee and former ranking Democrat on the census subcommittee, said in a statement. "It's disturbing that two world-class statisticians who have worked for years to make sure we will have an accurate count in 2010 left on the same day so soon before the beginning of the census.

"At this point, without knowing who's taking over, it fair to say that the accuracy of the 2010 census is absolutely in jeopardy."

Time Again To Choose Or Switch Drug Plans (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 14 — Starting Wednesday, Medicare beneficiaries can sign up for prescription drug coverage or switch plans, and many may want to do so because prices have changed, with some of the most popular plans charging much higher premiums for 2007.

In every state but Alaska and Hawaii, more than 50 drug plans are available. Beneficiaries have until Dec. 31 to sign up or change plans, but federal officials said they should act by Dec. 8 to avoid the problems that caused turmoil at pharmacies in January, when many people were unable to get their drugs.

DOJ_NMG_0094798

Several recent surveys, including one by J. D. Power & Associates, the market research company, suggest that three-fourths of the people with Medicare drug coverage are satisfied. Michael O. Leavitt, the secretary of health and human services, said: "The program is working. People are happy. "

The Bush administration says that premiums for Medicare drug coverage will average $24 a month in 2007, about the same as in 2006. But for many beneficiaries, the reality may be substantially different.

Melvin London, an 83-year-old retired filmmaker in New York City, said Tuesday that the new Medicare benefit had saved $245 for him and $685 for his wife. He was annoyed at the prospect of a sharp increase in premiums in 2007. For Mr. London's plan, known as Humana Enhanced, the monthly premium will be $29.60, up from $9.42.

"I call that bait and switch, when the company charges $9 to get you in and then goes to $29," Mr. London said. "It took me three months to find a plan that was suitable. Am I now supposed to go through the same process every year to determine which plan is best for me? That's an unfair burden for beneficiaries."

Thomas T. Noland Jr., a senior vice president of Humana, said: "We still offer excellent value. We will have the lowest premium in 38 states, the second-lowest in 10 states and the third-lowest in the remaining two states."

About 4.5 million Medicare beneficiaries receive drug coverage from Humana plans. Humana has been wooing people with free showings of the Humphrey Bogart movie "Casablanca." Medicare beneficiaries eat popcorn and sip sodas while watching the film, along with a short extolling Humana's Medicare plans.

The $24 premium emphasized by the Bush administration is for basic coverage, the minimum required by law, and many plans provide additional benefits for an extra premium. Moreover, the average includes premiums for drug coverage offered by managed care plans and by free-standing drug plans, which serve people in the traditional Medicare program.

Both types of plans charged about $24 a month, on average, for drug coverage this year. In 2007, the average premium will increase about 10 percent for free-standing drug plans, but will decrease about 35 percent for drug coverage offered by managed care plans.

Most drug plans have a gap in coverage. "Beneficiaries tell us this was a helpful benefit for six or eight months, until they fell into the coverage gap," said Deane R. Beebe, a spokeswoman for the Medicare Rights Center, a consumer group that counsels people with Medicare.

Some insurers provide coverage for generic drugs in the coverage gap, and a few also provide coverage for brand-name drugs in the gap. But Ms. Beebe said, "In 11 states, we cannot find any free-standing drug plan that provides coverage for brand-name drugs in the gap."

The Medicare handbook, sent to all beneficiaries, says that a plan offered by Coventry Health Care will pay for generic and brand-name drugs in the coverage gap. But Francis S. Soistman Jr., executive vice president of Coventry, said Tuesday that only five brand-name drugs, out of the many available, were covered in the gap.

Jeff Nelligan, a Medicare spokesman, said, "We corrected the online version of the information."

Sixteen Democratic senators, led by Byron L. Dorgan of North Dakota, said this week that some insurers were misleading consumers by marketing drug plans under names that included the word "complete."

"How can a plan be called 'complete' when it contains a gap in drug coverage?" they asked in a letter to Mr. Leavitt.

John C. Rother, policy director of AARP, the lobby for older Americans, said the new program had helped many people. His "biggest disappointment," Mr. Rother said, was that several million low-income people had not applied for the extra help available to them.

Drug Makers' Politics Produces A Bitter Pill (WSJ)

By Alan Murray

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

Since Election Day, drug stocks have gotten clobbered. Pfizer, Wyeth, Eli Lilly and Novartis have tumbled 5% or more; GlaxoSmithKline, Merck and Johnson & Johnson are down 4% or more; and Bristol-Myers Squibb is down 3.5%.

Add it up, and you've got nearly $50 billion in market value wiped out by Democratic victories.

That's the price big pharma is paying for a badly bungled political strategy. For years, the industry operated on the assumption it could get what it wanted out of Washington. Then, when the going got tough, it doubled down on Republicans and ignored a groundswell of public anger over high drug prices.

TALKING BUSINESS

Should the government negotiate drug prices for senior citizens directly with the big drug companies? Join the discussion.1 Alan Murray will read your thoughts and post replies.

Even ex-congressman Billy Tauzin, the Democrat-turned-Republican who heads the industry's trade group, acknowledges that before he took over two years ago, the group used "a scorched-earth policy" to get its way.

DOJ_NMG_0094799

The most conspicuous example of overreach was a line inserted in the Medicare Modernization Act of 2003 that prohibited the U.S. government from negotiating prices directly with drug companies. That prohibition was unnecessary; the law created a structure in which private insurers and health plans did the negotiating on the government's behalf.

But someone allied with the drug industry -- it's still a little unclear who -- insisted on making the implicit explicit, and in the process, created a campaign issue for Democrats.

As a result, the industry's big bet has now gone bad. Allowing the government to negotiate prices directly with drug companies has become Democratic dogma. And a few moderate Republicans are toeing the line as well.

That doesn't make it a good idea.

Truth is, drug companies can't really "negotiate" with the government, any more than a backwoods hiker can negotiate with a 900-pound grizzly bear.

With a market share of about 46%, the government would set drug prices, not negotiate them, and then establish "formularies" telling seniors which drugs they could use and which ones they couldn't. Would that make seniors feel better off? I doubt it.

The challenge facing the industry is to balance the legitimate desire for lower prices against the equally legitimate desire for new drugs, which cost large sums of money to develop. The marketplace doesn't always get that balance right. But there's no reason to think government bureaucrats would do it better.

Moreover, negotiated prices would force drug companies to redouble their lobbying efforts in Washington. That would be unfortunate. One reason the industry is in such a mess is because its leaders have spent too much time trying to get Washington to solve their problems, and too little time fixing a broken business model.

In the past two years, there's been a purge -- Henry "Hank" McKinnell of Pfizer, Raymond Gilmartin of Merck and Peter Dolan of Bristol-Myers Squibb have all been pushed out of their jobs. A new generation of chief executives is looking to blaze a fresh trail, and the government should encourage them, not force them to reverse course.

And here's the biggest surprise: The new prescription-drug benefit for America's senior citizens, created by the Medicare Modernization Act, is working pretty well. Oh sure, there was a lot of confusion at first over the "doughnut hole" and the complexity of choices. But a year into this grand experiment, the cost of the drug benefit is going down -- it now averages $24 a month, instead of the $42 estimated by actuaries, according to Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt -- and the satisfaction of seniors is going up. Why mess with it now?

If Democrats need their political pound of flesh, there are other ways to extract it without causing such damage to consumers.

One option, being pushed by Sen. Ron Wyden, an Oregon Democrat, would give the administration limited negotiating power to be used only in extreme cases, when drug companies with a monopoly product refuse to negotiate with Medicare's middlemen. Another option would be to push measures that help the marketplace, rather than hamper it -- creating a pathway for generic versions of biotech drugs, for instance.

Meanwhile, drug companies should be allowed to get on with the tough task of developing new drugs and fixing their businesses. They've got a lot of work to do. With price pressures rising around the world and blockbuster drugs going off patent, they need to figure out how to cut costs without sacrificing the critical research that leads to lifesaving cures.

It's in everyone's interest they succeed. The pharmaceutical industry's bad bedside manner has earned it a lot of enemies. But its lifesaving and life-enhancing products should make it many more friends.

Healthy Industry In Medicaid, Private HMOs Take A Big, And Profitable, Role (WSJ)

By Barbara Martinez

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

Some 55 million poor and disabled Americans are covered by Medicaid. With an annual price tag topping $300 billion, it's among the biggest government programs around.

It's also a lucrative business for some private companies that act as middlemen between the government and patients. Instead of directly paying the bills when a Medicaid patient goes to the doctor, state governments increasingly outsource the job to private contractors. More than one in three Medicaid beneficiaries now receive care through a private insurer.

The potential gains are big. Four years ago, a private-equity fund in which George Soros was the largest investor took a 70% stake in WellCare Health Plans Inc., a leading Medicaid health-maintenance organization. The fund finished cashing out the stake this August, bringing in a total of $870 million for an investment that originally cost $220 million.

Four of the biggest Medicaid HMOs -- WellCare, Centene Corp., Molina Healthcare Inc. and Amerigroup Corp. -- have seen their shares surge on the New York Stock Exchange over the past few years, although prices of the latter three have been volatile. WellCare's stock price has tripled since it began trading in July 2004, bringing the value of stock and options held by its chief executive, Todd S. Farha, to $77 million.

The companies are growing fast. Centene boasts nearly 1.2 million members and posted $1.5 billion in revenue last year. That compares with 142,000 members and $200 million in revenue six years earlier.

With the growth has come criticism from some doctors and patients who accuse Medicaid HMOs of scrimping on care. Even as they restrict medical tests and use of prescription drugs, the companies spend the money they get from states on items that don't have an obvious connection to patients. Centene has funded a multimillion-dollar arts center in St. Louis and paid to put its name on stadiums in Montana and Missouri. The HMOs are also big donors to political campaigns.

Executives say their profits are justly earned and don't come at patients' expense. Traditional Medicaid is a fee-for-service program: The government pays each medical bill the patient racks up, with little or no effort to manage the costs. Medicaid HMOs, like other HMOs, seek to save money by eliminating unnecessary care and paying for preventive treatments. Centene Chief Executive Michael Neidorff says the company sometimes gives free child-safety car seats to pregnant women who attend all of their prenatal exams. "We save millions" by preventing premature births, he says.

Mr. Neidorff earned $1.85 million in salary and bonus last year and as of the end of last year held restricted stock valued at $26 million. The company also recorded $135,547 last year in compensation for Mr. Neidorff representing the value of personal trips he took on the corporate jet, a Bombardier Challenger that features an espresso machine on board, according to the lease agreement.

Centene spokesman Robert Schenk declined to say how much the company pays to lease the jet. He said the jet is needed because many of Centene's operations are hard to reach by commercial carriers, and the company's board requires Mr. Neidorff to use corporate transportation even on personal travel to ensure that he is secure and accessible.

Centene's business is managing the care of patients such as Melissa Bishop, 39 years old, of Phillipsburg, N.J. When she needed radiation for cancer near her pancreas this summer, she called Centene, her Medicaid HMO. She says she tried three facilities suggested by the company, but none of them were part of Centene's plan. "I was going round and round and round," says Ms. Bishop. "I was getting so aggravated."

After she got an appointment at a fourth place, an administrator there told her it didn't accept her plan either. The administrator, Barbara Tofani of Hunterdon Regional Cancer Center in Flemington, N.J., says she called a dozen other centers in the region and struck out every time. Finally, Ms. Tofani called Centene and negotiated an ad-hoc deal to cover Ms. Bishop's treatment, although Ms. Tofani says the center will be lucky to break even.

Andrew Greenberg, Ms. Bishop's radiation oncologist, says that if it hadn't been for the special effort, "Melissa would have gotten lost in the system." Centene didn't provide comment on Ms. Bishop's case.

Each state runs its own Medicaid program but the majority of funding generally comes from the federal government. When states sign up HMOs to manage care, they often calculate what they would spend on Medicaid patients directly and pay the HMOs a per-patient premium below that amount. Florida, for instance, sets its HMO premium rates about 8% below what it would cost the state. WellCare, a big operator in Florida, says it saves the state $75 million a year. HMOs have an incentive to keep their costs under the premium because they keep the difference as profit.

After several years of spiraling growth in Medicaid costs, there's some evidence that the tide is turning, although it's unclear how much HMOs have contributed. Total Medicaid spending grew in fiscal 2006 by just 2.8%, according to a report last month by the Kaiser Commission on Medicaid and the Uninsured. That was the lowest rate of growth since 1996. The commission said that for the first time in years many states aren't feeling pressure to cut people off Medicaid rolls.

Are Medicaid HMOs slashing necessary care to achieve cost savings and raise profits? Yes, says Jerry Flanagan, health-care policy director of a California group that wants to stop state governments from moving Medicaid beneficiaries into private managed care. "What's good for shareholders is bad for patients," he says. "What's really happening is we're giving less money for far, far fewer services."

Private companies "deliver a good-quality product at a reasonable price," counters Ruben Jose King-Shaw Jr., a former top federal Medicaid and Medicare official who joined WellCare's board in 2003. He notes that states often require private HMOs to achieve high rates of vaccination and other quality standards that weren't met when bureaucrats did all the work. Mr. King-Shaw, whose final annual salary in government was $142,500, has sold WellCare shares for $1.8 million. He owns shares and options valued at an additional $1.5 million. "You only do well in health care if you deliver value," he says.

States began experimenting with using managed care for Medicaid patients in the early 1980s, and the idea took off in the 1990s. Now many states are moving aggressively to put more Medicaid patients in HMOs. Last month, Ohio chose the winning bidders to provide Medicaid HMO services to 120,000 of the state's aged, blind and disabled population -- a group that traditionally hasn't been placed in HMOs.

When states run their own Medicaid programs, they spend on average 4% to 6% on administrative costs, according to Martha Roherty, director of the National Association of State Medicaid Directors. The rest -- 94% to 96% -- goes to paying for medical care. At Medicaid HMOs, only 80% to 85% of premium dollars generally go for medical costs. The rest covers other costs -- including executive compensation, entertainment and political contributions -- or becomes profit for shareholders.

States monitor the profit margins of Medicaid HMOs, which are generally reported as 5% or less. State officials say that with such a thin margin there's little room for further savings, although a review in New Jersey questioned whether one HMO was overcharging its subsidiary in the state for services. That could make the subsidiary's profits look lower.

While they spend fewer dollars on medical care, companies say they are more efficient and improve the health of patients. Elizabeth Douglas of Chicago says her 11-year-old son has kept up on his immunizations thanks to a WellCare program that gives her a free ride to the doctor's office.

Some patients and doctors have a different view. Kuldeep Singh, an internist in Valdosta, Ga., says that when Georgia began to move more than a million Medicaid recipients into HMOs this year, he suddenly faced hurdles not imposed by regular Medicaid. Recently, he says, one of his assistants had to wait on hold to get approval from WellCare for a hospital chest X-ray on a patient suspected of having pneumonia. "It was ridiculous," says Dr. Singh. A spokesman for WellCare says it sometimes requires such approval because hospital-based X-rays cost two to three times as much as those done in a doctor's office or imaging center.

Many doctors refuse to take patients in Medicaid HMOs because reimbursements are so low. (The same problem occurs in traditional Medicaid.) Noha Polack, a pediatrician in Union City, N.J., has an arrangement under which Centene pays her a fixed monthly sum per child to handle basic medical needs. Until a few months ago, that sum was $11.50 per month, equal to $138 a year -- about half of what other Medicaid insurers pay, says Dr. Polack. A child who had a few colds or scrapes during a year would quickly put her in the red.

Dr. Polack threatened to drop all her Centene patients and recently got a raise -- the amount of which is confidential, she says -- but she still stopped accepting new Centene patients.

The HMO is stingy about drugs that others approve with little question, says Dr. Polack, naming the antibiotic Ceftin as an example. "Many times we have to make treatment decisions not depending on what would be best for the patient but what the patient can afford," she says. While she could ask for an exception to use Ceftin, "they are so notorious for not getting back to you" and there's little time when a child has an infection, she says.

Vickie Vickers, a 39-year-old Trenton, N.J., single mother on disability and Medicaid, learned about the difficulty of finding a doctor this year. She hurt her hand on Mother's Day while stooping to pick up playing cards that fell on the floor. She went to the hospital for a temporary cast but spent weeks with Centene trying to find an orthopedic doctor.

She finally found one an hour away. She says the orthopedist told her she needed an MRI or CT scan, but Centene wouldn't approve it. It took until late June for an orthopedist to fit her with a splint with metal bars.

Ms. Vickers rents a house in a run-down part of Trenton with a rusty fence outside and a leaky roof that has caused big water stains in the attic, bedroom, bathroom and kitchen. She wishes the old Medicaid were back because in the 1990s "you didn't have to call 50 doctors" to get an appointment.

Centene didn't provide comment on the complaints by Dr. Polack and Ms. Vickers.

Research on the quality of care in Medicaid HMOs is thin. A study of infant health last year by researchers at the University of Illinois-Chicago and the Urban Institute found that Medicaid managed care was correlated with a slight increase in inadequate prenatal care in some women but in general showed little difference from traditional Medicaid.

While some doctors and patients complain of Centene's stinginess, the company has been generous in regions where it has offices. Centene last year was the biggest donor for a $9.5 million renovation of an arts building in St. Louis, now called the Centene Center for Arts and Education, according to a spokeswoman for the center. The company paid $200,000 last year for the naming rights of a minor-league baseball stadium in Montana, where Centene employs 100 claims processors but doesn't have Medicaid clients. Centene also pledged $400,000 this year to the school district in Clayton, Mo., where the company has its headquarters, to rename the district's stadium.

Cynthia Schultz, director of the Great Falls International Airport in Montana, says Mr. Neidorff, the Centene CEO, once walked through the airport and heard that it couldn't afford artwork. Centene then commissioned and donated a $7,000 welded-metal sculpture of an eagle with a 16-foot wingspan that now hangs prominently in the airport, she says. The company confirmed the donation. "It's a great gift from someone who doesn't even live here," says Ms. Schultz.

Mr. Schenk, the Centene spokesman, said the donations show Centene is a "responsible and publicly focused corporation" and they help make the communities better places to live.

A few big U.S. insurers that serve large employers, including UnitedHealth Group and WellPoint Inc., also compete in the Medicaid HMO market. Many others don't. Medicaid HMOs assemble doctor networks in places with many people on Medicaid -- such as big cities and poor rural areas -- and deal with a single kind of customer, state governments. Those skills "are importantly different than what most commercial insurers have," says John W. Rowe, the former chief executive at Aetna Inc. and now a professor at Columbia University.

Medicaid HMOs have donated to candidates in state political races who support their existence. In 2005, five WellCare subsidiaries together donated $125,000 to Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich, a Democrat who won re-election this month. WellCare has 92,000 members in Illinois.

This year, 20 WellCare subsidiaries each donated the legal maximum of $500 to the campaign of Republican Tom Lee, who was narrowly defeated in his bid to become chief financial officer of Florida, WellCare's biggest market. WellCare donated $34,000 to the Republican Governors Association this year and contributed $100,000 to President Bush's second inaugural festivities in 2005.

"I call a governor, I usually get a call back within 24 to 48 hours," says Centene's Mr. Neidorff.

States keep track of the finances of Medicaid HMOs to ensure that the HMOs are spending a sufficient part of their revenue on medical costs. However, the numbers are subject to interpretation. A review of Centene's New Jersey subsidiary in 2004, by a unit of Marsh & McLennan Cos., said hundreds of thousands of dollars that Centene counted as medical costs should have been considered administrative costs.

The report also questioned cases where Centene's New Jersey subsidiary pays a national Centene subsidiary for specialized services such as mental-health or a nurse hotline. It said the New Jersey subsidiary was paying an above-market rate for some of these services. That would tend to increase the state subsidiary's medical costs and reduce its profit, without affecting the bottom line of Centene as a whole. Mr. Schenk of Centene declined to discuss the report in detail but said Centene has used the findings "to strengthen its operational efficiencies."

In Illinois, the state and the Justice Department asserted in a lawsuit that Amerigroup spent only $131 million on medical care from 2000 to 2004 despite taking in $243 million from the state. The lawsuit accused Amerigroup of fraudulently trying to exclude pregnant and sick patients to reduce its medical costs. A jury in Illinois state court agreed last month, finding Amerigroup liable to the government for $144 million. Internal Amerigroup emails filed in court show managers contemplated disciplinary action for employees who signed up women in the third trimester.

Amerigroup said it will appeal. The company says it discouraged transfers by pregnant women so their care wouldn't be disrupted. A spokesman said the figures in the suit are "extremely misleading," in part because they don't account for preventive health programs.

A Lame-Duck Revival For Postal Service Overhaul? (WP)

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) said yesterday that she is not giving up on legislation that would overhaul the U.S. Postal Service and will try to win approval of the bill next month during the lame-duck session.

Collins said she has met with the chief Democratic sponsor, Sen. Thomas R. Carper (Del.), and has talked with White House officials about how to revive the bill. Various proposals are being discussed by mailers and others to see whether modifications can be made to get the bill moving, she said.

Still, Collins said, "I'm not optimistic I will be successful."

The Senate bill stalled in late September when the National Association of Letter Carriers objected to a relatively minor provision that would require a three-day waiting period before injured postal workers could begin drawing workers' compensation benefits.

The union said any workers' compensation changes should apply to all of the federal workforce, not just postal employees. The objection derailed Collins's effort just as the bill appeared to be nearing Senate approval.

"I'm still stunned that the bill did not pass," Collins said in an interview.

The letter carriers union has said it will not drop its objection to the bill, even though Collins got the White House to drop proposals that unions had claimed were dealbreakers, such as forcing injured postal workers into retirement rather than letting them continue to collect higher workers' compensation benefits.

The bill would resolve some multibillion-dollar funding issues for the U.S. Postal Service, link postage increases to a consumer price index, set up an expedited rate-setting process and provide enhanced discounts to big mailers that take over some postal work.

Collins, in what many of the largest mailers consider a big victory, got the White House to sign off on changes that would permit military pensions earned by postal workers to be paid out of the Treasury. This means the pensions' costs would not be passed on to mailers in the form of higher rates. The White House also agreed to use an escrow fund to finance future postal retiree health-care benefits.

DOJ_NMG_0094803

Congress created the escrow fund in 2003 after learning that the Postal Service had been ordered to pay too much into a retirement trust fund. Postal payments into the fund, if unchecked, would grow to $105 billion by 2071. Unlocking the fund could add to the federal deficit, according to budget rules.

"I just find it inconceivable that the unions and mailers and other affected parties would walk away from a proposal that would put billions of dollars on the table," Collins said.

Even if a new bill could regain the union's support and keep the White House on board, the revised bill has to pass the House.

Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), who has worked on versions of the bill, has expressed concerns about whether Congress should dictate a rate-setting formula, which he worries might lead the post office to reduce services in tight economic times. Waxman also wants to ensure that mailer discounts do not become sweetheart deals. House GOP conservatives, meanwhile, are afraid that the postal bill might shift some costs to taxpayers, making it harder to reduce the federal deficit.

Despite his concerns, Waxman supports a postal overhaul and thinks it is worth a lame-duck effort to resolve differences, an aide said.

"This is the year," Collins said. Without congressional action next month, she said, "I fear it will never pass."Mansfield Fellowships

Federal employees with a strong career interest in U.S.-Japan relations may attend an information session Nov. 22 on how to apply for a Mike Mansfield fellowship.

The fellowships include a year of full-time language training and a year working in Japanese government offices. After completing the program, fellows return to their federal agencies. The application deadline is April 2.

Aye, Spy (NYT)

By John Deutch

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

Cambridge, Mass.

PRESIDENT BUSH salvaged what for him was an otherwise dismal week by nominating Robert Gates to be secretary of defense. Mr. Gates is an experienced Washington hand with the right temperament to change the administration's thinking about our mission in Iraq and to make much-needed long-term changes in how we defend our nation.

Some critics point out that Mr. Gates spent most of his career in C.I.A.'s intelligence directorate, and question whether that background is appropriate for the Pentagon job. Well, as somebody who has served at both institutions, I can't think of any better pedigree. C.I.A. intelligence analysts are dedicated to giving an objective estimate of what is really happening to policymakers who are often invested in particular outcomes. This sort of neutral mind-set is just what President Bush needs and the country expects.

The big question he must answer on Iraq is this: Are we making progress toward meeting our minimum objectives — helping the Iraqis maintain security, establishing a working government and restoring basic services? If the answer is no, as I suspect, then Mr. Gates should tell the president that it is time to withdraw. Better sooner than later to avoid more lives lost and more treasure spent.

Contrary to conventional wisdom on both sides of the aisle, the consequences of withdrawal need not be catastrophic to American interests in the region. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice; the national security adviser, Steve Hadley; and Mr. Gates need to develop a secondary track, simultaneous with a military withdrawal, centered on new economic and diplomatic initiatives in the Middle East to re-establish America's credibility and purpose.

In particular, we must take a new approach to Iran: its actions can encourage or dampen civil violence in Iraq, its oil exports are important to world supply and its uranium enrichment program puts it on a path to a nuclear bomb. Two years ago, Mr. Gates and the national security adviser in the Carter administration, Zbigniew Brzezinski, led a Council on Foreign Relations committee that recommended a more active approach to Iran centered on a "compartmentalized process of dialogue, confidence building and incremental engagement." Mr. Gates's work on the committee demonstrated his pragmatic approach to foreign policy and his ability to work effectively with those of differing ideologies.

Yes, there is an aspect of irony in having a former intelligence director become secretary of defense after the Iraqi weapons-of-mass-destruction intelligence failure was used to justify our 2003 invasion. And it is also true that the cultures of the C.I.A. and the Pentagon are very different. But Mr. Gates would not be the first top director of central intelligence to become secretary of defense. James Schlesinger moved from the intelligence directorship to the Pentagon in the 1970s, and he is remembered for his fierce independence from the White House.

DOJ_NMG_0094804

Of course, there will be much more on the new secretary's plate than just Iraq. First, I hope that Mr. Gates will quickly re-establish the trusting relationship with senior military leaders — the chairman the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the heads of the combat and supporting joint commands — that was the hallmark of Secretary of Defense William Perry's successful tenure in the 1990s.

Next year's Pentagon budget, at greater than $530 billion, is giving Congress sticker shock. Down the road, modernization costs will only increase and there will be a large bill to pay to "reset" the Army and Marine Corps readiness and equipment to acceptable levels after we leave Iraq.

Mr. Gates is well suited for making his case to Congress. He is not, however, a technology or acquisitions expert, and he will need to listen to others in establishing a sound and affordable multiyear program to reshape the military to meet today's threats.

Perhaps nobody is better suited than Mr. Gates for reforming the military's intelligence operations. The revamping of the government's intelligence community in 2004 has been a mixed success. One important shortcoming is the Defense Department's continued use of its considerable intelligence budget to run its programs in isolation from the other intelligence agencies.

Mr. Gates surely understands the need to integrate the military's intelligence operations with those of other agencies. The Pentagon should stop competing with other agencies over collection and dissemination of information, and become more of an informed user of intelligence gathered by the multiagency intelligence community.

Last, a few will raise questions, based on Mr. Gates's involvement in the Iran-contra affair, about his ability to control covert operations. In this, I have full confidence in Mr. Gates's judgment. When I was the C.I.A. chief, my job was made easier by the way Mr. Gates had structured the partnership between the directorate of operations and the directorate of intelligence during his tenure in order to ensure that operations were launched only after disciplined analytic thinking of consequences.

To President Bush, for his choice of Robert Gates, I say "bravo," a word I'll bet he has not heard a lot recently. Congress should confirm the nominee promptly, thank him for his willingness to serve, and tell him we expect great results.

Earmarks Are Efficient (USAT)

By John Culberson

USA Today, November 15, 2006

As a dedicated fiscal conservative who is committed to the Republican principles of limited government and a balanced budget, I believe "earmarks" can help ensure our tax dollars are spent effectively.

Every year, members of Congress are approached by dozens of constituent groups ranging from schools, hospitals, non-profits, city and state governments to the private sector requesting funding for projects or programs. Because members have a strong grasp on the needs of their districts, it is safe to assume they know which projects deserve federal support. Without earmarks, thousands of groundbreaking medical, science, energy and defense projects, along with critical infrastructure investments for flood control and highways, would go unfunded.

As elected and accountable representatives of the American people, members should set high standards for carefully selecting which projects receive federal funding. Personally, my starting answer is "no" on all spending requests, and "yes" has to be earned. I will approve an earmark only if it is absolutely essential and fits within the federal government's limited responsibilities. I proudly publish all my earmarks and my request letters to the Appropriations Committee on my website.

Eliminating earmarks will not save taxpayers money because the invisible bureaucracy will simply spend it. Earmarks are simply a way of directing budgeted money to specific projects. Instead of concentrating solely on earmarks, which account for about 1% of all federal spending, Congress must reform entitlement programs, which are the real source of annual deficits.

Any debate over meaningful budget reform should start with a Balanced Budget Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Forty-nine states already have some form of a constitutional requirement for a balanced budget. We also need to create a deficit reduction account where all spending cuts can be deposited to help balance the budget.

"Earmark" has become a bad word because a few members have abused the system, but that does not mean Congress should surrender its constitutional authority to direct federal spending to unelected bureaucrats who rarely step foot outside of Washington.

Rep. John Culberson, R-Texas, serves on the House Appropriations Committee.

The District Deserves A Vote (WP)

By Adrian Fenty

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0094805

Last Tuesday Americans across the country flooded their polling places and voted for far-reaching change in our national legislature. Whether it was the war in Iraq or such issues as national security, education, health care and the environment, Americans sent a clear message with their votes that it's time for change.

But the nearly 600,000 Americans living in the District of Columbia were forced to sit on the sidelines and watch as the rest of the nation elected our new Congress. With no voting member of Congress to elect, Washingtonians were again denied participation in American democracy.

As the newly elected mayor of Washington, D.C., I'm concerned about the important issues facing the people of the District. I'm concerned about the families unable to afford health care or housing. I'm concerned about the parents grieving over the loss of daughters and sons in Afghanistan and Iraq. I'm concerned about the children who are being left behind in schools. And I'm outraged that D.C. residents have no vote in the Congress that will decide how to handle these challenges.

At the top of Congress's agenda right now should be this important part of its unfinished business: enactment of H.R. 5388, the D.C. Voting Rights Act. This legislation would give voting representation in the House of Representatives to D.C. residents for the first time ever. Passage of the bill is a key component of our plan to turn the District into a world-class capital.

The legislation provides D.C. residents with a vote in the House of Representatives while providing Utah with an additional congressional seat. Utah was the next state in line to receive an additional representative after the last census. H.R. 5388 has bipartisan support and is vote-neutral. We are working closely with Utah Gov. Jon Huntsman to negotiate a fair compromise that benefits the people of Utah and the District of Columbia.

In September I sat alongside Mayor Anthony Williams and members of the D.C. Council at a House Judiciary subcommittee hearing on the D.C. Voting Rights Act. I listened as every witness and lawmaker present agreed that denying a vote in Congress to citizens living in Washington is a problem that must be fixed. We have made considerable progress in advancing this bill, and we are presented with a window of opportunity to correct the injustice by the end of this year.

The D.C. Voting Rights Act is backed by constitutional experts such as Kenneth Starr and Patricia Wald, who, as legal scholars, understand that the District clause of the Constitution gives Congress the power to provide representation for Washingtonians.

I look forward to working with Congress on a number of additional reform issues, including budget and legislative autonomy and a transformation of the public school system. Let us begin that partnership by taking a step toward strengthening our nation's capital.

I urge Congress to pass this bill swiftly so that President Bush can sign it into law this year. America is the only democracy in the world that denies voting representation to the people of its capital. That needs to end right now.

I am humbled by the strong support of D.C. residents who share my vision of a world-class capital. We are not alone. I have traveled across the country meeting with mayors in America's greatest cities who share our frustration and our hope for bringing representation to our nation's capital. Achieving full and equal participation in our democracy is essential to working toward that vision. We need voting representation in Congress and control of our own affairs to help move our city forward.

As American citizens, we deserve full and equal representation in both the House and Senate. The D.C. Voting Rights Act moves us toward equality. Give Washingtonians a vote in the House. We deserve more -- but certainly no less.

Que CIRA, CIRA . . . (WSJ)

By Robert C. Pozen

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

Democrats and Republicans agree that Americans need to save more for retirement -- our personal savings rate has dropped to an all-time low. Despite numerous legislative programs to lure employers into offering retirement plans, many still have not taken up the bait. Today, almost 30 million full-time employees -- 25% of the full-time work force -- are not offered a retirement plan at work.

So what can be done to promote retirement savings for these 30 million workers? Legally, if employees are not offered a workplace retirement plan, they can establish an individual retirement account (IRA) -- regardless of their income level. However, only a small portion of these employees have enrolled. Although employees usually say they want to save more for retirement, most cannot overcome inertia to open an account. By contrast, if an employer takes retirement contributions out of their employees' paychecks, most employees will stay in the plan -- i.e., they will not opt out. In one study, the participation rate increased to 92% from 66% in opt-out plans relative to opt-in plans, with even larger increases for low-income workers.

A bipartisan Congress should harness these forces of inertia and mandate that all employers not otherwise offering a retirement plan establish a check-off IRA (CIRA) for employees. An employer could take out a minimum percentage (e.g., 3%) of their employees' wages from their paychecks, tax deductible in the year of contribution. But employees would have 60 days from their enrollment date to increase their contribution rate, or to opt out completely of any payroll deduction. The employer utilizing this auto-enrollment approach would be protected from legal liability by a safe harbor, if the employer followed specified procedures and provided specified disclosures.

Similarly, those payroll deductions would be presumptively invested in a balanced fund -- with 50% in a diversified stock fund and 50% in a high-quality bond fund. Again employees would have 60 days from their enrollment date to opt out of the balanced fund by choosing from a slate of investment alternatives -- a diversified stock fund, diversified bond fund, a money market fund or bank deposit. If the CIRA offered these four funds, its sponsor also would be legally protected by another safe harbor.

While the CIRA would increase retirement savings by workers with relatively low self-discipline, it would not be unduly burdensome on small employers -- the bulk of firms without retirement plans. Small employers (those with under 100 employees) would not be required to make any contribution to a CIRA, nor would they have to satisfy the complex IRS tests for anti-discrimination. Instead, they would be required only to connect their payroll system to a qualifying financial institution offering a CIRA, involving minimal administrative costs. Nevertheless, Congress might choose to exempt employers with fewer than five or 10 employees, because many of these do not have an outside payroll service or computerized payroll program.

By contrast, if a larger employer (with 100 or more employees) chose to adopt a CIRA rather than a 401(k) plan, that large employer should additionally be required to make a reasonable contribution to the CIRA accounts of its participating employees -- for instance, a 50% match of annual contributions by full-time employees up to 6% of wages (a maximum match of 3%). To smooth the transition for growing companies, this matching requirement could be limited to employers with 100 or more employees for three consecutive years. Furthermore, since this matching requirement is similar to the new safe harbor for meeting the anti-discrimination tests in 401(k) plans -- but slightly lower for simplicity's sake, any larger employer contributing such matches to a CIRA should also be deemed to have met the antidiscrimination tests.

Without this additional requirement, larger employers could drop their 401(k) plans in favor of CIRAs in order to avoid making any retirement contributions. The creation of the CIRA should not be an excuse for a larger employer to stop helping its employees save for their retirement; rather, the CIRA is a device to encourage workplace savings by shifting most functions to a financial institution. This is the only way to ensure that the minority of larger employers, who have resisted years of government incentives to offer retirement plans, contribute their fair share to boosting retirement savings.

Many financial institutions would be ready to offer a CIRA for modest or no fees if the procedures were streamlined and the investments included funds managed by that institution. Monthly payroll deductions, say, could be limited to full-time employees who had worked for the same employer for at least one year, and the default investment could be a balanced fund run by the institution handling those deductions. Moreover, no loans from CIRAs, and no pre-retirement withdrawals for college tuition or first homes, would be permitted.

If employees with a CIRA switched jobs, they could transfer their monies to the retirement plan of their new employer. If employees with a CIRA were terminated, they could stay in the same CIRA or make a tax-free transfer of their CIRA amounts to a rollover IRA. If employees with a CIRA retired, they could make a tax-free transfer to a rollover IRA, or withdraw their CIRA balances subject to withholding taxes.

The CIRA would assure that almost all full-time workers would have access to a tax-advantaged retirement plan, with enrollment and investment procedures designed to make it likely that they would actually save for retirement.

Mr. Pozen is chairman of MFS Investment Management.

Will Fair Pay Have Its Day? (NYT)

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

At his first post-election news conference last week, President Bush said that he believed he could find common ground with the new Congress on Democrats' longstanding drive to raise the federal minimum wage. That is welcome, but long overdue. The minimum wage has been stuck at a miserly $5.15 an hour since 1997, with Republican lawmakers blocking repeated attempts since then to raise it. Adjusted for inflation, the purchasing power of the wage has dropped to its lowest level since 1955.

Clearly, the bottom is falling out for the nation's estimated 5.6 million minimum-wage workers. That's bad for the economy. Even Wal-Mart, not exactly an advocate for high wages, favors raising the minimum wage to support consumer spending.

A too-low minimum wage is also bad for society. One reason for having a minimum wage is to help ensure that even the lowest-paid workers do not fall irretrievably behind everyone else. Without a higher wage, that goal is increasingly out of reach.

For most Americans, the economic growth of the Bush era has not translated into improved wages, greater financial security, better health care coverage or other measures of a rising standard of living. But Mr. Bush has never offered corrective policies. As for the minimum wage, he has echoed the perennial Republican warning that raising it could force businesses that can't meet the payroll to lay off workers. Persuasive and copious research on the issue disputes that assertion.

This summer, in perhaps the lowest blow, Republican lawmakers scuttled the most recent effort to raise the minimum wage by linking it to yet another huge estate-tax cut for America's wealthiest families, one of Mr. Bush's most cherished goals.

Come December, the minimum wage will have remained unchanged for the longest period since it was established in 1938. There are no valid reasons to delay an increase, and many good ones to proceed. Supporting a higher minimum wage would be a way for Mr. Bush to begin to rectify the inequality that has grown so alarmingly on his watch.

Fargonomics (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

Kent Conrad's Web site proclaims that the North Dakota Democrat "has been a leading voice for fiscal responsibility" in Washington, and the Senator rarely misses an opportunity to bemoan "deficits as far as the eye can see." Maybe once Mr. Conrad comes off his latest spending binge, he can buy the rest of Washington some binoculars.

Or at least enough magnifying eyewear to see $4.9 billion, which is the amount of emergency drought relief the parsimonious Mr. Conrad is attempting to shovel into a Senate military construction bill in this week's lame duck session. If this is the sort of "fiscal discipline" we can expect from the new Democratic majority, K Street ought to be popping the champagne corks.

Farm-state Senators have been pushing for this handout for months, and the only good news is that they've modestly scaled back their demands. Nebraska Democrat Ben Nelson had offered a $6.5 billion "relief" amendment to the port security bill in September. But Republicans said farm aid wasn't germane to port security -- no kidding -- and Mr. Nelson failed to get a vote. The GOP ought to do the same with this latest spending extravaganza, while it still has the power to do so.

Mr. Conrad is calling his amendment "emergency" spending, and it is true that the Plains states and Texas endured a drought this summer. But the government already provides a safety net for such events: crop insurance. That federal program was created with the express purpose of eliminating the need for emergency bailouts. The vast majority of U.S. insurable crops are covered by the program, including 98% of North Dakota's.

And don't forget federal farm subsidies. Last year alone, farmers pocketed $20.2 billion worth of commodity program payments and conservation money. North Dakota (since we're on the subject) was the recipient of more than $1 billion, much of which goes to a handful of large agribusinesses.

Mr. Conrad's spending enthusiasm also comes when the farm industry is doing well. Last year marked the second-highest net farm income on record. While some crops, such as wheat, have been hurt by the drought, the nation's biggest crops -- corn and soybeans -- are on track for a bumper year. Prices are also strong, in no small part because the government is mandating use of corn-based ethanol. Drought aid on top of all this amounts to quadruple dipping at the taxpayer trough.

September's "emergency" drought bills were also stuffed with the usual Member goodies that have little to do with lack of rain. Mr. Nelson's previous bill would have given farmers $1.6 billion for high energy and fertilizer costs. Other proposals included $6 million for Hawaii sugarcane growers, $2 million for cattle herds with bovine tuberculosis, and $6 million for a flood-prone region in (of course) North Dakota. Mr. Conrad's latest bill, meanwhile, would set up a new $300 million small-business economic-loss "block grant" program that has as much chance of disappearing in the future as Christmas.

The Bush Administration has tried to keep a lid on this largesse, while helping in targeted ways. The Agriculture Department sped up some $700 million in countercyclical payments, and also provided $50 million to livestock producers hurt by the drought. As for legislation, some Republicans have reasonably demanded that any money given out in emergency farm payments be offset with reductions elsewhere in the farm budget. Mr. Conrad and his allies have refused, claiming this is an emergency on the level of Hurricane Katrina.

Which gets to the heart of the farm problem. Americans are generous to neighbors in need, but ballooning farm subsidies and industry resistance to any reform have shown this to be a one-sided affair. As for Mr. Conrad: Meet the new spenders, same as the old spenders.

Redistricting Reconsidered (WP)

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

IT WOULD BE easy for those complacent about partisan redistricting to look at this year's election as evidence that it's not a problem after all. Gerrymandering of congressional district lines failed to protect a number of incumbents around the country from defeat. It didn't prevent the House of Representatives from switching hands. Maybe letting politicians use sophisticated computers to choose their own voters actually calcifies the American electoral system less than the past few elections have suggested.

The election this year was dramatically more competitive than others in recent history. According to data from the Center for Voting and Democracy, 34 House races were decided by a margin of fewer than 5 percentage points, more than in 2002 and 2004 combined. An additional 26 were decided by fewer than 10 percentage points, compared with 28 in the past two elections combined. The reason for the change is simple: Voters were angry at Republicans. And while partisan redistricting can make red districts redder and blue districts bluer, it cannot stop either from going purple as a party fails to persuade its own voters or get them to show up at the polls.

But don't let these numbers fool you. The overwhelming majority of seats remained beyond serious democratic competition -- as always. Three hundred and seventeen seats were decided by margins of greater than 20 points, 95 of them by more than 40 points. In 55 races, candidates of one major party faced no opposition from the other major party. In other words, this year's competitiveness is only comparative. For most members, incumbency still offered surefire protection from voter dissatisfaction. And the power of incumbency undoubtedly protected Republicans from further losses. Of the closest races in which incumbents hung on to win, only two, at most, involved Democratic incumbents scraping by, both in Georgia. The rest were all Republicans, several of whom clearly benefited from the way the lines had been drawn after the 2000 Census.

Partisan redistricting is not the only -- or even the principal -- factor shielding incumbents from electoral accountability. Even districts drawn in an apolitical fashion will tend to have stronger ideological centers of gravity than one might imagine. And incumbents also benefit from fundraising advantages and the ability to bring home pork. But redistricting adds to all of that a measure of simple cheating to make challenges more difficult. The party in power in a given state gets to shield its own officeholders and burn the other side's, or the parties can jointly conspire to protect virtually all incumbents. As this election shows, it doesn't always work completely. America is not a Soviet republic. But even at their most competitive, House races are far from models of electoral accountability.

Stocks Surge On Fed Official's Comments (AP)

By Madlen Read

AP, November 15, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) - Wall Street rebounded sharply Tuesday, with the Dow Jones industrials surging further into record territory after a Federal Reserve official indicated the Fed will maintain its policy of stable interest rates.

Investors who were heartened by an earlier report of slowing wholesale inflation were cheered by comments from Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis President William Poole, who described the Fed's interest rate policy as "about right." Poole, who currently sits on the Fed's policy-making Open Market Committee, reassured a market that has been counting on a steady rate policy for the near future.

Earlier, the Labor Department said wholesale inflation as measured by the Producer Price Index dropped by 1.6 percent last month following a 1.3 percent slide in September. Plunging energy prices were behind the declines, which gave Wall Street some relief from concerns that rising inflation might prompt the Fed to raise rates after three straight meetings where they were left unchanged.

In late afternoon trading, the Dow Jones industrial average rose 93.09, or 0.77 percent, to 12,224.97. Blue chips hit a trading high of 12,228.01, putting them on track to finish above the closing high of 12,176.54 reached Wednesday.

The Nasdaq composite index rose 3.46, or 0.14 percent, to 2,409.84.

Bonds rose on the inflation news, with the yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note falling to 4.57 percent from 4.59 percent late Monday. The dollar rose against other major currencies, while gold prices slipped.

Before Poole's comments, investors sifted through economic reports, which also included a second straight monthly drop in retail sales during October. The 0.2 percent decline reported by the Commerce Department report reflected the 25 percent drop in crude oil prices since mid-July rather than a weakness in consumer spending. The drop in sales was also smaller than expected.

The market was initially unnerved by a disappointing earnings report at Home Depot Inc. (HD), which raised concerns about the toll that slowing home sales is taking on other industries. Home Depot rose $1, or 2.8 percent, to $37.40, after posting a 3.1 percent third-quarter profit drop on a sharp decline in same-store sales, those from stores open at least a year.

Meanwhile, Wal-Mart Stores Inc. (WMT) rose $1.43, or 3.1 percent, to $47.75, after reporting third-quarter earnings rose 11.5 percent despite weak growth in U.S. sales. The world's largest discount retailer promised its most aggressive holiday discounts ever to boost year-end business.

Discounter Target Corp. rose $1.02, or 1.8 percent, to $58.78, after it beat analysts' projections with an 11 percent rise in sales.

D.R. Horton Inc. climbed $2.10, or 9.4 percent, to $24.48 after its third-quarter results surpassed analysts' expectations. Still, the homebuilder's profit tumbled 51 percent on falling sales, reflecting a bleak housing market.

The performance of the stock market going forward will depend largely on whether the economic data released later this week - including the Consumer Price Index, housing starts and industrial production - come in strong or weak.

"There's been a subtle change from investors ignoring bad economic news to now finally paying attention to it," said Alexander Paris, economist and market analyst for Chicago-based Barrington Research.

The Russell 2000 index of smaller companies rose 8.55, or 1.11 percent, to 780.96.

Advancing issues outnumbered decliners on the New York Stock Exchange, where volume was 9.8 billion shares.

Overseas, Japan's Nikkei stock average closed up 1.11 percent. In late trading, Britain's FTSE 100 closed down 0.12 percent, Germany's DAX index was down 0.10 percent, and France's CAC-40 closed down 0.26 percent.

Fed Policy 'About Right,' Official Says; Investors Send Dow To Record High (WP)

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

NEW YORK, Nov. 14 -- Wall Street barreled yet higher Tuesday, with the Dow Jones industrial average surging further into record territory after a Federal Reserve official indicated the Fed would maintain its policy of stable interest rates.

The Dow rose 86.13, or 0.71 percent, to close at 12,218.01, above the previous record close of 12,176.54 set Nov. 8. The blue chips also reached a new trading high of 12,228.01. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 8.80, or 0.64 percent, to 1393.22. It hit a trading high of 1394.49, the first time the S&P 500 surpassed 1394 since November 2000. The Nasdaq composite index rose 24.28, or 1.01 percent, to 2430.66.

Investors who were heartened by an earlier report of slowing producer prices began buying in earnest after Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis President William Poole described the Fed's interest rate policy as "about right."

Poole, a voting member on the Fed's policymaking Open Market Committee, had reassuring words for a market that has been counting on a steady rate policy for the near future.

Earlier, the Labor Department said inflation at the wholesale level as measured by the producer price index fell 1.6 percent last month following a 1.3 percent slide in September.

Blue Chips Climb To Another Record After Fed Official's Remarks On Rates (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

The Dow Jones Industrial Average plowed to a record, closing above 12200 for the first time, after a Federal Reserve official made upbeat comments on interest rates.

Stocks began with declines after weak October retail-sales numbers were released, but shares spurted higher following comments by William Poole, president of the St. Louis Federal Reserve Bank, that Fed rate policy is "about right." That reinforced hopes the Fed won't raise rates and might cut them next year, which would help businesses and consumers.

The Dow industrials rose 86.13 points, or 0.71%, to 12218.01, up 14% this year. The blue chips have risen in six of the past seven sessions, with 15 record closes since the beginning of October.

DOJ_NMG_0094810

Technology stocks, which can benefit from economic optimism, led the market. The Nasdaq Composite Index hit another six-year high, up 1.01%, or 24.28 points, at 2430.66. It is up 10.2% in 2006.

The Russell 2000 small-stock index finished at a record, up 1.64% at 785.06, up 16.6% this year.

Declining retail sales, and a steep October drop in wholesale prices, initially sowed worry that the economy is slowing too much. But Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and Target Corp. reported strong quarterly profits, and fears that Mr. Poole might make hawkish rate comments proved unfounded.

"The news from Mr. Poole wasn't earth-shattering, but it wasn't negative," said Todd Leone, head of listed trading at New York brokerage firm Cowen & Co., "and then you saw money pouring into the market."

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index hit a six-year closing high, rising 0.64%, or 8.80 points, to 1393.22. It is up 11.6% this year. The S&P isn't near a record, but the news that it joined the Nasdaq and the Dow at a new multi-year high pushed money managers to buy for fear of being left behind. Trading volume was heavy.

Treasury-bond prices also rose, pushing yields lower, because soft inflation holds down interest rates and bond yields.

Investors now nervously await October consumer-price data, due tomorrow.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 0.41%, or 0.94 point, to 231.07.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks advanced1. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 3.02 billion shares, as 2,441 stocks rose and 871 fell.

Bond prices gained2. The 10-year Treasury note rose 8/32, or $2.50 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.576%. The 30-year bond was up 20/32 to yield 4.666%.

The dollar weakened3. Late in New York, it traded at 117.51 yen, down from 118.19, while the euro rose against the dollar to $1.2822 from $1.2803.

Prices Fell Sharply In October (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

Wholesale prices fell at a record rate last month as two economic forces that rarely move in the same direction — the costs of gasoline and light trucks — both plunged.

The new statistics, released yesterday by the Labor Department, added to a growing pool of economic data that showed inflation was easing. For investors focused on the Federal Reserve's next move on interest rates, the news suggested that rates would remain stable, with some predicting that a cut in borrowing costs might even come as early as March.

The report, along with comments yesterday from a Fed official that the central bank's policy on interest rates has been "about right," helped touch off a late rally on Wall Street.

The Standard and Poor's 500-stock index closed at its highest level in six years, and the Dow Jones industrial average broke another record.

Consumer spending is showing signs of slowing but remains robust. The Commerce Department said yesterday that retail sales in October, apart from gasoline, rose 0.4 percent, suggesting that many Americans are going into the holiday season in a good mood from the savings they are reaping from lower fuel prices. Wholesale prices as measured by the producer price index, a seasonally adjusted gauge of the prices businesses charge one another just before they are sold to consumers, fell 1.6 percent in October, matching the steepest decline on record, set in 2002.

The core wholesale inflation rate, a measure that does not take into account the frequent gyrations in energy and food prices, declined 0.9 percent last month, its biggest fall in 13 years.

The overall picture of wholesale inflation last month was heavily colored by plummeting prices for light trucks, which include sport utility vehicles, pickups and minivans, and declining oil prices. Light truck prices fell 12.4 percent, the biggest year-over-year decline since the Labor Department began tracking them in 1964. The price of wholesale gasoline dropped 18.5 percent from October 2005 to October 2006.

Still, even if the decline in vehicle prices had not been so steep, wholesale inflation in October would have been low. When the core rate is recalculated without automobile sales, wholesale prices rose 0.1 percent.

"There's evidence that with energy prices falling and with the slowdown in the housing market, there's a picture of more benign price increases emerging," said Peter Kretzmer, an economist at Bank of America. "I don't think it will be that long before this starts to translate into somewhat muted consumer price trends."

DOJ_NMG_0094811

Whether falling prices at the producer level eventually lead to falling prices for consumers is never as direct as it might seem. But some economists found it encouraging that yesterday's report was the second consecutive set of wholesale price data to show an overall decline. In September, wholesale prices fell 1.3 percent. For the year, prices are down 1.6 percent.

Pressure continued to ease further up the production chain. Prices of crude goods — items in the earliest stages of production, like gravel, scrap metal or animals used for slaughter — fell 10.5 percent in October after declining 3.4 percent in September. Prices of intermediate goods declined 1.1 percent.

The falling costs of materials could help reduce the threat of inflation from rising labor costs. One critical question Fed policy makers must answer as they chart the nation's monetary policy is whether the recent wage gains — which have just started to outpace inflation — are pressuring employers to pass along the cost by raising prices.

"The issue is what happens with labor," said Jack Caffrey, an equity strategist with J. P. Morgan Private Bank. "If the Fed then remains with their focus on inflation risks being the dominant issue, it likely stays with a tighter monetary policy for longer."

William Poole, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis, said yesterday that the Fed could go either way. "I believe that the outlook for Fed policy is roughly symmetrical," he said after giving a speech in Wilmington, Del. "I can imagine data coming in that would make me want to tighten policy. And I could imagine data coming in that would lead me to believe that we ought to be easing policy."

Economists said the tipping point for the Fed to lower rates could come if the labor market shows signs of weakening. Last month, unemployment fell to 4.4 percent, the lowest level since May 2001. That is close to what economists consider full employment, and some experts have said they think the number of jobless will rise in the coming months.

"People will debate how quickly before the Fed pulls the trigger, and how much weakening you need," said James O'Sullivan, an economist at UBS. "But if we start to see the unemployment rate edge up, I think it's just a matter of time before the Fed starts easing."

U.S. Consumer-Spending Data Bolster Hopes For Holiday Sales (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

American consumers maintained their spending in October, leading economists to hold out hope that robust holiday sales will help insulate the U.S. economy from a sharp downturn in housing.

Excluding gas stations, which were hurt by lower fuel prices, sales at food and retail establishments rose to a seasonally adjusted $332 billion in October, up 0.4% from September and 6.5% from a year earlier, the Commerce Department said.

Higher spending at restaurants and drugstores helped to offset declines in sales of housing-related goods, such as building materials and furniture. Overall retail sales shrank 0.2% from September, but were up 4.5% from a year earlier.

Together with a big drop in wholesale-goods prices, the retail-sales report persuaded some investors that the economy is cooling just enough to keep inflation in check, allowing the Federal Reserve to hold short-term interest rates steady at their current 5.25%. As a result, stock and bond prices rose.

Economists said the report suggests that consumers, whose purchases make up more than two-thirds of the U.S. economy, are slowing down a bit, but that falling home sales aren't yet seriously affecting spending in other sectors.

While downward revisions showed that September retail sales were weaker than previously thought, sales excluding gas, autos and building materials rose 0.9% in the two months taken together. The numbers point to a rise in inflation-adjusted consumer spending in the current quarter of about 3% -- below the 10-year average of 3.7%, but still healthy. "That's a good start to the quarter," said Brian Jones, senior economist at Citigroup Inc. "You've got to think that we're going to have a pretty decent holiday shopping season."

In recent months, economic forces have been pushing consumers in opposite directions. Falling home prices have made them feel poorer, but job and wage gains, together with lower gasoline bills, have left them with more spending money. Economists estimate that personal income in October, adjusted for inflation, was up more than 4% from a year earlier.

"The positive income effects from the labor market are at the moment outweighing the negative wealth impact from the housing market," said John Shin, senior economist at Lehman Brothers. "While we're still very concerned about the housing market, we don't see the impact of that kicking in just yet."

Gas stations and housing-related retailers suffered the biggest dollar declines in October sales. Sales at furniture and home-furnishings stores dropped a seasonally adjusted 0.7% from a month earlier. Building materials and garden supplies fell 0.3%.

Sales in other areas grew. Eating and drinking establishments' sales rose 0.3%, and health and personal-care retailers saw a 1.3% rise. Sales at auto and auto-parts dealers rose 0.6%, despite auto companies' reports of a weak month.

DOJ_NMG_0094812

Analysts believe low gas prices and income gains bode well for the holiday shopping season. Darrell Rigby, head of the global retail practice at Bain & Co., forecasts retail sales of general-merchandise items such as clothing and electronics will be up 5% to 5.5% in November and December from the same period last year, and up from a long-term average of 4.3%.

In another reflection of falling energy prices, the Labor Department reported yesterday that its index of wholesale-goods prices fell 1.6% in October from September. Excluding food and energy, wholesale prices were still down 0.9% -- the largest one-month decline since 1993.

Economy Seen Slowing As Wholesale Prices Plummet 1.6% (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — Falling energy prices and slumps in the housing and auto sectors propelled a record decline in wholesale prices in October.

Retail sales were muted during the month, the government said Tuesday. Overall, the data indicate the economy is slowing, and price pressures moderating, as the Federal Reserve has projected.

But analysts said the Fed is still far from an all-clear on inflation. Bill Cheney, chief economist at John Hancock Financial Services, cautioned that the wholesale index measures goods prices, which have been held down by globalization.

"Services are much less subject to competition from overseas … to the extent that you find yourself getting a real tight labor market in the U.S., it could push up wages and push up costs," Cheney says. He said the next Fed move is unclear.

The central bank has held short-term interest rates at 5.25% since June, after raising them 17 times from mid-2004 to mid-2006 to tamp down inflation. Core consumer inflation, which excludes volatile food and energy prices, was 2.9% in the 12 months, above the Fed's informal 1%-2% comfort range.

The Labor Department said Tuesday that wholesale prices plunged 1.6% last month, equaling a record decline in October 2001. Core prices fell a sharp 0.9%.

Energy prices fell 5% in October following an 8.4% plunge in September. Gasoline prices dipped 7.9% from the previous month and natural gas prices, 9.3%. Sport-utility vehicle prices fell 9.7%; car prices, 2.3%.

"The drop in petroleum prices and natural gas has helped with diesel fuel, construction plastics and delivery costs. The slump in home building certainly is affecting gypsum prices," says Kenneth Simonson, chief economist of The Associated General Contractors of America.

Though consumers are saving on energy bills, they haven't boosted spending elsewhere. The Commerce Department said retail sales dropped 0.2% in October, following an 0.8% September decline. The dip largely reflected the impact of falling energy prices but furniture, building supplies and other areas also declined.

Still, with a strong job market, many economists expect a solid holiday season. "Despite all the angst about a slowing economy, I don't think Santa will be laying off any reindeer," Cheney says.

US Economy Hit By Housing Slowdown (FT)

By Krishna Guha And Eoin Callan In Washington And David Pilling In Tokyo

Financial Times, November 15, 2006

A slew of economic reports on Tuesday showed the US economy feeling the strain from the sharp slowdown in the housing sector, while offering hopes that inflation pressures could be easing.

The US data came as Japan announced a stronger-than-expected 2 per cent annualised growth rate for the third quarter, raising the prospect of a second interest rate rise there.

The latest US retail sales figures, from October, showed that consumer spending remained resilient in spite of the pressures from the housing market. Sales excluding petrol increased by 0.4 per cent over the month. Lower oil prices meant the value of total retail spending fell 0.2 per cent on the previous month.

But downward revisions to the previous two months' retail sales suggested that consumer spending was weaker than thought.

Drew Matus, a senior economist at Lehman Brothers, said: "The retail picture points to a slightly lower growth profile than we anticipated."

Reports from Home Depot, the world's biggest DIY retailer, and D.R. Horton, the second-biggest US home builder, showed that pain continues in sectors most directly exposed to the housing slowdown.

Home Depot, which reported a 3 per cent fall in third-quarter net earnings, said the slowdown had come "faster and deeper" than expected. Bob Nardelli, chief executive, said the softening in the housing market had caused "significant" deterioration in home improvement sales, with conditions likely to worsen.

DOJ_NMG_0094813

D.R. Horton, meanwhile, reported a rise in cancellations of new home sales for the third quarter in a row. “I’d say we are in the early stages of a downturn,” said Don Tomnitz, president and chief executive.

The US inflation picture improved moderately, as data showed core producer prices fell last month at their sharpest rate in 13 years. Peter Kretzmer, senior economist at Bank of America Securities, said the fall in core PPI – excluding food and energy – was “almost entirely the result of lower car and truck prices”.

Bond prices rallied on hopes that tomorrow’s consumer price report would show evidence that this reduction would feed into slightly lower consumer price inflation. US stocks also closed higher, with the Dow Jones Industrial Average reaching a record 12,218.01.

The much stronger than expected growth in Japan sent the Nikkei stock average up 1.67 per cent to 16,290, its biggest percentage gain in six weeks.

Southern California Home Prices Hold As Sales Continue To Slow (LAT)

By Annette Haddad

The Los Angeles Times, November 15, 2006

Southern California home prices remained in a holding pattern last month while sales continued to decline, albeit at a slower pace, data released today showed.

The median price of all types of homes sold in October was $484,000, which was the same as in September, and 2.3% higher than a year ago, La Jolla-based research firm DataQuick Information Systems reported.

Meanwhile, sales in the six-county region fell 22.4% to 22,117, DataQuick said. It was the worst showing for an October in a decade, but the rate of decline was the slowest since July.

For much of this year, potential buyers have been hanging back, waiting to see if prices will decline. The result has been fewer sales and an upsurge in supply as more homes sit unsold for longer periods and new listings continue to come on the market.

What's more, homeowners who would like to move up or downsize are reluctant to put their homes up for sale, fearing they may not get the price they want.

"Buyers are taking their time, trying to wait out the uncertainty in a market that is rebalancing itself," said DataQuick President Marshall Prentice.

One region economists have been watching closely is San Diego County, where California's housing boom was launched six years ago and where it first started to fade. But in October, San Diego's home prices recovered some ground, rising nearly 2% to $485,000, compared to the month before. It was the first increase since March. Nonetheless, when compared to a year ago, the rate of appreciation in San Diego declined 5.5%, DataQuick said.

Southern California home-price gains have been decelerating for the last year. Year-over-year increases have been in the single digits for seven months and are expected to turn negative by the end of this year or early next year, DataQuick analysts said.

Indeed, the rate of the slowdown is starting to spread beyond San Diego. In Ventura County, home prices dipped 2.3% to $582,000. Sales fell 19.6% to 940.

In Orange County, the region's priciest market, the median price rose 3.1% to $625,000, which was the same median a month ago. Sales declined 24.9% to 2,715.

The Inland Empire counties of Riverside and San Bernardino, where prices were still rising by double-digits as recently as this spring, also showed marked slowing. In October, the median in Riverside rose 4.9% to $410,000, but was off its peak of $423,000 reached in September. Sales fell 24.2%.

San Bernardino's median price edged up 2.3% to $362,000 year over year, but was flat with the median price set last December. Sales declined 21.3%.

On Monday, DataQuick reported that Los Angeles County's median price rose 4.5% to $514,000 as sales dropped 21.8%.

Libel Lawsuit A $7 Million Win For Judge (CHIT)

By James Kimberly

Chicago Tribune, November 15, 2006

A Kane County jury Tuesday decided a small local newspaper should pay $7 million to the Illinois Supreme Court's chief justice for defaming him in two columns published three years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0094814

Justice Robert Thomas cried and hugged his attorneys as Judge Donald J. O'Brien read the verdict Tuesday afternoon. Thomas, 54, of Wheaton shook hands and embraced jurors leaving the wood-paneled courtroom in the historic courthouse in downtown Geneva.

"I thank God," Thomas told reporters. "I thank the jury for listening and paying attention. The truth prevailed."

The verdict was unusual, partly because of the amount awarded and partly because the plaintiff was a sitting judge, said Bruce D. Brown, an attorney who is representing the Boston Herald in its appeal of a $2 million libel judgment awarded last year to a Massachusetts state court judge.

"If you were to look at the range of libel judgments, it's certainly on the high end," Brown said.

The newspaper found to be at fault, the Kane County Chronicle, is a daily paper owned by the Shaw Newspaper Group. It circulates mostly in St. Charles, Geneva and Batavia. Its circulation is about 14,000, down from 38,000 in 2003.

Brown said the U.S. Supreme Court set the libel standard very high for public officials: A plaintiff must prove the newspaper knew it was publishing false information or had serious doubts about its veracity. "Public officials are often successful in the courtroom at creating sympathy for the situation they found themselves in, but because of the substantial constitutional protections enjoyed by the press, approximately 70 percent of those verdicts have been overturned," Brown said.

Attorney Stephen Rosenfeld, who defended the Chronicle and its former columnist, Bill Page, said the verdict would be challenged in post-trial motions and likely on appeal.

"I think it does have a chilling effect on the 1st Amendment and the press' ability to criticize public officials, especially elected officials," Rosenfeld said.

The appeal could raise a host of legal issues because all but two of the sitting Illinois Supreme Court justices testified during the two-week trial, Rosenfeld said.

Ex-columnist disappointed

Page, 58, a former restaurant owner-turned-freelance publicist and writer, said he was disappointed with the verdict.

"Obviously this has been an emotional time for everybody," said Page, who was a part-time contributor to the Chronicle until earlier this year, when he moved to Gainesville, Fla.

The columns at issue accused Thomas of injecting politics into a case before the Illinois Supreme Court.

Page testified that confidential sources told him that Thomas pushed for a severe punishment of former Kane County State's Atty. Meg Gorecki in a disciplinary case but backed off after local Republican leaders agreed to support a judicial candidate he favored in an upcoming election.

But Page never revealed the sources of his information, and at the trial the newspaper could not produce a single witness to support the accusations.

Ultimately, the Illinois Supreme Court suspended Gorecki's law license for four months because she left an answering machine message for a friend suggesting a county government job could be obtained in exchange for political donations to a county official. An investigation uncovered no evidence of a jobs-for-campaign donations scheme. Page wrote that Thomas was "out for blood" in the Gorecki case and pushed for a lengthy suspension or disbarment until local politicians supported his candidate.

Thomas said the columns were false and sued over two of them, contending his reputation had been damaged so severely that his future earning potential was diminished.

Thomas' attorney, Joseph Power, asked the jury to award Thomas $17 million.

"All they had to do was print some sort of retraction," Power said.

Jurors decided quickly

The jury sided with Thomas on every count. After the trial, several jurors told reporters that they quickly determined that the columns published May 20, 2003, and Nov. 25, 2003, were false and published with malice.

After four hours of deliberations Monday night, jurors spent 4½ hours Tuesday deciding how much money to award Thomas. They found he should receive $1 million for lost potential future earnings, $1 million for the public humiliation he suffered, and $5 million for the damage done to his professional and personal reputations.

"To have your integrity questioned in front of your family and the world, that was the most important part," said juror Ken Sotera, 46, of St. Charles.

Juror Kelly Groves, 26, of Aurora, said the jury blamed the Chronicle more than Pagebecause the newspaper should have done more to verify the information.

"We all understand and respect confidential sources," Groves said. "We just feel if they would have done a little work they should have been able to substantiate this without confidential sources."

Power said Page's actions helped him prove the case.

DOJ_NMG_0094815

Power introduced into evidence an e-mail that Page sent to a spokesman for the Illinois Supreme Court that warned of a "nightmare of bad publicity" for the court if Thomas were allowed to influence deliberations in the Gorecki case. Power said the e-mail was a threat. Page said it was an innocuous attempt to get someone from the court to speak with him about the case.

Jury Finds That Columnist Acted With Malice And Awards Judge $7 Million (NYT)

By Katharine Q. Seelye

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

GENEVA, Ill., Nov. 14 — In a case that media lawyers say has broad implications for press freedoms, a jury here found Tuesday that a newspaper columnist falsely wrote in 2003 that the chief justice of the Illinois State Supreme Court had traded his vote for a political favor, and had acted with malice.

The chief justice, Robert R. Thomas, brought the case against Bill Page, a former columnist for The Kane County Chronicle, a 14,000-circulation daily here, about 40 miles west of Chicago.

The jury awarded Justice Thomas $7 million, with $5 million for damaging his reputation, $1 million for future economic losses and $1 million for humiliation. It is the second-largest award in the county's history, after a $21 million medical malpractice award this year, said F. Keith Brown, a circuit judge here.

The justice's lawyers said that Mr. Page had essentially accused him of official misconduct, a felony, when he wrote that he had traded his vote on a disciplinary case in exchange for political support for his favored candidate in a local judicial race.

"This sends a message to renegade journalists that this conduct will not be tolerated," said Joseph A. Power Jr., a lawyer for Justice Thomas.

The jury deliberated for nine hours. Ken Sotern, 46, a juror and merchandising manager, said that the jury wanted to send a message to the news media "to a degree," but that its main concern was to try to restore Justice Thomas's reputation.

The newspaper's lawyers said they were handicapped because the trial judge did not allow them to argue that as a columnist, Mr. Page was not held to the standards of a reporter. They said Mr. Page accurately reported information from his unidentified sources.

The lawyers said the verdict would have a "chilling effect" on coverage of public officials and could embolden other judges to file suit, particularly since the award was high.

Steve Rosenfeld, part of the defense team, said the verdict would most likely be appealed. But he said it would be tricky because Mr. Thomas, 54, a former place-kicker for the Chicago Bears, oversaw all judges, including the trial judge, Donald J. O'Brien Jr., who was brought in from Cook County, and the State Supreme Court justices, most of whom took the stand on his behalf.

The case was also significant because it prompted an appellate court to establish a judicial privilege in Illinois, allowing deliberations to be kept private, much like doctor-patient discussions.

Newspapers are sued frequently, but it is unusual for a judge to sue a newspaper. Of 397 complaints filed against the news media last year, judges and magistrates brought 25 of them, or 6 percent, according to the Media Law Resource Center.

Sandra Baron, executive director of the center, said it was not clear if such cases were increasing, but she said the verdict made the press more vulnerable while it is under attack "from almost every aspect of society" and the industry is in some economic turmoil.

"In the short run it looks as if the judge has vindicated his reputation," Ms. Baron said. "But in the long run, society will pay for his vindication when the media is reluctant to criticize those in high office in the wake of lengthy, bitter, expensive trials."

It is peculiar for a judge sue a newspaper, said Cameron Stracher, a co-director of the law and journalism program at New York University Law School, because judges are supposed to protect free speech.

"The courts were the last protector," Mr. Stracher said, "and now even the courts are suing."

The Kane County Chronicle's lawyers said that when a state's highest-ranking judge brought the case, he could wield as much influence as if he were sitting on the bench. Steven P. Mandell, a defense lawyer, said that most of the witnesses were beholden to the justice and that the defense had trouble getting witnesses and experts.

Jurors said that Justice Thomas's status made the case somewhat difficult but that they put it aside. "He's a guy just like anyone else," said one juror, Kelly Groves, 26, who deals with worker compensation claims.

Justice Thomas's lawyers said it was important for judges to be able to answer their critics. They said they understood that the suit would bring Mr. Page's columns to the attention of far more people than had seen them originally.

Mr. Power said the accusation of a felony damaged Mr. Thomas's reputation and could impede him in trying to join a prestigious law firm or being appointed to the United States Supreme Court. He said that though few people had seen the original columns, they could be converted into attack advertisements by anyone out to get Justice Thomas.

DOJ_NMG_0094816

Jurors said they were not bothered that Mr. Page used unidentified sources, but wished there had been some confirmation of what they said. Without that, and without seeking a response from the justice before publication, the jurors said, the newspaper appeared to act recklessly.

Rick Shaw, 50, a juror and an engineering manager, said of the charges of vote-trading, "We were O.K. with confidential sources, but if it was so widespread, someone should have confirmed the facts."

Wal-Mart Sued Over Food Labels (WP)

By Ylan Q. Mui, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

An activist group representing small farmers has filed a complaint with the U.S. Department of Agriculture, alleging that Wal-Mart Stores Inc. incorrectly labeled several products as organic.

The retailer recently began expanding its assortment of organic foods as part of an effort to attract wealthier, more urban customers. In a statement yesterday, Wal-Mart defended its program and questioned the intentions of the group, called the Cornucopia Institute.

In an e-mail, Wal-Mart spokeswoman Karen A. Burk wrote "it's hard to take their claims seriously" and said one of the group's founders, Mark Kastel, had worked for a Wal-Mart rival. Kastel was a consultant for Organic Valley, a national farming cooperative that competes with several of Wal-Mart's suppliers. Kastel said he has severed professional ties with the co-op, though he declined to comment on whether it donated money to Cornucopia.

In its letter to the National Organic Program, an arm of the USDA, Cornucopia said that at several stores, Wal-Mart had incorrectly labeled Stonyfield Farm all-natural yogurt as organic. It also said several stores had included non-organic products such as tofu, egg-roll wrappers and juice in a cooler designated for organic produce.

"We were actually surprised to find these labeling errors and surprised to find them across the board," Kastel said.

Burner Concedes; Conn. Count Near End (RC)

By Nicole Duran

Roll Call, November 15, 2006

Political neophyte Darcy Burner (D), who came closer to knocking off first-term Rep. Dave Reichert (R-Wash.) than most political analysts anticipated, conceded to the former King County sheriff on Tuesday.

Her decision left nine House races — including the tantalizingly tight 2nd district in Connecticut — still officially unresolved one week after Election Day.

Burner, a former Microsoft manager, called Reichert on Monday night to congratulate him on a hard-fought campaign in the Evergreen State's 8th district. During a news conference Tuesday she made it clear that she would not seek a recount or challenge the 51 percent-to-49 percent result, even though some 20,000 absentee ballots have not been counted yet.

Burner did say that her campaign will continue to monitor the vote-counting process, however, leaving open the extremely unlikely possibility that Reichert's lead could eventually shrink enough to trigger an automatic recount under state law.

The victor must win by fewer than 2,000 votes and the difference between the two candidates' totals must be less than one half of 1 percent to trigger a recount.

Reichert's lead extended to 4,727 votes as of Tuesday.

"Darcy Burner really ran the kind of campaign that inspires supporters and leaves a lasting impression with voters in the district," said Kate Bedingfield, a spokeswoman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

Meanwhile, the results of the much-closer contest in Connecticut's 2nd district should be known this morning.

Former state Rep. Joe Courtney (D) clung to a 90-vote lead over Rep. Rob Simmons (R-Conn.) early Tuesday evening.

Courtney's 167-vote lead on Election Day was narrow enough to trigger an automatic recount. All of the 65 towns in the district were expected to finish re-checking their tallies late Tuesday night. At press time, five towns had yet to finish their recounts.

Courtney's lead has gone up and down since the recount began, at one point shrinking to just 66 votes.

Both candidates have until Nov. 21 to petition the Connecticut Supreme Court for a second recount, the cost of which would be born by the candidate who requests it.

Simmons has not said what he will do if he comes up short again this morning.

Courtney declared victory last week and came to Washington, D.C., this week for freshman orientation.

Simmons has not conceded.

In Florida, which is once again home to the most controversial outcome of a federal election, a Sarasota circuit court judge on Tuesday granted Democrat Christine Jennings' request to impound electronic voting machines used in Sarasota County.

DOJ_NMG_0094817

In the open-seat contest to succeed Rep. Katherine Harris (R) in the Sunshine State's 13th district, Sarasota County produced an unusually high number of "undervotes" — ballots that leave some races blank. More than 18,000 ballots did not record a preference in the matchup featuring Jennings, a bank executive and Vern Buchanan (R), a car dealer. Jennings and many voters blame new touch-screen voting machines for the discrepancy.

Preliminary results had Buchanan edging out Jennings by 373 votes, a margin small enough to trigger an automatic recount.

The recount got under way Monday. The undervote problem prompted a state audit and has caused two watchdog groups to call for a new election in the district.

The state audit was set to begin today, but the judge's decision delays it until at least Thursday, giving all concerned parties time to reach an agreement on the process for the audit.

Jennings' decision to go to court shows that her campaign does not trust local or state officials, including the secretary of state. That distrust could stem from the disputed 2000 presidential election and then-Florida Secretary of State Harris' role in it.

Jennings has not conceded, and both she and Buchanan were on Capitol Hill this week for freshman orientation.

In North Carolina's 8th district, teacher Larry Kissell (D) is ready to ask for a recount in his close contest with Rep. Robin Hayes (R).

More than 1,400 provisional ballots should be counted by Friday. In a news release Tuesday, Kissell said a recount is "inevitable" and that he is ready to demand a "hand-eye" recount to challenge the results that currently show Hayes leading by 462 votes.

Kissell also has not conceded.

Other races that remain officially unresolved — though their results are unlikely to change — are in Georgia's 8th and 12th districts, New Mexico's 1st district, Ohio's 2nd and 15th districts and Wyoming's At-Large seat. Democratic incumbents lead in the two Georgia districts, while GOP incumbents are ahead in the other states.

Signs Of Democratic Takeover Were Hard To Miss (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - Karl Rove must read polls through red-colored glasses.

That might explain why two weeks before Election Day he snapped at a reporter who dared suggest that he saw trouble in the polls for the Republicans.

"I'm looking at 68 polls a week," Rove, the president's political strategist, chided a National Public Radio reporter. "You may be looking at four or five public polls a week that talk about attitudes nationally but that do not impact the outcome of individual races.

"I'm looking at all of these . . . and adding them up. I add up to a Republican Senate and Republican House . . .You are entitled to your math and I'm entitled to THE math."

Well, Rove was wrong. His math wasn't THE math. Maybe it was what George W. Bush once called "fuzzy math."

For the rest of us, the numbers had been adding up for more than a year.

Take, for example, McClatchy's reporting as early as May 2005 that the tide had turned against Republicans, that congressional scandals, violence in Iraq and Republican overreaching were creating a toxic political environment like the one that shadowed the Democrats in 1993 - the year before they were swept from power.

Or our October 2005 analysis that Republicans feared a wave of anger like the 1994 tsunami that washed the Democrats away. "It's worse today," Republican strategist Frank Luntz said then.

Or reporting from around the country last March that revealed a dispirited Republican base, frustrated and angry over federal spending and illegal immigration.

Then came McClatchy-MSNBC polling of key Senate races this fall, conducted by the respected Mason-Dixon Polling & Research, Inc. While Rove was right that many media polls surveyed the entire country - and missed on-the-ground differences - he seemed to ignore the work by Mason-Dixon, which specializes in state-by-state research.

Our first poll, released Oct. 2, found that Democrats were in position to gain six seats and win control of the Senate. Democrats did not trail in any battleground state; Republicans did not lead in any. Many analysts by then were writing that Democrats might take control of the House of Representatives, but most called the Senate out of reach.

Our second series of polls, released Oct. 24, found Republicans holding narrow leads in Tennessee and Virginia and close in Missouri - suggesting a Southern battleground would decide Senate control.

Our final wave of polls, released Nov. 5, showed a close contest for the Senate, with Republicans gaining in two overlooked states, Montana and Rhode Island, and pulling away to a 12-point lead in Tennessee.

DOJ_NMG_0094818

Some readers didn't like that. One compared me to Nazis. Another suggested I should die. None argued with the numbers, just the writer. But the analysis focused on the newest information - growing Republican chances to hold two states widely written off as lost.

Our partner, MSNBC, went farther. Its headline: "Polls: GOP looks likely to keep Senate control."

Our final polls came very close to what happened on Election Day. Eleven of our 12 state-poll results were within the margin of error, which was plus or minus 4 percentage points. That means you can add or subtract the four points for either candidate, for a total possible swing range of eight points. Most of our polls were much more on target than that.

In Arizona, we showed the Republican up by 8 percentage points; he won by 9.

In Maryland, we showed a 3-point lead for the Democrat. He won by 11 points, exactly at the outside edge of our poll's margin of error.

In Missouri, we showed a 1-point lead for the Democrat. She won by 1 point.

In Montana, we showed a tie. The Democrat won by 1 point.

In New Jersey, we showed 7-point lead for the Democrat. He won by 8.

In Ohio, we had the Democrat ahead by 6; he won by 12.

In Pennsylvania, we had the Democrat up by 13; he won by 18.

In Rhode Island, we had the Republican up by 1 point; the Democrat won by 6.

In Tennessee, we had the Republican up by 12; he won by 3 - or 1 point outside the margin of error.

In Virginia, we had the Democrat up by 1; he won by less than 1 percentage point.

In Michigan, we had the Democrat with a 16-point lead; she won by 16.

In Washington, we had the Democrat with a 16-point lead; she won by 19.

"We did pretty good," said Mason-Dixon pollster Brad Coker. "The only two states that anybody would call into question would be Rhode Island and Tennessee. That had lot to do with the timing."

He said both polls found a bump in Republican support after Democratic Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts suggested that U.S. soldiers in Iraq are uneducated. That bump had disappeared by Election Day, and with it the Republicans' last chance to keep the Senate and prove Rove right.

Conservatives In Denial (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

On their journey through the stages of grief, conservatives don't yet seem to have gotten past denial.

Republicans may have lost, conservatives argue, but only because they misplaced their ideology. "[T]hey were punished not for pursuing but for forgetting conservatism," George F. Will, conservatism's most trenchant champion, wrote on this page last week.

Their mortal sin, in this gospel, was their abandonment of fiscal prudence.

They doffed their green eyeshades and gushed red ink. "The greatest scandal in Washington, D.C., is runaway federal spending," said Indiana Rep. Mike Pence, the true-blue conservative who is challenging Ohio's John Boehner for the post of House Republican leader.

Holding conservatism blameless for last week's Republican debacle may stiffen conservative spines, but the very idea is the product of mushy conservative brains unwilling to acknowledge the obvious: that conservatism has never been more ascendant than during George Bush's presidency; that the Republican Party over the past six years moved well to the right of the American people on social, economic and foreign policy; and that on Nov. 7 the American people chose a more pragmatic course.

After all, it wasn't just the president's war that was driven by right-wing ideologues. Particularly in the past two years, Republican economics, too, was shaped by ideology. The president's proposal to privatize Social Security was the brainchild of right-wing think tanks and the financial institutions that yearned to sell all those annuities. It never penciled out, and all sober analysis concluded that its chief effect would be to imperil retirement security itself. By nonetheless making it the signature domestic issue of his second term, George Bush again stamped himself a true believer and as indifferent in economic policy as he was in foreign policy to such vulgar trivialities as facts.

Of course, one way conservatives defend the faith is to argue that the conservatism of contemporary Republicanism isn't really conservatism at all. The invasion of Iraq, in this telling, was the handiwork of Wilsonian interlopers who had strayed unaccountably into Republican ranks one night when the barn door was left ajar. But in fact the invasion of Iraq and the doctrine of preventive war have a sterling conservative pedigree; they were handed down from the right-wingers in the early years of the Cold War who rejected the strategy of containing communism and argued instead for rolling it back (an idea that Dwight Eisenhower considered sheer madness).

As well, conservatives at both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue saw the war in Iraq as a way to gain a political advantage over the Democrats, who had backed the war in Afghanistan but who could be pilloried as appeasers for failing to grasp the need to roll into Baghdad. To argue that Iraq was not the conservatives' war requires expunging every congressional vote, administration speech and talk show rant of the past four years.

Besides, when Americans think of isms, they think -- at least they think first -- of how liberals and conservatives stand on social issues. A liberal backs abortion rights and gun regulations; a conservative wants to ban abortions and legalize all guns. By that measure, what has defined conservatism in the popular mind over the past couple of years has been its willingness to enlist government to block stem cell research, stop the teaching of evolution and supersede the duties of Terri Schiavo's husband.

This may be a conservatism that makes libertarians cringe, but it is the conservatism that dominates the Republican Party we have. Republicans generally and conservatives particularly have profited mightily from the rise and politicization of fundamentalism over the past few decades. The decimation of Republican moderates from the Northeast and Midwest in last week's elections came at the hands of centrist and independent voters who'd had it with the Southernized religious conservatism of the Republicans' base -- and with its moderate Republican enablers.

Finally, conservatives argue that the newly elected Democrats are really conservatives, too -- proof that the ideology is in no need of a tuneup. It's true that some of the Democrats take conservative positions on guns and abortion. But it's also true that virtually all the new Democrats look askance at free trade, want to raise the minimum wage and back a bigger role for government in making health care more affordable.

At a time when corporations abandon their employee benefits, globalization depresses wages, and individuals are compelled to shoulder more and more risk, the last thing Americans need is a government that tells them -- as it told their countrymen in New Orleans last year -- they're on their own.

That's why Republicans just ran a campaign devoid of new ideas. In a laissez-faire world that already induces anxiety and that becomes more laissez-faire with each passing day, who needs a laissez-faire party? Conservative, heal thyself.

Election Signals Decline Of Old School Liberalism (USAT)

By Kirsten Powers, By

USA Today, November 15, 2006

It's more glacial shift than radical revolution, but change is afoot in the Democratic Party.

In a low point in Democratic Party history, Pennsylvania Gov. Bob Casey was banned from speaking at the 1992 Democratic Convention for being opposed to abortion rights. This year, his son, Bob Casey Jr., who holds the same views, was actively recruited by that same Democratic Party and unseated Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa.

This was a welcome move in a party that is home to vocal and organized far-left activists and bloggers who have grown increasingly shrill and threatening toward moderate and conservative Democrats. They also have excoriated former president Bill Clinton's brand of centrist politics. They argue for “party discipline,” best exemplified by their jihad against Connecticut's Sen. Joe Lieberman for deviating from the party line on the Iraq war. During the past election for Democratic National Committee chair, delegates booed former congressman Tim Roemer of Indiana because he, too, opposes abortion rights.

Yet, without centrist Democratic candidates, it would have been President Bush and GOP strategist Karl Rove celebrating last week. More than half of the new House members will join the New Democrat Coalition or the Blue Dog Coalition caucuses, known for their fiscal responsibility, business-friendly stance and generally more socially conservative views. While most criticized the war, few have called for an immediate withdrawal.

In addition to running fiscally responsible candidates, the Democratic Party appealed to the vital center by slaying a few of old school liberalism's sacred cows: aggressive secularism and intolerance of anti-abortion views. Yes, the war was a major issue. But it was critical that Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois and Sen. Charles Schumer of New York — who ran the campaign committees — recruited candidates palatable to conservative or moderate voters who wanted to send a message about the war, but who didn't want to compromise on beliefs about abortion, gay marriage or the role of religion in public life.

Earlier this year, Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., found himself on the receiving end of left-wing rage when he urged the party to be more open to people of faith and their views. He was on to something. Many successful Democratic candidates spoke about their faith.

In North Carolina, Democrat Heath Shuler ran as a born-again Christian who opposes abortion. Pro-gun Brad Ellsworth, who opposes abortion and favors an amendment banning gay marriage, will be a new representative from red-state Indiana. Rep. Ted Strickland, a United Methodist minister, became the first Democrat to win as governor in Ohio in 20 years.

The liberal evangelical minister Jim Wallis, who counsels Democrats, characterized these elections — perhaps too optimistically — as the end of not just the religious right's power but also of the secular left's political dominance.

For years, Democrats have quietly won governorships and statehouses in red and purple states by running candidates who shared the values of voters in their state, not the beliefs of the coastal intelligentsia. It turns out even in blue states, voters like centrist politics. After liberal anti-war candidate Ned Lamont's primary defeat of Lieberman, left-wing activists and bloggers declared ideological victory and bragged that they had forced Lieberman out of the party for not being a "real Democrat."

Eli Pariser, executive director of left-wing MoveOn.org, penned a premature eulogy for centrist politics in The Washington Post, ridiculing the "perennial pundit nattering about moving the party too far to the left." A few months later, centrist Lieberman beat Pariser's liberal candidate in one of the bluest states in the country — and centrist and conservative Democrats helped usher in a Democratic Congress.

Kirsten Powers was a political appointee in the Clinton administration; she now writes the blog www.Powers-Point.com.

What's Right With Kansas (NYT)

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

It would be remiss to finish the election post-mortems without noting a major shift in the nation's heartland. Kansas — lately considered the reddest of red states — emerged from the election as a bastion of moderation.

Just two years after President Bush carried the state by 25 percentage points, Kansas voters rebelled against continued domination of the state's politics by the sharply conservative state Republican Party. The Democratic Party posted major gains, including some by former Republicans who switched parties.

The moderate Democratic governor, Kathleen Sebelius, received a whopping 58 percent of the vote to secure her re-election. Three moderate Republicans holding statewide jobs also won easy re-election, two of them after beating back conservative challengers in the primary. And two of the four people elected to the House of Representatives were Democrats, a result that would have seemed inconceivable not too long ago.

Victories by moderate Democrats and Republicans ended conservative control of the Kansas State Board of Education, which tried to replace evolution with creationism in public school classrooms.

And for us, one of the most satisfying results was the resounding defeat of Attorney General Phill Kline, an anti-abortion zealot who gained national notoriety by misusing his office to further his ideology. He tried to force health care workers to file reports on the sexual activity of teens, and to seize women's confidential medical records. That gross assault on privacy and legal rights was a major issue in the campaign. The 58-to-42 landslide that elected a former Republican, Paul Morrison, was a victory for moderation and the rule of law.

Help Wanted: Democrats (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- When cable news channels projected that Democrats would win control of the House, the crowd roared at the party's official election-night party here.

California Rep. Nancy Pelosi was introduced as the first female speaker of the House. Mrs. Pelosi, in turn, drew an ovation when she referred to Nevada Democratic Sen. Harry Reid as the next Senate majority leader, even though it would take another day for the election results to become known.

Another winner that night was David Bolger, who exchanged high-fives with other Democrats, as the crowd applauded the party leaders. Mr. Bolger isn't a lawmaker or a congressional aide. He is a Democratic lobbyist.

After more than a decade of Republican rule in Washington, Democratic lobbyists have a lot to celebrate. Just a week after Election Day, they are getting promotions and signing up new clients.

When Republicans took over Congress in 1994, most lobbyists were Democrats. Although the power shift would ultimately have resulted in increased numbers of Republican lobbyists, the party leadership set out to accelerate the process. Republicans pressured corporations and lobbying firms to hire Republicans, and Republican lawmakers, such as former Rep. Tom DeLay of Texas, told businesses that he would speak only with Republican lobbyists. Mr. DeLay was instrumental in a strategy called the K Street Project, which pressured corporations to hire hundreds of Republican lobbyists.

Five years ago, Mr. Bolger was a victim of the K Street Project. After the 2000 election, the trade group where Mr. Bolger worked in the communications office, the U.S. Telecom Association, replaced its president, Democrat Roy Neel. Mr. Bolger lost his job in the change.

DOJ_NMG_0094821

Now Democrats like Mr. Bolger, 44 years old, expect opportunities to pick up, as their effectiveness is likely to rise on Capitol Hill. The benefits from the change in the congressional majority will take months for Democratic lobbyists to chart. But already there are indications that ties to Democratic lawmakers are a valuable currency among those whose work will include lobbying the 110th Congress.

On Election Day, private-equity firm Svoboda, Collins LLC, Chicago, announced that it had purchased a majority stake in Washington's largest all-Democratic lobbying and public-relations firms, the Glover Park Group, which posts annual revenue of more than $30 million. Both firms declined to disclose the size of the investment.

"Suddenly, people are taking a fresh look at us," says Michael Feldman, a Glover Park partner and a White House aide in the Clinton administration. Other partners include Carter Eskew, chief strategist for Al Gore's presidential campaign; Joe Lockhart, a White House spokesman for President Clinton; and Howard Wolfson, a top adviser to Sen. Hillary Clinton (D., N.Y.).

Another Democratic lobbyist, John Raffaelli, decided to leave the firm he established years ago, the Washington Group, and start a new one. "This is a unique opportunity for Democrats to open up new ventures because for many years, particularly with the K Street Project, it was very difficult for Democratic lobbyists to operate."

Two years ago, Democrat Julie Domenick left her post as chief lobbyist for the Investment Company Institute, the mutual-fund trade association, after reports that congressional Republicans pressured the industry to replace her with a Republican. She moved to the lobbying firm founded by former Republican Rep. Tom Loeffler of Texas, where she represents the mutual-fund industry. With Democrats back in control, Ms. Domenick now is in discussions with the lobbying firm about taking a higher profile role.

Ms. Domenick says that it should "become abundantly clear that companies will now need people with impeccable Democratic credentials, who have strong relationships with the new Democratic majority...and that means Democrats, especially those who supported the party during its long decade of dark days."

Paul Equale, a Democrat, says he was pushed out of his job as the top lobbyist for the Independent Insurance Agents of America and replaced by a Republican in 2001. Since then, Mr. Equale has run a small consulting firm advising financial-services firms on how to deal with Washington.

Now, Mr. Equale says, he is seeing the benefits of the Democrats' return to power. "It's the functional equivalent of flirting. People call and find out if I have the availability to go out on a date," he says. "Just like dating, there will be a number of relationships that deepen."

Democratic lobbyists say they don't plan retribution against the Republicans who pushed them out of jobs. But they predict that some companies that hired many Republicans will now hire Democrats to balance their lobbying teams.

"A lot of people got spooked by Tom DeLay and hired a lot of Republicans and those people are going to have the hardest time," says Steve Elmendorf, a Democratic lobbyist who is close to Mrs. Pelosi.

Democratic lobbyists may find their own set of problems. Mrs. Pelosi and Mr. Reid won control of Congress in part by campaigning against a "culture of corruption" in Washington and by highlighting the close ties between some Republicans and corporate lobbyists. Now, the newly empowered Democratic leaders on Capitol Hill promise to approve legislation early next year that will tighten restrictions on lobbyists. "The lobby reforms are going to give some people on the Democratic side a little heartburn," Mr. Equale says.

For now, Democrats like Mr. Bolger are still savoring their Election Day victory. Mr. Bolger, who served in the Clinton administration as a spokesman for the Federal Railroad Administration, joined the trade association for the local phone industry in the late 1990s.

When he lost his job in 2001, the U.S. Telecom Association gave him a six-month severance package. In January 2002, he landed a job in the Washington office of United Parcel Service Inc., where he is a lobbyist and spokesman. Mr. Bolger has continued to donate to Democratic candidates for Congress and in the 2004 presidential election he took a leave of absence to work for the campaign of Sen. John Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat.

Mr. Bolger, who plans to remain at UPS, says, "What has changed just in the last week is that there are greater opportunities for people who have worked on the Democratic side. It's a unique opportunity that Democrats haven't seen in 12 years."

As Guard Changes In Congress, Lobbyists Scramble (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 14 — Republicans do not cede control of Congress for nearly two months, but money, power and influence are already beginning to change hands. The political economy, at least here in the capital, is humming for Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0094822

Democratic lobbyists are fielding calls from pharmaceutical companies, the oil and gas industry and military companies, all of which had grown accustomed to patronizing Republicans, as the environment in Washington abruptly shifts.

Take, for example, Vic Fazio, a California Democrat who rose through the ranks of Congress and reveled in the majority for all but 4 of his 20 years in office. In his second career as a lobbyist, Mr. Fazio did not experience the pleasures of Democratic rule — until now. Suddenly he is in demand.

For Mr. Fazio, who is close to Representative Nancy Pelosi, the California Democrat who is set to become House speaker, the power switch is, quite simply, good for business. Companies are scrambling to fortify lobbying teams with well-connected Democrats.

While Mr. Fazio declined to divulge his still-evolving list of prospective new clients at the law firm Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, he said he intended to bring in Democratic reinforcements to cover the load. "I'll just have more to do and have a little more help to do it," he said.

The Republican Party lost its grip on Congress and is now bracing to lose its hold over K Street, the bustling corridor that has become synonymous with the lobbying industry. The so-called K Street Project, an effort engineered by Republicans to dominate the trade, is unraveling, and Democrats say they intend to pass sweeping reforms rather than reverse the project for their benefit.

Democrats say the changing of the guard provides a raft of opportunities, second only to winning the presidency.

Former members of Congress who left Washington have placed confidential calls to headhunters, wondering whether firms are hiring. (They are.) Former staff members have fielded inquiries from lobbying shops that have an urgent need for people with current contacts and old relationships with Democratic leaders. One prominent lobbyist said a former Senate aide was offered a starting salary of $500,000.

Though this is the moment Democrats have been craving — winning a majority so they can help shape politics and policy — some senior aides are now tempted to leave Capitol Hill to become lobbyists and potentially quadruple their salaries. At the same time, some Republicans began receiving materials on unemployment benefits this week as the party sheds thousands of jobs, relinquishing staff committee assignments and leadership posts in both chambers for the first time in 12 years.

"If you're a Democrat, it's a good time to be looking for work," said David Urban, a Republican who is the managing director of American Continental Group, a bipartisan lobbying firm. "For Republicans, there is a little bit of panic that sets in when people realize they have to move out of their office into a cubicle."

At the offices of Tongour Simpson Holsclaw, a Republican firm, an unusual number of Democrats have been calling in recent days. The phones began ringing after the company's founder was quoted in Roll Call, a Capitol Hill newspaper, saying it was "a seller's market for Democratic staffers." It was, said Mike Tongour, as though he had placed a giant help-wanted ad.

"Several Democrats said, 'I hear you are interested in expanding your firm,' " Mr. Tongour said, recalling his post-election conversations with several senior Democratic aides. "You got the sense that they are going to be asking for premiums."

Even though most firms are bipartisan, the shift in the balance of power has resulted in a shift of responsibilities between Republicans and Democrats.

"I've told my Democratic partners it's time for them to buy some suits," said Wayne Berman, a well connected Republican lobbyist. "I went out and bought two new fishing rods and looked into yoga classes."

He was joking, sort of.

Even before Election Day, the pharmaceutical industry hired Democrats to bolster its public relations efforts, hoping to ease the blow if Republicans lost their majority and Democrats followed through on pledges to let the government negotiate prescription drug prices.

"You literally have to create war games to plan for worst-case scenarios," said Ken Johnson, the vice president for government affairs at the leading trade association for drug companies. "We've got a lot of friends on the Democratic side, but clearly we need some more."

Acquiring those friends, however, may not be easy.

Steve Elmendorf, a longtime senior adviser to former Representative Richard A. Gephardt who began working as a lobbyist at Bryan Cave Strategies in 2005, said Democrats in the House and the Senate would operate differently.

"The Republicans' view of lobbying is we give people money, we buy them lunch and then go up and tell them what to do," said Mr. Elmendorf, whose client roster included Shell Oil and Ford before the election and has grown since then. "We go in and make public policy arguments. The business community is going to have to reorient their view."

As Democrats prepare for January, implications of a change in power extend across Washington.

Lawyers say they expect their business to increase if House Democrats follow through on their pledge to investigate the Bush administration. Real estate agents paid careful attention to the election results, too, sending welcome packets to newly elected Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0094823

"Because both the House and the Senate went to the Democrats, there will be a new wave and new energy," said Michael Rankin, managing partner of the Washington office of Sotheby's International Realty. "A lot of people from around the country will be coming to Washington."

Ivan Adler, who oversees lobbyist headhunting in the Washington office of the McCormick Group, an executive search firm, said he had received calls from former members of Congress and others outside Washington "inquiring what the job market is like in the new Democratic world." Mr. Adler declined to name them, citing confidentiality requirements, but he conceded that not all would make good lobbyists.

"They are all popcorn in the pan — some pop and some don't," Mr. Adler said. "Hopefully you pick ones that would pop."

Though the supply and demand of lobbyists is shifting, well-connected Republicans have hardly been put out of work, particularly given the narrow majority in the Senate. Many lobbying firms, recoiling from a year of controversy and scandal, sell continuity as the most valued asset.

"As we move into a new Congress, people are wiser and they learn to distrust quick fixes," said Nick Allard, a Democratic lobbyist at Patton Boggs, the city's largest firm. "That's one reason why the lobbying scandal fell apart like a political Ponzi scheme: it oversold the notion of political access."

Two days after the election, when it first became clear that the levers of power were shifting, a team of lobbyists at Patton Boggs prepared an analysis of what its clients could expect from a Democratic takeover.

To place the change of power in perspective and to lighten the mood, they opened with the timeless tale from Dr. Seuss: "If I ran the zoo."

Despite Big Win, Dems' Message Control Still Needs Fine-tuning (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, November 15, 2006

Asked on NBC's "Meet the Press" on Sunday what the American public was trying to tell Republicans in last week's election, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said he believed the message was: "That we came to Washington to change government, and government changed us."

If those words sound familiar, it's because they might as well have been read straight off a Democratic talking-points memo. McCain's choice of words was a near-verbatim pull from a slogan Democrats have been using for more than a year.

The phrase has long been a favorite of Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) and also was used by the campaign of Ohio 1st District Democratic challenger John Cranley.

When a politician repeats an opponent's slogans, that's supposedly a positive sign for the opponent, an indication that the phrase has made its way into the political lexicon. But experts say Democrats made only marginal progress this cycle on their much-hyped goals of improving their message control and employing more effective language.

After the 2004 election, Democrats turned to University of California-Berkeley linguistics professor George Lakoff, whose guidance they hoped would help them frame messages better and elicit more favorable responses from the American public, much as Republicans did in 1994 with their Contract with America.

Yet even after the Democratic victories last Tuesday, Lakoff said Democrats are making fewer mistakes but still have yet to articulate a vision of what it means to be a Democrat, something they need to establish soon in preparation for 2008.

"The conservatives came in in 1994 with an understanding of who they were and what they were about and what their long-term vision was, and that's not happening here," Lakoff said, adding that individual Democratic candidates such as Montana Sen.-elect Jon Tester and North Carolina Rep.-elect Heath Shuler are exceptions.

"It's not just a one-liner; it's not just a slogan. There's a set of principles, there's an idea about the moral mission of a Democrat … that has to be put out there."

Lakoff and others agree that the Republicans' onetime strength in the messaging department fell apart this election, most notably when Democrats used President Bush's "stay the course" mantra against him. Eventually, even Bush, who had used it for years, disavowed the phrase.

But whatever Republicans lost in this arena was almost exclusively a result of their own doing and the political realities that have emerged on issues like the war in Iraq, as opposed to Democratic progress on the message front, said Geoffrey Nunberg, a professor at Berkeley's School of Information and author of "Talking Right," a book about the Republicans' linguistic dominance.

Nunberg said Democrats basically didn't use language at all, instead simply recycling slogans that restated a "throw the bums out" theme. The results were slogans such as "Together, America Can Do Better," "A New Direction for America," and "Had Enough?"

Republicans, meanwhile, have tried for the last few years to float too many slogans about the war on terror, and "stay the course" fell flat because of the ongoing death tolls in Iraq, not Democrats' strategic successes, he said.

Democrats did succeed in one major way: They made it clear they weren't Republicans, Nunberg said, but that isn't likely to work in 2008.

"It was the most successful exercise in negative self-identification since 7UP billed itself as the Un-cola," Nunberg said. "And, at the same time, the linguistic machine of the Republicans had the ultimate unraveling."

"The more pithy and memorable [the slogans] were, the more they come back to haunt Republicans when it turns out that language doesn't correspond to reality," he continued. "You can't keep doing that."

Emanuel echoed Nunberg the day after the election when talking about the Democrats' national security strategy. He said Republican phrases like "they stand up, we stand down" and "cut and run" weren't working and showed the American public that Republicans had slogans instead of strategies.

The DCCC chairman also said Republicans' bid to associate Democratic challengers in conservative districts with soon-to-be House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) failed. The Democrats won in four districts where the Republicans ran ads invoking Pelosi and trumpeting her "San Francisco values," by which they meant extreme liberalism.

Emanuel praised Democrats' efforts to attach the adjective "rubberstamp" to many Republicans who were too closely aligned with Bush.

"It became a national identity for the Republican Party and the Republican Congress," Emanuel said. "And they paid a price for their blind loyalty to the president."

Nunberg said the "rubberstamp" strategy was another example of something that worked because of the current environment but can't be counted on in the next election.

"None of that's operative in 2008," he said. "I don't think any of that stuff is going to matter much from here on in."

American Workers Have A Chance To Be Heard (WSJ)

By Jim Webb

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

The most important -- and unfortunately the least debated -- issue in politics today is our society's steady drift toward a class-based system, the likes of which we have not seen since the 19th century. America's top tier has grown infinitely richer and more removed over the past 25 years. It is not unfair to say that they are literally living in a different country. Few among them send their children to public schools; fewer still send their loved ones to fight our wars. They own most of our stocks, making the stock market an unreliable indicator of the economic health of working people. The top 1% now takes in an astounding 16% of national income, up from 8% in 1980. The tax codes protect them, just as they protect corporate America, through a vast system of loopholes.

Incestuous corporate boards regularly approve compensation packages for chief executives and others that are out of logic's range. As this newspaper has reported, the average CEO of a sizeable corporation makes more than $10 million a year, while the minimum wage for workers amounts to about $10,000 a year, and has not been raised in nearly a decade. When I graduated from college in the 1960s, the average CEO made 20 times what the average worker made. Today, that CEO makes 400 times as much.

In the age of globalization and outsourcing, and with a vast underground labor pool from illegal immigration, the average American worker is seeing a different life and a troubling future. Trickle-down economics didn't happen. Despite the vaunted all-time highs of the stock market, wages and salaries are at all-time lows as a percentage of the national wealth. At the same time, medical costs have risen 73% in the last six years alone. Half of that increase comes from wage-earners' pockets rather than from insurance, and 47 million Americans have no medical insurance at all.

Manufacturing jobs are disappearing. Many earned pension programs have collapsed in the wake of corporate "reorganization." And workers' ability to negotiate their futures has been eviscerated by the twin threats of modern corporate America: If they complain too loudly, their jobs might either be outsourced overseas or given to illegal immigrants.

This ever-widening divide is too often ignored or downplayed by its beneficiaries. A sense of entitlement has set in among elites, bordering on hubris. When I raised this issue with corporate leaders during the recent political campaign, I was met repeatedly with denials, and, from some, an overt lack of concern for those who are falling behind. A troubling arrogance is in the air among the nation's most fortunate. Some shrug off large-scale economic and social dislocations as the inevitable byproducts of the "rough road of capitalism." Others claim that it's the fault of the worker or the public education system, that the average American is simply not up to the international challenge, that our education system fails us, or that our workers have become spoiled by old notions of corporate paternalism.

Still others have gone so far as to argue that these divisions are the natural results of a competitive society. Furthermore, an unspoken insinuation seems to be inundating our national debate: Certain immigrant groups have the "right genetics" and thus are natural entrants to the "overclass," while others, as well as those who come from stock that has been here for 200 years and have not made it to the top, simply don't possess the necessary attributes.

Most Americans reject such notions. But the true challenge is for everyone to understand that the current economic divisions in society are harmful to our future. It should be the first order of business for the new Congress to begin addressing these divisions, and to work to bring true fairness back to economic life. Workers already understand this, as they see stagnant wages and disappearing jobs.

America's elites need to understand this reality in terms of their own self-interest. A recent survey in the Economist warned that globalization was affecting the U.S. differently than other "First World" nations, and that white-collar jobs were in as much danger as the blue-collar positions which have thus far been ravaged by outsourcing and illegal immigration. That survey then warned that "unless a solution is found to sluggish real wages and rising inequality, there is a serious risk of a protectionist backlash" in America that would take us away from what they view to be the "biggest economic stimulus in world history."

More troubling is this: If it remains unchecked, this bifurcation of opportunities and advantages along class lines has the potential to bring a period of political unrest. Up to now, most American workers have simply been worried about their job prospects. Once they understand that there are (and were) clear alternatives to the policies that have dislocated careers and altered futures, they will demand more accountability from the leaders who have failed to protect their interests. The "Wal-Marting" of cheap consumer products brought in from places like China, and the easy money from low-interest home mortgage refinancing, have softened the blows in recent years. But the balance point is tipping in both cases, away from the consumer and away from our national interest.

The politics of the Karl Rove era were designed to distract and divide the very people who would ordinarily be rebelling against the deterioration of their way of life. Working Americans have been repeatedly seduced at the polls by emotional issues such as the predictable mantra of "God, guns, gays, abortion and the flag" while their way of life shifted ineluctably beneath their feet. But this election cycle showed an electorate that intends to hold government leaders accountable for allowing every American a fair opportunity to succeed.

With this new Congress, and heading into an important presidential election in 2008, American workers have a chance to be heard in ways that have eluded them for more than a decade. Nothing is more important for the health of our society than to grant them the validity of their concerns. And our government leaders have no greater duty than to confront the growing unfairness in this age of globalization.

Mr. Webb is the Democratic senator-elect from Virginia.

Two Years Till Election Day, And The Race Is On (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON

The 2006 midterms are finally over (almost). Let the 2008 games begin.

A handful of congressional races aren't quite over yet, but the jockeying for the 2008 presidential contest - going on for months, if not years - has burst fully into the open. For the Republicans, Sen. John McCain of Arizona and Rudolph Giuliani, former mayor of New York, have registered committees and signaled they're probably in. By all indications, outgoing Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney is in.

For the Democrats, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York has money and organization - and just bowed out of a party leadership position, another sign she may be in. Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois says he's pondering a run, possibly positioning himself as the un-Hillary. Outgoing Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack is definitely in. Former vice presidential nominee John Edwards has shown all the signs.

But as of now, two years minus a few days until America elects its next president, the front-runners for major-party nomination remain Senators McCain and Clinton. Whether either will ultimately occupy the Oval Office is anyone's guess.

"Here's what's interesting: Both parties have reservations about their presumptive nominees," says Cal Jillson, a political analyst at Southern Methodist University in Dallas.

With Clinton, some Democrats remain concerned that she can easily win the nomination by deploying her formidable political team and fundraising ability, but can't win the general election because of her high negatives. Analysts warn against reading too much into presidential horse-race polls at this stage, since much is based just on name recognition. But for Clinton, who is already known nearly universally to the American public from her years as first lady and now as a senator, the visceral negative reaction she sparks in some voters is cause for concern.

DOJ_NMG_0094826

The latest Gallup poll, taken Nov. 9-12, puts her favorability at 53 percent and unfavorable rating at 42 percent. In the same poll, McCain scored at 54 percent favorable and 23 percent unfavorable.

Clinton suffers from some voters' memories of her aborted effort to reform healthcare during her husband's administration, her implication in some White House scandals, and her image as a calculating centrist on issues such as the Iraq war.

The coming elevation of the first woman to be House speaker, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D) of California, could have some bearing on the public's attitude about making Clinton the first female president.

"If Pelosi does a really good job holding the Democrats together, and giving them something they can run with in 2008, that will certainly demonstrate to some people that a woman is tough enough to take on the Republicans," says Linda Fowler, a political scientist at Dartmouth College in Hanover, N.H.

For McCain, the 2006 midterms brought good news and bad news. His own party took a drubbing at the hands of voters, principally in a repudiation of both President Bush and the Iraq war. McCain is now well-positioned to enhance his image as a maverick, triangulating between the Democratic-controlled Congress and the lame-duck Bush White House. But his steadfast support for the unpopular Iraq war and continued calls for more troops in Iraq, not fewer, put him at odds with the American public on the No. 1 issue of the day.

"McCain has got to pray that Iraq goes away as a major issue in '08, otherwise he's got some difficulties," says Mr. Jillson.

McCain also faces the challenge of wooing social conservatives, who were skeptical of him in his 2000 presidential campaign, while not alienating moderate Republicans and independents.

Another hurdle for McCain could be his age. On inauguration day 2009, he will be 72, and if elected, would be the oldest person ever to become US president. But if he can remain healthy and energetic, the age issue could fade.

Below McCain and Clinton sit a small group of men vying to be their principal opponents in the primaries and caucuses, which begin in just 14 months. The announcement this week by ex-Mayor Giuliani that he has formed a presidential exploratory committee in New York State provides the first clue - beyond making speeches in key states - that he might actually run. The latest Gallup poll named him as the top choice for the GOP nomination among Republicans and independents who lean Republican, beating McCain by 2 points, 28 percent to 26 percent. But as a liberal on social issues, many analysts believe he cannot win the nomination.

That's why Governor Romney is getting so much attention. Some midterm defeats have cleared the way for Romney to position himself as the alternative to McCain among the GOP's conservative base. Romney was mentioned by only 5 percent of GOP voters as their top pick, but the race is young, and most voters have not tuned in yet. One question for Romney is how his Mormon faith will affect GOP voters' perceptions of him. But he already has built strong lists of supporters in early nominating states Iowa, South Carolina, and New Hampshire - in addition to Michigan, where his father was governor - and won notice for charisma.

On the Democratic side, the decision by former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner not to run has left an opening for the "anti-Hillary" spot. If Senator Obama decides to run, he could shoot into that position - but, analysts say, he has to decide soon, as the money and campaign talent are quickly being grabbed by others.

The first-term Illinois senator is currently riding a wave of "Obama-mania," following the publication of his second memoir and a book tour that has highlighted his appeal as a fresh face on the political scene - and his opposition to the Iraq war from the beginning, a key contrast with Clinton. The Gallup poll placed him second to Clinton among Democrats and Democratic leaners for the nomination, 31 percent to 19 percent.

The question is whether voters believe he has enough political experience to begin a credible run for president after just two years in the Senate. As a black man, he also faces the race question.

Appearing on ABC's "Good Morning America" on Monday, he said he was still thinking of running, but acknowledged the challenge of his identity.

"Whether it's an African-American candidate, a woman candidate running, if it's a nontraditional candidate, there is another threshold you have to meet," he said. "I think you have to show people competence in a way that, if you're a white male, you may not have to show initially."

With Group Exploring '08 Bid, Giuliani Buys Himself Time (NYT)

By Sewell Chan

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

By setting up an organization in New York State to explore a White House run — but not creating a candidate committee with the Federal Election Commission — former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani is buying himself more time to make a decision, although he will face significant restrictions in raising money, according to several election and campaign experts.

DOJ_NMG_0094827

The news that the Rudy Giuliani Presidential Exploratory Committee Inc. was established on Friday made front-page headlines yesterday, but Mr. Giuliani remains several steps away from declaring himself a candidate.

The new organization was registered as a nonprofit corporation with the New York State Department of State, but Mr. Giuliani has not committed to formally filing with the Federal Election Commission, as Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa, who is seeking the Democratic presidential nomination, has done.

Mr. Giuliani has said little publicly about his intentions, other than to say he expects to make a final decision by early next year. As he weighs his options, he is expected to rely heavily on the advice of a circle of advisers who have been with him for decades. They include Peter J. Powers, a former deputy mayor who has been a friend of Mr. Giuliani's since high school, and Dennison Young Jr., who worked with Mr. Giuliani in the United States attorney's office and was later the mayor's chief counsel.

Mr. Powers and Mr. Young are the directors of the new organization, along with John H. Gross, a lawyer who has been a campaign treasurer for Mr. Giuliani.

"Everywhere he goes, I can only describe it as a groundswell of support among Republicans, urging him to run," said another friend, Randy M. Mastro, a former deputy mayor.

The former mayor is using a provision of federal election law that allows people exploring a candidacy to "test the waters" before deciding to run for federal office. The prospective candidate does not need to register with the commission, but must abide by the same contribution and spending limits as declared candidates.

The commission advises anyone doing such preliminary exploration to keep detailed financial records, because if he or she formally becomes a candidate, money raised and spent on testing the waters will be considered as contributions and expenditures under federal law.

Such prospective candidates may pay for polling, phone calls, travel, political consultants, office space and stationery, among other things. However, they may not raise more money than "reasonably required for exploratory activity," publicize their intention to run, or refer to themselves as candidates.

"You can travel and assess your viability as a candidate, but without trying to persuade people to support you," said Karl J. Sandstrom, a Democratic lawyer who was on the commission from 1998 to 2002. He suggested that Mr. Giuliani's step indicated a degree of hesitancy or uncertainty. "He doesn't want to be embarrassed if this doesn't start to take off. He's trying to play it kind of safe."

Mr. Sandstrom said a candidate can realistically test the waters only for a short period of time. "How much money can you spend on polls, even with New York pollsters?" he asked.

Bobby R. Burchfield, the lawyer for Mr. Giuliani's new organization, cautioned against reading the mayor's action as a sign of tentativeness. He said the entity was set up as to provide a legal structure and liability protections.

"What you can do as an exploratory committee is everything except campaign," he said. "There's a lot of latitude there. At a certain point of fund-raising, it becomes not credible to contend that you're exploring and not intending to run. If he sets up staff and tries to assemble delegate slates in states, that's out of bounds. But we're a very long way from those things."

He added, "At the appropriate time, he will make the requisite filings with the F.E.C."

Asked why Mr. Giuliani did not file with the commission while continuing to test the waters, an approach Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, has said he intends to take, Mr. Burchfield said there was no practical difference. But under the method he has chosen, Mr. Giuliani cannot present himself as a candidate or raise large sums of money, lest he face penalties.

Mr. Giuliani, who was mayor from 1994 to 2001, strongly considered running for the Senate in 2000, but decided not to after announcing, in quick succession, that he had prostate cancer; that he was involved with a woman, Judith Nathan; and that he was seeking a separation from his wife, Donna Hanover. He married Ms. Nathan in 2003.

The 9/11 attack transformed the mayor's reputation and made him immensely popular even in conservative areas where his moderate positions on abortion and gay rights might instantly sink the prospects of other Republican politicians.

Through his political action committee, Solutions America, he has contributed extensively to Republican campaigns, and this year, according to the committee's Web site, he campaigned with or raised money for Republican candidates in 25 states and Washington, D.C.

"He generates a lot of excitement, because he has instant name recognition and instant star power, and we were able to translate that into votes for us in the last cycle," said Katon Dawson, chairman of the South Carolina Republican Party. "He has almost rock-star status in crowds, because he was the face of 9/11 that we all saw every day."

Mr. Dawson said he expected Mr. Giuliani to run and predicted that he would have no trouble building an organization in South Carolina. "As soon as he pokes his foot in the water, he'll have employees," Mr. Dawson said.

Representative Jeb Bradley of New Hampshire last week lost his bid for a third term, but said he was grateful for Mr. Giuliani's support during the campaign. "People in New Hampshire really respect him," Mr. Bradley said. "Of all of the other presidential candidates, he has been a staunch defender of the New Hampshire primary."

DOJ_NMG_0094828

Fred Siegel, a historian at Cooper Union who advised Mr. Giuliani in his 1993 mayoral run and in his first year as mayor, said the speculation over presidential aspirations indeed might have had the effect, whether intended or not, of bolstering Mr. Giuliani's consulting business, Giuliani Partners.

But Mr. Siegel said that he was not suggesting that Mr. Giuliani was trying to enrich himself, only that Mr. Giuliani, not having the political apparatus that a governor or other officeholder might have, used his business as a base of operations.

"He's got the best of both worlds: He's still making money for his business and he's a de facto candidate for president, and the two reinforce each other," Mr. Siegel said. "He's using the candidacy to build up the business, and the business pays for the campaign."

He said he believed the former mayor would run. "He's been running for a long time," he said. "It's a noncampaign campaign."

Think Tank Will Promote Thinking (WP)

By Marc Kaufman

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

Concerned that the voice of science and secularism is growing ever fainter in the White House, on Capitol Hill and in culture, a group of prominent scientists and advocates of strict church-state separation yesterday announced formation of a Washington think tank designed to promote "rationalism" as the basis of public policy.

The brainchild of Paul Kurtz, founder of the Center for Inquiry-Transnational, the small public policy office will lobby and sometimes litigate on behalf of science-based decision making and against religion in government affairs.

The announcement was accompanied by release of a "Declaration in Defense of Science and Secularism," which bemoans what signers say is a growing lack of understanding of the nature of scientific inquiry and the value of a rational approach to life.

"This disdain for science is aggravated by the excessive influence of religious doctrine on our public policies," the declaration says. "We cannot hope to convince those in other countries of the dangers of religious fundamentalism when religious fundamentalists influence our policies at home."

While the speakers at the National Press Club unveiling were highly critical of Bush administration policies regarding stem cell research, global warming, abstinence-only sex education and the teaching of "intelligent design," they said that their group was nonpartisan and that many Democrats were hostile to keeping religion out of public policy.

"Unfortunately, not only do too many well-meaning people base their conceptions of the universe on ancient books -- such as the Bible and the Koran -- rather than scientific inquiry, but politicians of all parties encourage and abet this scientific ignorance," reads the declaration, which was signed by, among others, three Nobel Prize winners.

Kurtz, a professor emeritus in philosophy from the State University of New York at Buffalo and a longtime critic of the influence of religion on public policy, said that the nation needed the equivalent of a "second Enlightenment." He said the methods of science, which have led to much human progress, "are being challenged culturally in the United States today as never before."

Several speakers also had strong words for the media, which they accused of distorting scientific consensus in the name of journalistic balance. David Helfand, chairman of the Columbia University astronomy department, said for instance that while 99 percent of scientists working in the field of climate change are convinced that it is serious and the result of human activity, the views of the 1 percent who disagree are often given equal weight in stories about global warming.

Lawrence M. Krauss, an author and theoretical physicist at Case Western Reserve University, said the scientific community has done a "poor job" of explaining its logic and benefits to the public. He also said scientists have a more active role to play in opposing faith-based governing, which he said the public often rejects once it understands the issues involved.

"In the current climate there is an implicit, if demonstrably false, sense that if your actions are based on a belief in God you are good person, and if they are not you are a bad person," Krauss said. "We should be very concerned that our political system reinforces the notion that the more you pray for guidance, the better suited you are to govern."

The goals of the new group are to establish relationships with sympathetic legislators, provide experts to give testimony before Congress, speak publicly on issues when they are in the news, and submit friend-of-the-court briefs in Supreme Court cases involving science and religion. The Center for Inquiry-Transnational, a nonprofit organization, is funded by memberships.

Old Saws, New Rust (NYT)

By Mike Murphy

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

WATCHING the televised punditry about the elections, I felt pummeled by commentators repeatedly using the same clichés — most of which happen to be dead wrong. The three worst offenders:

ALL POLITICS IS LOCAL Tip O'Neill's observation is no longer true. Safe one-party Congressional seats in Boston 50 years ago were local, but only because a few thousand Democratic primary voters chose the winner.

In this election, all politics was global. The voters of Mishawaka and La Porte, Ind., were more influenced by the sectarian politics of Baghdad than by the election-eve announcement by their Republican congressman, Chris Chocola, that he'd gotten $1.4 million in federal money for a local mental health center. He lost.

THIS IS THE MOST NEGATIVE CAMPAIGN EVER. Negative campaigning has been around since the beginning of our democracy, and voters reward it. If people voted against negative ads, you'd never see any.

The most criticized ad of this election poked fun at Representative Harold Ford of Tennessee. The political speech police labeled it racist because it featured a flirty blonde teasing Mr. Ford, who is black, about a Bacchanalian Super Bowl party that he allegedly attended and I'm sad to say I did not. Sure, the spot was inane, but the worst ever? In 1964, the president of the United States ran an ad implying his opponent would start a nuclear war. It's hard to get more negative than that.

THIS ELECTION WILL ALL COME DOWN TO TURNOUT. Nonsense. We Republicans took a beating on Election Day, but it had nothing to do with turnout. The problem wasn't that our voters didn't turn out, it was that our voters alone are not enough. Turnout is important: it is essential to winning primaries (since so few people bother to vote) and very close contests.

Most general elections, however, are decided by the independent and ticket-splitting voters in the middle who swing between parties. When the swing voters stampede toward your opponent, you are usually toast.

Examine exit-polling estimates from the Senate race in Virginia. George Allen won 94 percent of the Republican vote and Jim Webb won 93 percent of the Democratic. Since more Republicans than Democrats vote in Virginia, Senator Allen should have won. Instead of splitting the swing vote, however, Mr. Webb thumped Mr. Allen among independents by 12 points. It was the same in Montana and Ohio and, well, just about everywhere. It is the real reason we lost the House and Senate.

Successful campaign management means using message to be far enough ahead in most races — especially in districts and states where you start with the advantage — that you are never in such deep trouble that you wind up needing an improbably high turnout of only your base vote to win.

Swing voters respond to policy and persuasion, not process spin. The cocky Republican talk about magical 72-hour plans in the last weeks before the election was unfortunate proof that the party's high command had forgotten this most basic fact of politics, at least until the rough news of last Tuesday. Of all the clichés this year, this one was the most damaging for Republicans to believe in.

Bush Kicks Off 8-day Tour Of Asian Nations (USAT)

USA Today, November 15, 2006

President Bush was leaving Tuesday night for an eight-day tour of Asia that includes stops in Singapore, Indonesia and Vietnam, where he attends a summit of Asian-Pacific nation leaders. It will be Bush's first trip to Vietnam, where the United States fought a decade-long war in the south against communist forces that eventually triumphed and unified the country.

Bush's plan to arrive in Hanoi with a pact normalizing trade hit a bump when the lame-duck GOP-controlled House failed to approve the measure on an initial vote Monday. The 228-161 vote was short of the two-thirds majority needed for passage under the expedited rules used to consider it.

Judge wants cocainepenalty-gap narrowed

A federal judge who advocated harsher penalties for crack cocaine crimes said the policy had gone too far and was undermining faith in the judicial system.

U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton told the U.S. Sentencing Commission that federal laws requiring much longer sentences for crack cocaine than for cocaine powder were "unconscionable." Walton said the laws contributed to perceptions within minority communities that courts are unfair because crack is more of a black, inner-city drug while cocaine powder is used more often in white suburbs.

The law includes a five-year prison sentence for trafficking in 5 grams of crack cocaine but requires 500 grams of cocaine powder for the same sentence.

"I never thought that the disparity should be as severe as it has become," Walton said. He advocated harsher penalties when he was associate director of the National Drug Control Policy during the first President Bush's administration.

The Sentencing Commission has recommended three times that Congress narrow the disparity.

The Justice Department says crack is more addictive and easier to sell in small doses.

Two top officials from Census Bureau leaving

DOJ_NMG_0094830

The two top officials of the Census Bureau announced they are leaving. Census Bureau Director Louis Kincannon has run the bureau since 2001. He said he would stay until a new director is confirmed. Hermann Habermann, the bureau's deputy director, said he would retire in January.

Libby says he didn't have motive to lie in Plame case

Lawyers for former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby said they should be permitted to tell jurors at his perjury trial that he was not the federal official who disclosed CIA officer Valerie Plame's name to a columnist in 2003.

Libby is charged with lying to investigators in a probe triggered by the disclosure to columnist Robert Novak. Former deputy secretary of State Richard Armitage said this year that he was inadvertently the source. Libby's lawyers said in court papers that Libby should be allowed to tell jurors that since he wasn't the source he had no reason to lie to investigators.

Special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald has argued that the trial in January should not be about the leak or why only Libby was charged.

Plame and her husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson, have accused Bush administration officials of blowing her cover as retribution for her husband's criticism of prewar intelligence.

Vietnam Trade Bill Grinds To A Halt (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, November 15, 2006

In a stunning setback for President Bush on the eve of a major foreign visit, House Republican leaders Tuesday delayed until December a vote on normalizing trade relations with Vietnam.

"The decision has been made that it's not going to be able to reach the floor this week," says Kevin Madden, a spokesman for House Majority Leader Rep. John Boehner, R-Ohio.

Tuesday's delay complicates prospects for passage of a trade measure that was widely expected to sail through Congress with strong bipartisan support. And it means President Bush will arrive Friday in Hanoi empty-handed for an Asian economic summit.

"We'll just have to keep working with legislators to get this important legislation done," said Steve Norton, spokesman for the U.S. Trade Representative's office.

At issue is legislation granting Vietnam "permanent normal trade relations," which almost all U.S. trading partners enjoy. With the fast-growing Asian nation about to join the World Trade Organization, the measure is needed so that U.S. exporters can enjoy the same low tariffs as their European or Asian competitors.

Business groups that have been backing the legislation were stunned by the vote delay, which came one day after the bill attracted 228 votes, more than a House majority, but failed to pass under rules requiring a two-thirds margin for expedited passage. At the time, House Republican leaders indicated they would seek a vote under normal rules as soon as today.

"For the last three months, the conventional wisdom has been that everybody's for it; there is no opposition. … Now all of a sudden it goes down the drain," says Bill Reinsch, president of the National Foreign Trade Council.

On Capitol Hill, Madden says Republican leaders postponed the vote because they weren't sure that Democrats would stick with the bill amid labor union opposition. But Timothy Reif, lead Democratic trade counsel for the Ways and Means Committee, said there was no strategy to torpedo the bill.

Seen as the final step in a generation-long effort to bind the wounds of the Vietnam War, the measure may also have been overshadowed by both parties' votes later this week on new congressional leadership.

The long-run ramifications of Tuesday's delay are less clear.

In December, the spur of an impending presidential trip will be gone. So some business leaders worry the measure may end up being held over until the less trade-friendly Democratic Congress takes office in January.

"It's a warning shot that we're entering a very bumpy phase in trade relations. This should have been a no-brainer," says Daniel Griswold, director of the Cato Institute's Center for Trade Policy Studies.

G.O.P. House Leaders Withdraw Vietnam Trade Bill (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 14 — Prospects for Congressional approval of several free trade bills backed by the administration were thrown into doubt Tuesday when House Republican leaders abruptly withdrew the one aimed at Vietnam on the eve of President Bush's trip there this week.

DOJ_NMG_0094831

The failure of the Vietnam bill was a deep disappointment and embarrassment for the White House, which had hoped that the president would hail its passage as a milestone in improvement in relations with a country where tens of thousands of Americans died more than 30 years ago.

The bill's failure touched off a fusillade of partisan recriminations, with Republicans blaming Democrats for trying to sabotage the bill and Democrats saying that some Republicans, bitter after losing the election last week, were trying to embarrass Mr. Bush.

Though the bill could come back to the House before the end of the year, some legislative aides said that its future was in doubt, along with that of several other bills lowering trade barriers with poor countries in Asia, Africa and Latin America. The administration remained hopeful, at least on the surface.

"As we've said all along, we will work with the Congressional leadership on the Vietnam bill and the other bills," Stephen Norton, a spokesman for Susan C. Schwab, the United States trade representative, said. "This is important legislation and we remain hopeful that Congress will approve it as soon as possible."

The unsettled atmosphere was another sign of the fraying of the pledges of bipartisan cooperation after last week's midterm elections, as well as a reflection of lingering sensitivities over Vietnam. Most of all, it seemed to be a sign that whatever consensus had existed for free trade bills was also starting to crumble.

A spokesman for Representative John A. Boehner, the Ohio Republican who is House majority leader in the waning weeks of this Congress, said there was a "possibility" that the bill could come back later in the lame-duck session. He said the bill was withdrawn because Democrats were turning against it.

The bill came before the House on Monday night and won a majority of votes, with 228 lawmakers voting in favor and 161 against. More than 40 lawmakers of both parties had not yet returned to Washington, however, and it fell short of the two-thirds needed to pass according to the special rules under which the bill was introduced.

House leaders immediately expressed confidence that it would pass as early as Tuesday under regular rules enabling it to be approved by a simple majority. But the "yes" votes appeared to be melting away under a sustained campaign by organized labor and other opponents who argue that the bills cost American jobs.

Kevin Madden, the spokesman for Mr. Boehner, said that the majority leader learned that an effort would be made by House Democrats to send the Vietnam measure back to the committee level, and that the maneuver might succeed. He said Democrats were being pressed by labor groups and anti-trade groups that backed them in the election.

But Democrats said the bill seemed to be a victim of disarray in Republican ranks, and antipathy toward the departing chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, Representative Bill Thomas of California, an ardent advocate of free trade.

An administration official, asking not to be identified, said there appeared to be elements of bad faith and bad feelings on all sides.

Democrats said they had asked the Republican leadership to delay the vote Monday night until Tuesday to allow dozens of lawmakers to return. But they said they were rebuffed by Mr. Boehner's and Mr. Thomas's offices, which expressed confidence that the necessary two-thirds votes were available.

The troubles of the Vietnam bill occur as lawmakers are beginning to discern where the new center of gravity is on the many issues debated in the campaign this year.

In the last few years, a large majority of Democrats have voted against trade bills, like one in 2005 lowering barriers with Central American countries, fearing that imports of textiles and other commodities produced there could throw Americans out of their jobs.

Several Democrats who won in the election this month, notably Senator-elect Sherrod Brown of Ohio, had run promising to block or slow future trade bills in Congress.

The Vietnam bill, however, had the support of crucial Democrats, including the future House speaker, Nancy Pelosi of California, and Representative Charles B. Rangel, the expected next chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, as well as the Republican leadership.

The Vietnam bill was aimed at establishing "permanent normal trade relations" with Vietnam, which is joining the World Trade Organization and, as a result, is obliged to lower trade barriers and subsidies on its products.

Failure of the measure does not bar Vietnam from joining the World Trade Organization. Rather, it would place the United States out of compliance with the organization, because the Jackson-Vanik Amendment, passed in 1975, requires an annual review of Vietnam's political and economic practices, which is not allowed under the W.T.O.'s rules.

The administration argued that granting Vietnam "normal" trade status is the best way of getting it to abide by international trade rules, including bans on copyright piracy and restrictions on foreign investments and imports.

Bush Won't Bring Vietnam Deal To Asia Summit (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In a postelection slap at the White House, Republicans put off action on a Vietnam trade bill until December, denying President Bush an accomplishment he had hoped to cite at an Asia-Pacific Rim summit this week.

The decision came as the House also delayed by a day action on extending a routine stopgap spending bill that Mr. Bush wanted to sign before departing for Moscow and then Asia last night. As a result, a White House aide will have to fly to Asia with the bill, so the president can sign it to keep government agencies operating after this weekend.

Administration officials were irritated, Democrats amused, but the moves mostly captured the fractious postelection alignment here. Smarting from losses in last week's midterms, Republicans are less eager to march to the beat of the president's drum. There is rank-and-file resentment that Mr. Bush didn't announce the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld until after Election Day, and party leaders are more preoccupied with saving their jobs than moving the president's agenda.

The White House had hoped Congress would complete action on the trade bill so Mr. Bush could announce passage when he visits Hanoi, his first visit to Vietnam. Most House members support the goal of granting permanent normal trade relations to Hanoi, but enacting it has become harder since Election Day.

When lawmakers returned Monday, the Vietnam trade bill was called up in the House under an expedited procedure that limited debate, but required a two-thirds majority for passage. The 228-161 vote fell about 32 votes short of the required margin, and the administration was surprised it lost 66 Republicans, about twice the number it had expected, given past experience on similar trade bills.

To allay concerns of domestic textiles producers, who have lost tens of thousands of jobs under pressure from low-cost labor abroad, a provision was added that would empower the administration to impose annual limits on textile and apparel shipments from Vietnam. Nonetheless, Republicans from textile states like the Carolinas rejected the measure. The Texas delegation, where Rep. Sam Hall, a former Vietnam prisoner of war, is a major influence, was prominent in its opposition, as was House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter (R., Calif.)

Given the level of discontent, Majority Leader John Boehner (R., Ohio) feared trying again too soon and risking a fatal stumble over another procedural obstacle. Already facing conservative challengers in caucus elections Friday, neither he nor Republican Whip Roy Blunt of Missouri had much appetite for twisting arms on a subject like Vietnam.

As a practical matter, House Republicans appear so consumed with leadership races that decisions on tax and spending legislation also will be postponed until after Thanksgiving. The revised stopgap bill, expected to be approved today, will run through Dec. 8, but at least another week may be needed still to resolve spending bills for the new fiscal year.

The Senate took a first step last night by approving a nearly $90 billion budget for veterans' health care and military construction projects. In talks with the House, this will grow by about $42 billion to include spending for housing and health-care benefits for the active military, and the appropriations leadership hopes to create a strong enough legislative locomotive to pull the remaining unfinished bills.

As part of the same package, senators added language guaranteeing that the inspector general for Iraq would remain operating until 10 months after 80% of the funds appropriated for the relief and reconstruction effort there have been expended. That date is expected to be near mid-2008 -- or about a year longer than current law allows the IG to operate.

The show of bipartisanship soon dissolved in a fight over farm disaster aid, as Great Plains Democrats pressed for $4.9 billion in emergency assistance. The proposal was finally pulled back -- to allow the veterans bill to pass. But not before Sen. Judd Gregg (R., N.H.), the departing Senate Budget Committee chairman, had accused Democrats of ignoring the message sent by voters last week for more fiscal discipline. "This is a daytime robbery of the Treasury," he said, "and it sells the people...who voted in this election a bill of goods they didn't think they were buying."

Analysis: Humbled Bush Faces Test Abroad (AP-Y)

By Tom Raum

AP, November 15, 2006

Humbled by elections at home, President Bush is heading into talks with leaders in Asia and Europe who will be watching for signs of weakness, uncertainty or retrenchment.

Bush's challenge is to demonstrate that U.S. leadership as the world's last superpower is undiminished on the world stage.

"I think he will go vigorous, I think he'll give a powerful performance," said Kurt Campbell, a top Pentagon official in the Clinton administration who now is with the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Some world leaders, particularly those who resented Bush's cowboy swagger and saw his decision to invade Iraq in 2003 as a dangerous act of unilateralism, might be gloating privately at the president's political misfortunes.

DOJ_NMG_0094833

But the United States does not have a parliamentary system, and Bush will remain president for two more years. And other world leaders have been challenged at home, too, especially Iraq ally Tony Blair of Britain and war opponent Jacques Chirac of France, both of whom could commiserate with Bush.

The Democratic capture last week of both the House and the Senate on a tide of voter anger over Iraq diminished the president's authority at home.

That's resulted in "an interesting period here in Washington," Bush told visiting Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert this week. "You might realize the opposition party won, won the Senate and the House. And, what's interesting, is that they're beginning to understand that with victory comes responsibilities."

On the world stage, Bush's misfortunes could marginally embolden Chinese President Hu Jintao and Russian President Vladimir Putin. But, otherwise, it seems unlikely that geopolitical dynamics will be much changed.

"He acknowledges that he took a thumping. But leaders around the world take thumpings all the time," said presidential historian Thomas E. Cronin of Colorado College. The election results also telegraphs to the rest of the world, "including Iraq and Russia, that we can have peaceful elections that alter the makeup of our national government," Cronin said.

Bush was leaving Tuesday night for an eight-day tour of Asia, including stops in Singapore, Indonesia and Vietnam, where he attends a summit of Asian-Pacific nation leaders. At month's end, Bush will travel to the Baltic Sea countries of Latvia and Estonia, once claimed by the Soviet Union, for a NATO summit in Riga, Latvia.

It will be Bush's first trip to Vietnam. During the Vietnam War, he served in the U.S. in the Texas Air National Guard. Now, with the Iraq war dragging on for 3 1/2 years and the U.S. death toll still rising, many of Bush's critics are comparing Iraq to the Vietnamese quagmire.

Bush's plan to arrive in Hanoi with a new pact normalizing trade with Vietnam hit an unexpected obstacle when the lame-duck GOP-controlled House failed to approve the measure on Monday. Its Republican sponsors had hoped to use another strategy to move the bill forward this week, but they put off the effort on Tuesday. It was an embarrassing setback as the president set out on his first postelection overseas trip.

He told a group of U.S. auto executives in the Oval Office on Tuesday that he would deliver this message to trading partners: "Just treat us the way we treat you. Our markets are open for your products, and we expect your markets to be open for ours, including our automobiles."

Even before the elections, some of the go-it-alone tactics of Bush's first term had already been replaced by great diplomacy, including U.S. efforts to rely on other countries to defuse nuclear tensions with North Korea and Iran.

"Some of the people who used to criticize us for unilateralism are now beginning to criticize us for not taking more decisive individual action," said Stephen Hadley, the president's national security adviser.

Not only is Bush under pressure at home from Democrats and some Republicans to change course on Iraq, but he is encountering calls from some U.S. allies, including most recently Blair, to reach out more to Iran and Syria in hopes of promoting broader stability in the region given the changing nature of the battle in Iraq.

Bush said Monday that Iran must first verifiably halt its enrichment of uranium as a precondition to talks. If Syria wants to contribute to the peace process, it should leave Lebanon for good and stop harboring terrorists, Bush suggested.

As presidential terms wind down, incumbents find themselves increasingly challenged in getting domestic programs through Congress and seem to prefer spending much of their time on foreign policy.

Nixon did it, traveling to Moscow to sign an arms-control agreement as the Watergate scandal was bringing down his government. Clinton did it after surviving an impeachment battle with the GOP-led Congress, spending the last days of his term trying to arrange a peace deal in the Middle East.

And Eisenhower did it after the Democrats swept the 1958 midterm elections, finding the only leverage he had at home was to veto bills, and preferring touring the world instead.

There's a difference. Eisenhower was greeted as a hero. Clinton as he traveled drew huge crowds and affection. But Bush is widely disliked throughout much of the world.

Bush still has two more years in power, despite the midterm elections repudiating Republicans.

"The negative, obviously, is that he's been repudiated," said Fred Greenstein, a political science professor at Princeton University. "The positive is that he's been chastised and tempered and we're seeing much less of the my-way-or-the-highway approach to diplomacy and international relations."

Protectionists Punish Vietnam (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 15, 2006

THE HOST COUNTRY for the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum is not your father's Vietnam. Its Ho Chi Minh mausoleum notwithstanding, the Hanoi that President Bush will visit Friday is the capital of a nation that is prospering as a result of its embrace of private enterprise and freer markets. America may have lost the Vietnam War, but American values are slowly winning the peace.

A 2001 bilateral trade deal between Hanoi and Washington helped solidify Vietnam's reforms, and the country has become the second-fastest-growing economy in Asia after China, not to mention an anchor of stability in a region once renowned for its instability. Vietnam, in short, has been one of the more positive global stories in the last decade, and it remains a nation with strong emotional bonds to the United States.

All of which makes the cavalier rejection by Congress of a trade normalization measure so unconscionable, not to mention embarrassing to the president. Under a relic of the Cold War years, Vietnam's U.S. trade preferences are subject to annual congressional review; before Vietnam can join the World Trade Organization, that law has to be rescinded. Yet on Monday, the House turned down a measure to do so when it failed to achieve the required two-thirds vote under a procedure that limited debate. Though the bill can be resubmitted under normal procedures, thus requiring only a majority vote to pass, GOP leaders have decided to wait until next month to try again.

The vote sends a disastrous signal to the people of Vietnam (the message being that the superpower that once bombed you isn't too excited to see you prosper) and to Asian leaders.

Beyond Vietnam, the cause of free trade may be in for a rough time once Democrats take control of both houses of Congress. There are troubling signs that the party's new protectionist wing will try to torpedo upcoming trade pacts with Peru and Colombia, and stand in the way of progress on a comprehensive deal to lower global trade barriers under the Doha round of WTO talks. Also endangered is Bush's fast-track trade authority, which allows him to sign trade deals subject only to a yes-or-no vote by Congress. It expires in July.

All of this is unfortunate. Vietnam is far from the only country where free trade has made a profound difference. Open markets create customers for U.S. goods and provide cheap imports for U.S. consumers while improving relations around the world and boosting economies. A successful Doha round would probably do more to relieve poverty in Africa than all the foreign aid doled out to the continent put together.

President Clinton steered the Democratic Party away from protectionism, a move that benefited the party and the nation. Taking a step backward now would only hurt both.

Democrats And Trade (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

Triumphant Democrats are talking up their new moderation, and we're about to get an early test of their sincerity: Are they willing to support the kind of trade opening with very poor countries that Bill Clinton supported? Or will they take orders from the AFL-CIO?

At issue this week are a bilateral free-trade pact already signed with Peru, and an amendment to extend a key provision of the African Growth and Opportunity Act (AGOA) that Mr. Clinton and Republicans passed in a bipartisan spirit in 2000. The trade bills will be a particular test for Charlie Rangel, the soon-to-be chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, who professes to care deeply about the world's poor. Here's his chance to prove it.

The African provision allows sub-Saharan Africa to source fabric for its apparel industry from any country in the world and then sell the garments in the U.S. duty-free. This "third country provision" has made garment assembly in Africa competitive and boosted sub-Saharan appeal as a destination for capital from the apparel industry.

AGOA has a 15-year life but the "third country" provision is set to expire in 2007. If Africa is forced to once again buy only U.S.-made fabric to maintain its U.S. duty-free status, its apparel industry will vanish. Clothing makers will pack up and move, taking something like 150,000 jobs with them. The biggest winner would probably be China as garment makers relocated to Asia.

GOP Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas has crafted a bill to extend the third-country provision through September 2008 and provide new investment incentives for U.S. companies in the region. Haiti, the poorest country in the Western Hemisphere, also gets a small but important third-country fabric provision. Mr. Rangel was one of those who supported a U.S. invasion of Haiti in 1994 in the name of helping its poor citizens; free trade is a lot easier.

The case for ratifying the U.S.-Peru trade pact is just as obvious. Peru already enjoys broad duty-free access to the U.S. under the Andean Trade Preferences act. This deal would preserve that access but also open Peruvian markets to U.S. exporters and expand choice for Peruvian consumers. Under the deal, 80% of U.S. industrial and textile products, and more than two-thirds of U.S. farm exports, would enter Peru duty free immediately. Most other barriers would be gone within 15 years.

According to the American Farm Bureau Federation, farm exports to Peru could increase by $705 million a year. U.S. producers of machinery, plastics, cereals and mineral fuels, as well as wheat, cotton and coarse grains all expect strong export growth if it passes. On the other hand, if the U.S. walks away from Peru, the leadership in Lima will likely look to the EU and its Latin American neighbors for trade agreements, putting U.S. producers at a disadvantage.

Big Labor is pushing Democrats to block a vote and demand that the pact be renegotiated to include more labor protections. But Peru's labor laws are nearly identical to those in Chile, with which the U.S. already has a free-trade agreement. Peru protects the right to collectively bargain and its laws are consistent with International Labor Organization standards. The AFL-CIO's real game here is to force provisions on Lima that will increase the clout of unions in Peru. Never mind that these are issues for Peruvians to decide, not to be imposed by Big Labor gringos from Washington.

Ratifying the pact would also help Peru resist the influence of Venezuelan strongman Hugo Chávez, who is pushing his own regional trade bloc to exclude the U.S. and isolate South America. Later this month the U.S. is expected to sign a free trade pact with Colombia, another country that wants closer relations with the U.S. and is resisting Venezuela's cold embrace. A number of Democrats were only too happy to praise Mr. Chávez last year in return for receiving some of his discount oil, but Mr. Rangel denounced his recent anti-American rant at the U.N. Killing the Peru and Colombian deals would harm American interests and hand Mr. Chávez a strategic gift.

The AFL-CIO is claiming its new "economic populism" helped Democrats win last week, though there's little polling evidence to show it. In any case, it is a strange populism that advertises its power by trampling on the economic aspirations of the world's poorest citizens. Is this what Democratic control of Congress is going to stand for?

Vietnamese Activists Cite Curbs On Dissent (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, November 15, 2006

HANOI -- Vietnamese democracy and human rights activists accused the government yesterday of stepping up harassment in an effort to silence them ahead of President Bush's visit and a high-profile economic summit this week.

The activists, some of whom are under house arrest, praised a vote in the U.S. House of Representatives on Monday that denied permanent normal trade relations (PNTR) status to Vietnam and criticized Vietnam's removal from the State Department's blacklist of countries that limit religious freedom.

"The PNTR status must come with a condition that the government respect human rights for our own people," said Pham Hong Son, an activist who was detained for two years beginning in 2002 and has been under house arrest for another two.

He said he was detained because of an article on democracy that he translated into Vietnamese from the Web site of the U.S. Embassy in Hanoi and posted separately on the Internet. His claim could not be independently verified because the government does not comment on dissident cases.

The government accuses democracy activists of plotting to destabilize the country and to shame it before the 21 heads of state expected at the annual Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) summit this weekend.

The Foreign Ministry called Monday's House vote "very regretful, not suitable, and not serving the mutual interest and wishes of the peoples of the two countries."

Human rights advocates in the House, such as Rep. Christopher H. Smith, New Jersey Republican, led opposition to the bill, which fell short of a needed two-thirds majority by a single vote. The bill is not expected to come back for another vote before the end of the month.

The deal was part of a flurry of activity by the two sides, seemingly designed to clear away irritants on the eve of Mr. Bush's departure for Vietnam.

On the same day as the vote, a Vietnamese-American was released from prison and allowed to return to the United States, and Vietnam was removed from a list of countries that severely restrict religious freedoms.

John V. Hanford III, the State Department's at-large ambassador for international religious freedom, denied Monday that politics or business played any role in the latter decision, saying Vietnam had taken a number of specific steps to get off the list.

He said Hanoi had clarified laws on religious policy; greatly curbed the practice of "forced renunciations" of religious belief; released dozens of Buddhist, Catholic, Protestant and Hoa Hao religious prisoners; allowed previously outlawed groups and denominations to register and practice their faith, including 39 new congregations in Ho Chi Minh City alone in the past month; and permitted greater freedom for Protestant and Catholic congregations, including a sharp increase in the number of new Vietnamese priests and ministers.

Mr. Hanford acknowledged that "important work remains to be done," especially in more remote regions of the country. Protestant Montagnard groups from the central highlands have complained of harsh repression, and even torture and killing of believers by the authorities.

Nevertheless, Mr. Hanford said, "We are hearing from every religious group that we meet with that conditions have improved, that there's really a change in the attitude."

DOJ_NMG_0094836

However, Vietnamese activists complained of continuing religious repression in an open letter published in Washington yesterday.

"The Vietnamese people do not have freedom of religion and worship," said the writers, a group of engineers, lawyers, professors and religious leaders grouped under the name "A Call For Democracy."

"Religious organizations which were not established by the state, such as the Unified Buddhist Church of Vietnam, the Hoa Hao Buddhist Church, the Cao Dai congregation and the Mennonite Church of Vietnam, are all prohibited from operating," the letter said.

Amnesty International agreed that the practice of religion "remains under strict control" by the government in Vietnam.

"Church members seen as opposing state policies continue to be harassed, arrested and imprisoned," the human rights group said. "Church property has been destroyed. For example, a small Mennonite church in Ho Chi Minh City was destroyed in May."

Mr. Son said the decision to take Vietnam off the list was "not good news for those who care about human rights."

The activist cited at least three attempts by security police this month to warn him against speaking with foreigners who are arriving in Hanoi for the APEC summit.

On two occasions, he said, masked men on a motorcycle ran into his motorbike while he was riding it -- first with his two sons and then with his wife -- injuring him and damaging the motorbike. Democracy advocates and other government opponents said the authorities regularly engineer such "accidents" to send them a warning.

Nguyen Van Dai, a lawyer and member of Vietnam's Human Rights Committee, said he has been invited to meet with Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper during the APEC summit, but will not go.

"I can't leave my house because it's under heavy surveillance," he said. "They will use force if they have to in order to prevent me from going anywhere."

Both Mr. Son and Mr. Dai spoke by telephone and warned a reporter against visiting their houses. All interviewed activists said they strive to achieve their goals of democracy and human rights only by peaceful means.

Mr. Pham noted that the government recently released political prisoners under pressure from Washington, but said that many of them are now under house arrest. He added that he personally knew at least 10 such persons.

Call For Rethink Of US-Asean Trade Ties (FT)

By John Aglionby

Financial Times, November 15, 2006

The US needs to reassess its strategy towards south-east Asia while countries in the region should take concrete steps to enhance their competitiveness in order to optimise trade and investment between the two, the US Chamber of Commerce recommends in its first report on ways to boost mutual business links.

“[The region] is our fourth-largest trading partner and we’ve hardly scratched the surface,” Tom Donohue, the president and chief executive of the US Chamber of Commerce, told the Financial Times while in Jakarta on a regional tour. “It’s got potential written all over it as well as challenges.”

The study, Southeast Asia: dynamic opportunities for US competitiveness, written in conjunction with the regional American Chambers of Commerce and to be released in Singapore on Wedenesday, sets out the steps the chamber thinks the US and the 10 members of the Association of South East Asian Nations should take to ensure an expansion of trade and investment between them.

“This publicly commits us to a whole lot of serious dialogue, it forces us to focus, it forces us to collect our thoughts,” Mr Donohue said. “We’ve expanded our staff in the region and we’re going to establish resources to encourage trade and investment.”

Recommendations for the US government include investing in capacity-building initiatives that support regional economic reform and integration, providing resources to bolster programmes in the region by institutions such as the US Export-Import Bank, raising awareness across the US of economic opportunities in south-east Asia and streamlining visa procedures.

South-east Asian nations need to establish predictable investment regimes, promote good corporate governance, increase protection of intellectual property, harmonise standards, integrate customs procedures and establish a more open and transparent agricultural market.

“If you think you’ve got almost 600m people and you think of the growth of the middle class, the move away from poverty, the engagement in the global economy, you don’t have to be the smartest guy on the block to realise we should be investing more here,” Mr Donohue said.

Japanese Premier Plans To Fortify U.S. Ties In Meeting With Bush (WP)

By Anthony Faiola
The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

TOKYO, Nov. 14 -- Prime Minister Shinzo Abe on Tuesday outlined a vision for a stronger Japan and vowed to fortify the U.S.-Japan security alliance during his first official meeting with President Bush in Hanoi this weekend.

In a wide-ranging interview with The Washington Post, Abe, who succeeded Junichiro Koizumi in September, also said he would push to redraft Japan's pacifist constitution.

In the current charter, which was drafted by the United States during its occupation of Japan following World War II, Tokyo effectively renounces the use of virtually any form of aggression. Abe, saying he hoped to foster a "new spirit" in Japan, said he would seek a new constitution within six years -- referring to the maximum time a prime minister can serve in office.

Few postwar Japanese leaders have secured such long terms. Given new threats facing Japan -- most notably a nuclear North Korea -- Abe suggested that his administration could take the interim step of reinterpreting the existing constitution to increase defensive capabilities.

Abe noted that it is unclear whether Tokyo is permitted under its own constitution to shoot down a ballistic missile flying over Japanese territory en route to the United States. Rules of engagement for Japanese troops on overseas peacekeeping missions are also severely limited by the constitution. Under current interpretations, for instance, Japanese troops are not permitted to defend themselves -- or U.S. or other allied troops -- unless directly fired upon.

But leading Japanese scholars have said policy changes to address such issues may not require the adoption of a new constitution, and could instead be made through official clarifications issued by the cabinet. While declining to provide a timetable for declaring new security protocols, Abe called for options to be analyzed on a case-by-case basis.

"We need to take up each individual example and study whether they . . . infringe upon the constitution," he said.

The Bush administration has backed the notion of a more assertive Japan, viewing Tokyo as an increasingly important partner at a time of dwindling support for the administration's foreign policies among U.S. allies. But the idea has unnerved critics in China and South Korea, where memories of World War II-era atrocities still run deep.

Since North Korea tested a nuclear device last month, some observers have even feared that Japan might seek to develop its own nuclear weapons. Yet most domestic scholars say Japan, the only nation to ever suffer a nuclear attack, is unlikely to ever seriously consider such an option, even if it saw itself as the primary target for North Korean aggression. Abe echoed those sentiments Tuesday, vowing that Japan would adhere to its nonnuclear principles.

Still, some right-wing leaders here, including a key member of Abe's ruling Liberal Democratic Party, have called for a broader public debate on whether Japan should possess nuclear weapons. While Abe said he would move to prevent any "official" debate, he added that he could not stop private citizens from expressing their views.

"For the general public to discuss this matter -- for example, academics, scholars or journalists -- is the freedom of the Japanese people," said Abe, 52. "I am not in a position of restricting that."

Abe, considered hawkish by most analysts here, has taken the global lead in calling for international sanctions against North Korea for conducting a nuclear test and has imposed its own sanctions on the Pyongyang government. On Tuesday, Abe approved a series of new measures banning the export of luxury goods to North Korea, an action aimed directly at the authoritarian elite in Pyongyang who revel in high-end Japanese goods.

During his first six weeks in office, Abe has at times sought to moderate his tone. For instance, while he has backed Koizumi's controversial decision to pay annual homage at a Tokyo shrine honoring the country's military dead, including World War II-era war criminals, Abe has refused to say whether he will continue to make such visits himself.

"Now that he is in office, Abe is trying to hide his beliefs," said Tenzo Okumura, a leading member of the opposition Democratic Party. "As the prime minister of Japan, he has the responsibility to the Japanese people to be clear on his positions, but he has chosen to be ambiguous."

This weekend, Abe will meet with Bush at the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit in Hanoi.

The prime minister said he would use the occasion to stress the importance of maintaining a strong alliance with the United States and a firm line on North Korea. Some U.S. Democrats and Republicans have questioned Bush's refusal to hold direct negotiations with the North Koreans. Instead, the United States has agreed to meet them only within the context of six-party talks that also include China, Japan, Russia and South Korea. Japanese officials have favored Bush's approach, which has given Tokyo a greater role in the issue.

When asked whether he felt that policy might change with the new Democrat-controlled Congress, Abe reiterated Japan's desire to maintain the current multilateral format. "I believe that the six-party talks is the place to resolve the North Korean issue," he said.

India's Nuclear Record, Iran Links Questioned Ahead Of Senate Vote (AFP)

AFP, November 15, 2006

A non-partisan US Congressional study has underlined lawmakers' unease over India's non-proliferation record and its links with nuclear renegade Iran, on the eve of a Senate vote on a landmark US atomic deal with New Delhi.

The report by the Congressional Research Service raised the issue of whether India had adequate teeth to implement export control regulations in efforts to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons.

In 2004, the United States imposed sanctions on two Indian scientists for nuclear related transfers to Iran, which is facing sanctions for refusing to comply with UN demands it freeze its uranium enrichment work.

The Congressional report by Sharon Squassoni, a national defense specialist, noted that President George W. Bush's administration had not formally responded to claims that India had a "flawed" nonproliferation record in the nuclear area.

It also cited allegations that New Delhi had a "poorly implemented" national export control system and an "illicit" procurement system for its own nuclear weapons program, as well as a procurement system that "may unwittingly transfer sensitive information" about uranium enrichment.

"Indias nonproliferation record continues to be scrutinized, as India continues to take steps to strengthen its own export controls," the report said ahead of an expected Senate vote this week on the US-India civilian nuclear deal clinched by Bush and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh in March.

Under the deal, India, a non-signatory of the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT), would be allowed access to long-denied civilian nuclear technology in return for placing its atomic reactors under global safeguards.

To facilitate the deal, the US Congress has to create an exception for India from some of the requirements of the US Atomic Energy Act, which currently prohibits nuclear sales to non-NPT signatories.

The US House of Representatives gave its thumbs-up to the deal in July but a Senate vote had been delayed due to legislative elections last week that resulted in Democratic control of both chambers in the new Congress from January.

The current Congress is Republican dominated but the party is divided on the Indian nuclear deal.

"President Bush has tried to sell this nuclear deal by claiming that India is our natural ally, but as Ronald Reagan once said, 'Trust, but verify.'" said Edward Markey, who co-chairs a House bipartisan taskforce on nonproliferation.

"It is clear that on the issue of preventing Iran from going nuclear -- and on the crucial issue of nonproliferation -- India's record is not encouraging," he said.

Squassoni suggested that some kinds of Indian support might be more important than others, for example, in backing a diplomatic drive to pursue negotiations with Iran or by coming aboard the US-led Proliferation Security Initiative aimed at containing the spread of unconventional weapons.

She said Indias long relationship with Iran and its support of Non-Aligned Movement (NAM) positions on nonproliferation "are obstacles" to Indias taking a hard line on Iran.

Yet, the Bush Administration, she added, had asserted that US-India nuclear cooperation would bring India into the "nonproliferation mainstream."

US weapons experts have warned that forging a civilian nuclear agreement with non-NPT member India would not only make it harder to enforce rules against renegades Iran and North Korea, but also set a dangerous precedent for other countries with nuclear ambitions.

Lawmakers Concerned About U.S.-India Nuclear Trade Deal (WP)

By Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

Congressional leaders requested a secret intelligence assessment of India's nuclear program and its government's ties to Iran in January amid concerns about a White House effort to provide nuclear technology to New Delhi. Ten months later, as the Senate prepares to vote on nuclear trade with India, the intelligence assessment has yet to be seen on Capitol Hill, congressional and intelligence sources say.

The pending nuclear deal with India would reverse years of U.S. policies aimed at preventing the spread of nuclear weapons. U.S. law forbids selling civilian nuclear technology to countries such as India that have refused to sign the Non-Proliferation Treaty. Arms-control experts, concerned that the deal would have major ramifications for U.S. efforts to stop nuclear programs in Iran and North Korea, said yesterday that the White House plan would allow India to rapidly increase its nuclear arsenal.

For the Bush administration, the deal is part of a strategy to accelerate India's rise as a regional counterweight to China. Further, officials have argued that a nuclear arsenal in the hands of democratic India, which conducted its first nuclear test in 1974, would not be a threat to the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0094839

The White House wants legislation for the deal approved by the lame-duck Congress and is hoping the Senate will vote on it by Friday. The bill would carve out an India-specific exception to long-standing laws that forbid nuclear trade with countries that have not signed the NPT. Sen. Harry M. Reid (Nev.), who will become majority leader when Democrats take control of the Senate in January, has said that he wants the India bill to come up before the current Congress ends in December.

In July, the House voted in favor of a similar bill. Lawmakers did not know at the time that the Bush administration was planning to sanction two Indian firms for selling missile parts to Iran -- a fact that seemed to undercut administration assurances that India's nonproliferation record is excellent.

Democrats later accused the administration of deception, and Senate and House staff members said yesterday that they are concerned that the White House is still pushing for congressional approval without providing needed information, such as the intelligence report.

In a Jan. 23 letter to John D. Negroponte, director of national intelligence, the ranking chairmen of the House and Senate foreign relations panels asked for "an interagency assessment" of India's nuclear program, its record of proliferation and its ties to Iran. The letter was signed by Reps. Henry J. Hyde (R-Ill.) and Tom Lantos (D-Calif.) and Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.) -- all of whom have been generally supportive of the India deal but have raised concerns about the proliferation implications and about India's relations with Iran.

The four asked Negroponte to assess how India is implementing its nonproliferation commitments, the adequacy of its export controls and the movement into and out of India of materials to make weapons of mass destruction.

Much of the deal rests on assurances that India will separate its nuclear and civilian facilities so that the United States can be certain that the nuclear technology it provides will go only to the civilian energy side. With a population of 1 billion, India has vast energy needs and civilian technology would help it to modernize. But the arrangement would also free up India's nuclear infrastructure so that it could be devoted solely to weapons.

The letter asked the intelligence community to gauge the extent to which the deal "may enhance India's ability to produce fissile material for weapons." The senators also asked for a full assessment of India's positions on Iran.

In a Feb. 9 response to the letter, Negroponte wrote: "We look forward to providing the necessary information in the near future." Copies of both letters were read to The Washington Post. Negroponte's office said yesterday that it could not comment on the letters or the status of the assessment.

Several congressional sources said that the National Intelligence Council provided two oral briefings, in March and April, that focused on the history of U.S.-India relations as well as the beginnings of India's nuclear program, but that the briefings did not address the specific information requested in the letter. "We expect a written intelligence product," one Republican said. Four other staff members -- two Democrats and two Republicans -- also said that they expected a complete intelligence assessment that responds point by point to the issues raised in the letter. All spoke on the condition of anonymity, fearing that public comment would put their congressional jobs at risk.

The terms of a U.S.-India accord, worked out in secret in 2005, took Congress by surprise. Congress must approve any final deal before it can be implemented. While both parties support a strategic alliance with India, some have voiced concerns about its strong ties to Iran.

Tehran and New Delhi signed an extensive agreement in 2003 and their military, scientific, political and economic ties are growing.

A report issued yesterday by the Congressional Research Service, which does in-depth analysis for Congress, said that "India's long relationship with Iran" made it unlikely that India would take a hard line on Tehran. India does not support nuclear weapons for Iran, but "its views of the Iranian threat and appropriate responses differ significantly from U.S. views."

The report also found that entities in India and Iran "appear to have engaged in very limited nuclear, chemical and missile related transfers over the years."

Commerce Secretary Embraces Trade Negotiations With China (WSJ)

By Andrew Batson

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

BEIJING -- Secretary of Commerce Carlos Gutierrez urged continued negotiation -- rather than confrontation -- with China on ways to address its yawning trade gap with the U.S., saying China's leaders are moving forward with measures to address major complaints such as counterfeiting.

Mr. Gutierrez, speaking yesterday after meetings with officials including Chinese Premier Wen Jiabao and Minister of Commerce Bo Xilai, admitted he still needs more concrete results if he is to quiet domestic critics of his approach. The U.S. trade deficit with China is on track this year to far exceed last year's record $202 billion, while the Democratic victory in last week's congressional elections creates new political pressure to address trade concerns.

DOJ_NMG_0094840

"The important thing is that there is a great deal of understanding of what needs to be done" among top Chinese officials, Mr. Gutierrez said. "Obviously the proof always is in the results, and we know that we have a lot of work to do to continue to deliver results."

Mr. Wen expressed hope that negotiations could help avoid a more serious breakdown in trade relations. "Facts prove that consultation and dialogue are the right way to settle bilateral economic and trade frictions. Trade protectionism will only harm the common interests of both sides," the official Xinhua news agency quoted him as saying during his meeting with Mr. Gutierrez.

Reducing piracy and counterfeiting in China has become a major goal of U.S. and European trade policy. Mr. Gutierrez pointed to cooperation between Chinese and U.S. law enforcement on cases involving counterfeit drugs, favorable rulings from Chinese courts on the trademarks and patents of U.S. companies, and new enforcement actions against the piracy of DVDs, CDs, and college textbooks.

The Bush administration has faced pressure from lawmakers to file a case at the World Trade Organization against China's intellectual-property practices. Mr. Gutierrez said the U.S. isn't ruling out that option, but he emphasized that "our preference is to solve issues through dialogue."

Mr. Gutierrez, in an interview, said he also continued to lobby China to grant improved access to markets like financial services, film and retail.

U.S. Warns China On Piracy, Market Access (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

BEIJING, Nov. 14 -- Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez said Tuesday that he is telling concerned Chinese officials that the best way to avoid trade restrictions from the new Democratic-controlled Congress is to act swiftly on U.S. complaints about brand pirating and market access.

"We don't want to give anyone the justification for protectionist trade policies, which we think would be a big mistake," Gutierrez said in an interview at a U.S.-sponsored roundtable on intellectual property rights.

The suggestion from Gutierrez responded to worries among some Chinese officials and other specialists that Democrats assuming House and Senate committee chairmanships will be less friendly toward China than their outgoing Republican counterparts, particularly on such issues as trade and human rights.

The presumptive incoming speaker of the House, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), has been noted here as a particular critic of the Communist Party government and its human rights record. In general, Chinese specialists said, Democratic leaders also seem more willing than Republicans to lend a sympathetic ear to complaints from labor unions that U.S. jobs are being lost as companies expand to China, seeking to benefit from a cheap workforce.

Gutierrez said the danger of protectionist measures in Congress had been a subject of concern during his three previous trips to China as commerce secretary. Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) last year stirred worries here by seeking punitive 27.5 percent duties on Chinese products unless Beijing revalued its currency against the dollar. The effort went nowhere under the Republicans, but concerns have arisen anew in China since Democrats gained control of both houses of Congress in last week's midterm elections.

The underlying problem, China's trade surplus with the United States, has not subsided. The U.S. deficit with China was $202 billion last year and hit $166 billion in the first nine months of this year. Heeding U.S. concerns, China has allowed its currency, the yuan, to revalue slightly against the dollar over the past six months, but at a rate dismissed as too slow and too little by Schumer and other critics.

"Those who espouse protectionism as a legitimate economic policy have a loud voice," Gutierrez said in a speech to participants in the roundtable discussion that addressed those concerns. "They cite specific imbalances. And they point to the lack of robust protection" of intellectual property "in China as a top reason why we should put protectionist policies in place. This would be the wrong course. However, we can't disprove the critics with rhetoric. We need results."

Specifically, Gutierrez said China should strike harder at criminal groups that pirate U.S. brands, enacting laws that make prosecution easier. In response, China's commerce minister, Bo Xilai, told reporters that Chinese prosecutors are bringing more cases against counterfeiters and that the government has financed 50 centers around the country to gather information on intellectual property violations.

In practice, however, knockoff brands have become part of the scene in Beijing and other Chinese cities, where street vendors openly hawk pirated DVD movies and small shops sell fake designer labels. Although police occasionally crack down, enforcement has been sporadic at best, in part because the livelihoods of many poor merchants depend on such trade.

Gutierrez said greater market access for U.S. movie companies also could help discourage such trade, making legitimate discs more available. Banking and retail merchandising are two other areas where regulations should be loosened to allow U.S. business greater freedom to operate, he said.

Although the deficit remains large, since China's accession to the World Trade Organization, U.S. exports to China have grown about 20 percent a year, making China the fourth-largest U.S. export market, Bo told Gutierrez. So far this year, they have risen 34 percent over the comparable period last year, totaling $40.2 billion.

U.S. Official Presses China To Punish Piracy (NYT)

By David Lague

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

BEIJING, Nov. 14 — China should intensify its fight against intellectual property theft with a crackdown on organized crime gangs that are responsible for widespread copyright piracy, Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez said Tuesday.

As the United States maintained pressure on China to curb rampant counterfeiting, Mr. Gutierrez called on Beijing to make it easier to prosecute criminals who steal intellectual property.

He said contacts between American and Chinese legal authorities and recent enforcement actions had revealed that organized crime was involved in many piracy cases.

“These are criminal organizations and one of the things they do is run a supply chain for illicit goods, pirated goods,” Mr. Gutierrez said during an interview on the second day of a four-day visit to China at the head of an American business delegation. “This is organized crime. One day it could be T-shirts, the next day it could be watches and the next day it could be medicines.”

With China on track to record a huge trade surplus with the United States this year, Mr. Gutierrez renewed a warning that intellectual property theft in China was a threat to trade ties.

Protectionists in the United States have become an increasingly vocal group, he said in a speech to business executives, adding, “and they point to the lack of robust I.P. protection in China as a top reason why we should put protectionist policies in place.”

Mr. Gutierrez said the theft of intellectual property was costing United States businesses an estimated $2.3 billion a year.

Mr. Gutierrez acknowledged that the Chinese authorities were stepping up their efforts to enforce laws protecting intellectual property. He noted the recent Chinese seizures of counterfeit Tamiflu, a drug used to treat influenza, in an operation that involved cooperation with United States law enforcement agencies.

Envoys To Work On Nuclear Talks Strategy (AP)

By Bo-mi Lim

AP, November 15, 2006

Nuclear envoys from the United States, South Korea and Japan will meet Wednesday to seek a common strategy ahead of the resumption of long-stalled nuclear disarmament talks with North Korea, officials said.

The U.S. and its top two Asian allies planned to meet on the sidelines of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit in Vietnam where North Korea is expected to be a dominant theme.

South Korea said Tuesday the six-party disarmament talks that broke down in 2005 could resume by mid-December. The U.S. administration has ruled out a first meeting in November but said it hoped for a session in December.

North Korea agreed to return to the talks after it shocked the world by testing a nuclear device on Oct. 9, a move that triggered U.N. sanctions.

"We have said all along that we want to start the six-party talks as soon as possible but a key element of that is to be well prepared because when we do start, we want to be sure that we can really make progress," U.S. nuclear envoy Christopher Hill said Tuesday.

Hill will meet South Korea's top nuclear negotiator Chun Yung-woo and Japan's Kenichiro Sasae Wednesday morning to consider ways to pressure Pyongyang to give up its nuclear weapons program. China and Russia are also parties to the talks.

"It's a process for coordinating the positions of partner countries before the six-party talks," a Japanese government official in Hanoi said Tuesday of the upcoming meeting.

The impoverished North has often pursued a strategy of brinksmanship to gain aid and security guarantees. Chun said Tuesday that talks must be substantive.

"There should not be a breakdown," Chun Yung-woo told reporters after flying into Hanoi. "If we do not make substantial progress, the future for the six-party talks will be very unclear. There should not be talks for the sake of talks."

There are divisions among the parties to the talks over how strongly to enforce U.N. sanctions against the North for its nuclear test. Japan and the U.S. have called for tough measures, while South Korea favors a softer approach.

DOJ_NMG_0094842

Seoul said Monday it will not fully participate in a U.S.-led Proliferation Security Initiative that is largely aimed at stopping North Korean weapons traffic at sea, insisting it is doing enough to prevent the North's proliferation.

Another major sticking point at the nuclear talks is North Korea's demand that the U.S. lift financial restrictions imposed for the communist regime's alleged illegal activities, which Washington says include counterfeiting and money laundering.

The last round of six-party talks was a year ago, when negotiators failed to make progress toward implementing an earlier agreement in which the North agreed to give up its nuclear programs in exchange for aid and security guarantees.

The 21-nation APEC bloc, formed in 1989 as an economic forum, was scheduled to meet on Saturday and Sunday. A draft APEC joint communique did not mention North Korea, though it stressed the general importance of ensuring security to advance the prosperity of the region, saying the leaders are "determined to continue efforts to combat terrorism."

A final version of the declaration will be released after leaders including President Bush, Chinese President Hu Jintao, Russian President Vladimir Putin and Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe wrap up their weekend summit in Vietnam's capital Hanoi.

US Envoy Says NKorea Talks Could Come In Early December (AFP)

By Peter Harmsen

AFP, November 15, 2006

Envoys involved in six-party talks on dismantling North Korea's nuclear program are scrambling to set a date to resume negotiations next month, the chief US delegate said.

"We have been in very close contact with the Chinese lately, and I think we do want to try to fix the date very soon," Christopher Hill told reporters after meeting with his South Korean counterpart, Chung Yung-Woo, in Hanoi.

"We will probably use the next few weeks to be very busy and maybe begin the talks sometime in early December," added Hill, who went directly into a trilateral meeting with Chung and Japanese negotiator Kenichiro Sasae.

The flurry of diplomatic activity came on the sidelines of a week-long Asia Pacific gathering, bringing together key Pacific Rim countries including the five states involved in the talks with North Korea.

The North's nuclear program was expected to be one of the key issues addressed by ministers and leaders at the annual summit of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) forum in the Vietnamese capital.

The APEC gathering comes less than two weeks after Pyongyang agreed in secret negotiations in Beijing to return to the six-nation talks, which involve the two Koreas, China, Japan, Russia and the United States.

The negotiations, stalled a year ago when the North walked out over US action to freeze its accounts in a Macau bank, are aimed at convincing the regime of Kim Jong-Il to abandon its nuclear ambitions.

"We had a good discussion on how we might structure the next round of the six-party talks," Hill said of his talks with his South Korean counterpart.

"That will be the main subject of the trilateral meeting" with Sasae, he added.

"We all feel the process really needs to show progress and this is why we need to plan this next round very carefully."

North Korea sparked international concern in July when it test-fired seven ballistic missiles, and then stunned the world in October with its first atom bomb test which triggered UN sanctions against the reclusive communist regime.

The North is the only one of the six nations involved in the talks that is not a member of APEC.

The US negotiator said there was "great harmony" among the five nations as to how to handle the North Korean crisis.

When asked why envoys from China and Russia had not met the other three negotiators in Hanoi on Wednesday, a Japanese official said the five nations did not want Pyongyang to feel that they were "ganging up" on the regime.

"The final objective is not to antagonize North Korea, but for them to abandon their nuclear program," he said.

APEC leaders are to express "strong support for a diplomatic solution" to the crisis and "concern" over last month's atom bomb test, according to a draft joint communique obtained Wednesday by AFP.

The leaders will call for quick implementation of a September 2005 agreement under which North Korea agreed to scrap its nuclear program in exchange for energy and economic aid, and resumption of the six-party talks as soon as possible.

The Japanese official said APEC leaders were unlikely to issue a separate statement on North Korea, which would be seen as a more direct expression of concern than references to the crisis in a final joint communique.

"APEC is not a framework to have such a statement," he told AFP.

Bush Off To Asia To Talk Trade, Grapple With Korean Nuclear Crisis (AFP)

By P. Parameswaran

AFP, November 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0094843

US President George W. Bush has left to nail down trade ties with Asia and grapple with the North Korean nuclear crisis on his first foreign trip since his party's drubbing in legislative elections.

The US leader will transit in Moscow, where he will hold a brief airport meeting with Russian President Vladimir Putin, before arriving in the staunch ally city state of Singapore on the first leg of his regional trip.

He would also visit Indonesia, the world's most populous Muslim nation, and Vietnam, where he would attend a summit of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) forum at the communist nation's capital Hanoi.

Bush would discuss with Putin, Chinese President Hu Jintao, Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe and other leaders of the 21-member APEC group issues ranging from a prospective Asia-Pacific free trade agreement to terrorism and nuclear proliferation.

"One of the things that the President likes about the APEC summit is when you get 21 leaders of economies together you get a lot of opportunities for discussion," a senior US official said ahead of the eight-day trip.

Aside from meetings with leaders of Singapore, Indonesia and Vietnam during his visit to these nations, Bush would hold one-on-one talks with his counterparts from China, Japan, South Korea, Russia and Australia on the sidelines of the APEC summit.

He would also hold a meeting with a group of all seven Southeast Asian leaders attending the APEC summit -- from Brunei, Indonesia, Malaysia, the Philippines, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam.

Steps aimed at ending North Korea's nuclear weapons drive and removing barriers to investment and trade are expected to be among key topics in both the APEC and bilateral meetings, US officials said.

For the first time, Bush and the other APEC leaders will discuss the feasibility of forging a free trade agreement among the 21 economies, which account for nearly half of world trade and generate 70 percent of global economic growth, the officials said.

The free trade plan comes amid a deadlock in talks to forge a new global trade accord.

Accompanied by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Bush will also have the opportunity at APEC to meet with four of the six players in multilateral talks aimed at ending North Korea's nuclear arms ambitions.

They would "discuss what we should try and accomplish when we do begin the next round of the six-party talks," US officials said.

Following its defiant missile launches and nuclear weapons tests, North Korea has agreed to return to talks with the United States, Russia, China, Japan and South Korea.

The six-party talks to resume in Beijing possibly next month is to explore an effective channel in which North Korea could abandon its atomic weapons in return for energy and other aid and diplomatic and security guarantees.

"You could not ask for better diplomacy since the detonation of the nuclear weapon in North Korea than what you've seen from the United States, China, Japan, and even, to a lesser extent, South Korea," said Kurt Cambell, a former senior Pentagon official.

Bush's national security advisor Steve Hadley said the rapidly growing Southeast Asian region was of "great importance" to the United States and that the US leader would seek to "reaffirm the centrality of the freedom agenda" and "continue to encourage efforts in the war on terror" as well as highlight "the principles of good governance, investment in people and economic freedom.

The United States is the biggest investor and top export market for the region.

But even before making his trip, Bush suffered a setback of sorts Tuesday when the House of Representative abandoned plans to vote again on a bill to grant "permanent normal trade relations" (PNTR) status to Vietnam.

The blow came a week after his Republican party was routed in legislative elections and lost control of Congress.

Bush had wanted to grant Vietnam PNTR on his maiden visit to the former battlefield enemy state.

A vote on the bill failed Monday and the House had wanted to make another attempt to pass it on Wednesday but an official said it had been postponed to possibly next month.

It is believed a number of labor unions were reported to have whipped up opposition to the planned legislation.

The Road To Damascus (NYT)

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert, got what he wanted most out of his White House meeting with President Bush on Monday — a reiteration of America's uncompromising bargaining position on the Iranian nuclear issue. Tough talk is fine, but not enough. Washington could put greater pressure on Iran and perhaps advance another urgent Israeli concern, disarming Hezbollah, by dropping its resistance to high-level talks with Syria.

DOJ_NMG_0094844

Whenever such talks are proposed, Mr. Bush and Mr. Olmert point out the many objectionable policies of Syria's president, Bashar al-Assad. That misses the point. Diplomacy is not simply a matter of rewarding countries that act the way Washington likes. It can also be a useful tool for trying to induce countries like Syria to behave more constructively.

With Iran now asserting that it has achieved international acceptance as a nuclear state and Syria's Lebanese allies again challenging the Beirut government, it is time to give direct diplomacy with Syria a serious try.

Chipping away at Lebanon's sovereignty or Israel's security to win Syria's good will would, of course, be a disastrous mistake. But without crossing those red lines it might be possible for Washington to wean Damascus away from its alliance of convenience with Tehran. Syria and Iran are not natural or inevitable allies. Washington's clumsy attempts to ostracize both regimes have managed to tighten their mutual embrace.

One crucial difference between them is that Iran is thumbing its nose at international diplomacy so it can continue to learn how to enrich bomb grade uranium, and Syria is not. That is a distinction Washington needs to recognize and exploit. A Syria detached from Iran and engaged by the United States could conceivably be enlisted in reviving the Arab-Israeli peace effort and containing the spreading chaos in Iraq. Syria's national interests in both areas at least partially intersect with those of the United States and Israel.

Mr. Olmert was right to sound the alarm about an Iran that continues to advance its nuclear capabilities while its president calls for Israel's destruction. For now, the most effective response would be a full-court diplomatic press, combined with an escalating menu of international sanctions until Iran agrees to halt uranium enrichment. With the threat from Iran so clear, this is no time to invent more reasons for not talking to Syria.

Iran's Leader Cites Nuclear Progress (NYT)

By William J. Broad and Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

Iran's president declared yesterday that his country's nuclear program was nearing an important milestone, even as international atomic inspectors reported that they had found unexplained traces of plutonium and that Tehran continued to be so uncooperative in answering questions that they had been unable to confirm earlier claims of progress.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's statement that Iran hoped soon to master the nuclear fuel cycle came as world powers, suspicious that Iran is seeking the means to make atom bombs, are trying to agree on a regimen of sanctions. Iran says it wants only to fuel reactors and generate electricity.

"I hope we can have our celebration of Iran's full nuclearization this year," Mr. Ahmadinejad said during a news conference in Tehran, apparently referring to a program that could do everything from extracting uranium ore from the ground to enriching it into reactor fuel. Iran's calendar ends in March.

In its latest report on the Iranian nuclear program, the International Atomic Energy Agency, based in Vienna, said Tehran was moving ahead with its efforts to purify uranium while refusing to answer basic questions about its atomic program.

For instance, the report said Iran had failed to provide full access to records needed to confirm its claims in June of having enriched uranium to a level of 5 percent, which is suitable for reactors.

The report also said inspectors had made no progress in resolving the origin of previously discovered traces of highly enriched uranium, which can fuel atomic bombs. In September, the agency disclosed the discovery of the particles on a container from a waste storage site at Karaj, not far from Tehran, but withheld judgment about where the material came from and whether it could be linked to a secret nuclear weapons program.

Finally, the report said inspectors had recently found traces of yet another unexplained particle — plutonium — on samples from containers at Karaj and was assessing a response from Tehran about its origin. Plutonium, like uranium, can fuel atom bombs. "Unless Iran addresses the long outstanding verification issues," the report concluded, the atomic agency "will remain unable to make further progress in its efforts to verify the absence of undeclared nuclear material and activities."

The report was sent to the 35 countries on the atomic agency's decision-making board before its regularly scheduled quarterly session in Vienna on Thursday and Friday of next week. It was distributed on a confidential basis yesterday but was quickly made available to reporters.

In Tehran, Mr. Ahmadinejad once again defied international demands to suspend uranium enrichment and reiterated Iran's ultimate enrichment goal — to expand its program to an industrial level with 60,000 centrifuges.

In a news conference with Iranian journalists, he also brushed off suggestions by other senior authorities that Iran might suspend the reactor-fuel program, saying there was no way Iran would turn back.

Mr. Ahmadinejad said Iran had prepared itself to confront possible sanctions. "Nothing has been passed against Iran yet, but we are ready for any condition," he said. "They will do their best, and so will we. In the end, the winner is whoever stands more firmly."

He said Iran was willing to hold talks with the United States if it changed its attitude. “We want to have good relations with all countries, but they have a certain attitude and think they own the world,” he said. “Our people cannot tolerate that.” He said he would soon send a message to the American people that would explain the viewpoint of Iranians.

So far, Iran has built two cascades of 164 centrifuges for uranium enrichment — the process of purification used to make nuclear reactor fuel and, at great purity, the core of an atom bomb. It has announced that it wants to have 3,000 centrifuges operating by March 2007.

Nuclear experts have estimated that it could take a plant of 3,000 centrifuges as little as nine months to make 55 pounds of highly enriched uranium — enough for anywhere from one to five small nuclear weapons, depending on the skill of the bomb makers.

Intelligence analysts say Iran could be anywhere from three to nine years away from having the ability to build an atom bomb.

IAEA Reports On Discovery At Iran Facility (WP/AP)

Associated Press

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

VIENNA, Nov. 14 -- New traces of plutonium and enriched uranium, potential material for atomic warheads, have been found at a nuclear waste facility in Iran, the International Atomic Energy Agency reported Tuesday, as Iran's president boasted that his country's nuclear fuel program would soon be completed.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, at a news conference in Tehran, asserted that the world had no choice but to "live with a nuclear Iran," but conceded that his country was "still in the first stages" of its uranium enrichment program.

He also said Iran would talk to the United States if it "corrects its behavior," but the White House said there would be no discussions until Tehran took a more constructive role in the region.

Ahmadinejad did not define the scope of any talks with the United States, nor did he say that Iraq or the nuclear dispute would be on the agenda of such discussions.

So far, Iran has been able to activate only two experimental enrichment plants that U.N. officials say have broken down frequently and have produced only small amounts of material suitable for nuclear fuel.

But Iran has progressed enough since resuming enrichment activities in February to provoke a U.N. Security Council demand that it freeze its program. Iran has refused, saying it intends to move toward large-scale uranium enrichment.

The IAEA board in February reported Iran to the Security Council, suggesting it had breached the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and might be trying to make nuclear weapons.

Tuesday's IAEA report, prepared for next week's meeting of the agency's 35-nation board, also faulted Iran for lack of cooperation.

The U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John R. Bolton, said Ahmadinejad's comments and the IAEA's latest discoveries "both demonstrate the urgency for the Security Council to act on Iran." He said sanctions were "obviously the only means to get Iran's attention."

A senior U.N. official familiar with the report cautioned against reading too much into the findings of traces of highly enriched uranium and plutonium, saying that Iran had explained both and that they could plausibly be classified as byproducts of peaceful nuclear activities.

The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the report publicly, said that although the uranium was enriched to a higher level than needed to generate power, it was below weapons grade.

Iran Says It Will Be ‘fully Nuclear’ Soon (FT)

By Gareth Smyth

Financial Times, November 15, 2006

Iran’s President Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad on Tuesday promised a “celebration of Iran’s full nuclearisation” before the end of the Iranian year next March and said the US and its allies had “finally agreed to live with . . . an Iran possessing the nuclear fuel cycle”.

Mr Ahmadi-Nejad did not explain his claims, which came at a news conference. But he was at pains to defend his record at home and abroad in the run-up to next month’s municipal council elections when his government faces its first nationwide popularity test.

The US state department said Mr Ahmadi-Nejad’s comments should represent “a cold jolt to the rest of the world”. But a more sober picture of Iran’s nuclear progress was painted by an International Atomic Energy Agency report on Iran obtained by the Financial Times.

The report, sent out on Tuesday to the governors of the nuclear watchdog, confirms that Iran is now principally using two "cascades" of 164 centrifuges apiece to enrich uranium. This means the country still falls well short of the 3,000 or so centrifuges that would be needed to enrich uranium on an industrial scale.

The report adds that between mid-August and the beginning of this month, Iran says it fed 34kg of feedstock into the centrifuges and that this was enriched to a level of 5 per cent – which is suitable for nuclear fuel but not for weapons grade material.

Mr Ahmadi-Nejad's news conference, to which the international media was not invited, concentrated on domestic issues as the president responded to criticisms he has faced in recent months, especially over rising prices and unemployment.

He claimed foreign investment in the non-oil sector had reached $7.2bn (€5.6bn, £3.8bn) in the first seven months of this year, up from $4.3bn in the whole of last year, and that the government had created 144,000 jobs in small industries.

But the president was also keen to assert Iran's success in developing its nuclear programme, as western powers struggle to even agree a draft sanctions resolution with Russia and China nine months after the issue was referred to the UN security council. Mr Ahmadi-Nejad said he would respond to requests from "many American people to talk to them" with a letter explaining Iran's policies – even though he received no response when he wrote in May to President George W. Bush.

He may be seeking to gain political capital from the belief in Iran's political class, especially among fundamentalists, that the balance of world power is shifting away from the US. He claimed the "the Iranian nation is the most popular in the world . . . with widening political influence".

While Iranian officials welcomed the Republicans' defeat in mid-term US elections, they have expressed caution as to whether it will lead to any substantive change in Washington's policies towards Iran. But at the same time, officials have stressed that the chance of compromise remains.

Iran's Nuclear Program Progressing, U.N. Agency Says (LAT)

By Alissa J. Rubin

The Los Angeles Times, November 15, 2006

SANCERRE, FRANCE — Iran has slowly but steadily increased its ability to enrich uranium despite international calls to halt its nuclear activities, experts at the International Atomic Energy Agency say in a report released Tuesday.

The report, which became public before a meeting next week by the agency's board of governors, emphasizes that Iran's refusal to answer inspectors' questions about its nuclear activities makes it impossible for the IAEA "to confirm the peaceful nature of Iran's program."

The report also notes that traces of plutonium have been found on storage barrels at a waste facility, in addition to a previously reported finding of highly enriched uranium at the site.

Iran had kept its nuclear program secret for more than 18 years, until 2002, and many questions remain unanswered about whether its effort had, or continues to have, a military goal. Highly enriched uranium is the fissile material needed to make a nuclear bomb.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad did little to reassure world leaders Tuesday. He said at a news conference in Tehran that there would be "the big celebration of Iran's full nuclearization in the current year."

Iran's current calendar year ends March 20.

Iranian officials have said Tehran would have 3,000 centrifuges, used to enrich uranium, operating by the end of their calendar year. Ahmadinejad said Tuesday that the goal was eventually to have 60,000. "We are at the beginning of a wave," he said at the gathering, reported by the official Islamic Republic News Agency.

Although that goal is possible, it would appear to require a drastic acceleration in Iran's program.

The IAEA inspectors are reluctant to make any predictions about the speed with which Iran might move ahead.

The United Nations watchdog agency's inspectors have had increasingly limited information about Iran's nuclear operations since Tehran reduced their access to nuclear facilities early this year. The action came after the nuclear agency's board of governors reported Iran to the U.N. Security Council.

"The IAEA, which is the only reliable set of eye and ears, now is mostly blindfolded, their ears are plugged," said Mark Fitzpatrick, a senior analyst on nuclear nonproliferation at the International Institute for Strategic Studies.

"Iran has been tightening the blindfold, and that's dangerous, because without knowing the real status — how many centrifuges are breaking, how many they are assembling, how many they are manufacturing — the policymakers have to give credence to the worst-case scenarios, and they become wild guesses … and that's dangerous for Iran," Fitzpatrick said.

Information on how many centrifuges are breaking would allow the nuclear agency to gauge how well the groups of linked centrifuges, known as cascades, are working and to better assess Iran's progress.

Similarly the inspectors no longer have access to sites where Iran is fabricating or assembling the centrifuges, making it difficult to judge the accuracy of the Iranian claim that the country is poised to set up 3,000 centrifuges.

As is often the case, Ahmadinejad backtracked and moderated his predictions even before the end of Tuesday's news conference, answering a question: "We want to produce fuel after all. We have to keep going. We have a long way to go to 60,000" centrifuges.

The Bush administration and several European governments fear that Iran intends to use the enriched uranium to build bombs, despite Tehran's insistence that the material would only fuel civilian power stations.

The report and Ahmadinejad's comments came amid debate among permanent Security Council members about which sanctions to apply against Iran to pressure the Islamic state into halting its uranium enrichment activities. The European Union and the U.S. have backed a Security Council resolution that would prevent nuclear technology and related missile technology from being sold to Iran and limit visas for some Iranian officials and students. Russia and China, however, want to moderate the sanctions package.

Many people close to the discussions in European capitals and Washington believe there may be the possibility of a negotiated freeze in Iran's program that could stop Tehran before it becomes capable of producing weapons-grade material. However, that would entail guarantees by the U.S. that it would not seek to change the Iranian regime and a willingness by Washington to hold direct talks with Iran. At the moment both seem remote.

In the meantime, Iran has endeavored to make as much progress as possible toward achieving the full nuclear fuel cycle.

"Iran has been attempting to create facts on the ground for a year or two. They want to be able to say, 'We've already passed that technical milestone,' " said a U.S. diplomat familiar with Iran's program. "Today is another example of that — [Ahmadinejad is] simply trying to say, 'You can't stop us, we're still moving forward,' "

U.S. officials and European diplomats say they are skeptical that Iran could attain the capability to make nuclear weapons in the next couple of years, but Israeli officials believe Tehran already may be so far along that it will be hard to halt its program.

As expected, the nuclear agency's report confirms that Iran began operating a second cascade of 164 centrifuges Oct. 13. The report also notes that uranium gas has been fed into the first cascade only intermittently.

The two cascades are not linked, said senior officials familiar with the IAEA report. If they were linked, Iran could better enrich uranium, some experts said.

Iran Expands Nuclear Ambitions Drawing New US Criticism (AFP)

By Stuart Williams

AFP, November 15, 2006

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad announced ambitions to enrich uranium on a scale that the United States warned would give the Islamic republic the capacity to produce an atomic bomb.

Despite the threat of UN sanctions hanging over Iran for its refusal to suspend uranium enrichment, Ahmadinejad unveiled long-term plans to build 60,000 centrifuges for enrichment. It currently has only 328.

"We want to produce nuclear fuel and eventually we should go for 60,000 centrifuges. We should continue along this path. We are at the beginning of the wave," Ahmadinejad told a news conference.

Iran has previously said it is looking to install 3,000 centrifuges by March 2007, in itself a massive step from the two cascades of 164 centrifuges apiece it has currently at its Natanz plant to enrich uranium on a research scale.

The United States seized on Ahmadinejad's comments as a wake-up call for any doubters that Iran's real goal was the capacity to make an atomic bomb.

"That should be a cold jolt to the rest of the world," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

"What that leads to is an Iranian nuclear weapon, which would be an incredibly destabilizing event in the course of Middle East history."

Experts say that 50,000 centrifuges would normally be sufficient to produce 20 kilos (44 pounds) of weapons grade uranium in under a month, but Iran vehemently denies it wants the bomb, insisting its nuclear programme is for power generation only.

Enrichment is carried out in lines of centrifuges called cascades and is used to make the fuel for civilian nuclear reactors. But in highly enriched form, the uranium can be used to make a nuclear bomb.

Building tens of thousands of centrifuges would take Iran's enrichment programme from its current research level to one where it could produce nuclear fuel on an industrial scale.

World powers wanted Iran to suspend enrichment as a prelude to full-scale negotiations over its atomic programme, a demand that has been repeatedly rejected by Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0094848

"The question of a suspension has now been passed," Ahmadinejad said, shrugging off the prospect of UN sanctions against Iran over its failure to heed Security Council demands to agree one.

"If they put in place sanctions, a new financial order will be put in place."

The Iranian show of defiance comes at an awkward time for the US administration as it comes under mounting pressure to involve Iran and its regional ally Syria in talks on stabilising Iraq, after the drubbing its current policy received at the hands of voters in mid-term elections.

President George W. Bush's spokesman rejected suggestions of a growing gap with his key Iraq ally British Prime Minister Tony Blair on dialogue with Iran after the two leaders gave evidence to a study group rethinking policy on Iraq.

"You have mischaracterized his position," Tony Snow said. "Read his speech, and you'll see there is no difference between the governments."

The Iranian president said talks with the United States could only take place if it changed its "attitude" towards Iran.

"We would talk with the US government but on certain conditions, on the condition that it corrects its attitude," he said.

"And at that moment, we will talk with them as we talk with the others."

Ahmadinejad confidently announced he would soon send a personal message to the American people.

"I am in the process of preparing it," he said. "The message will elaborate upon the viewpoints of the Iranian nation, because many Americans asked me for it."

In its latest report on Iran's nuclear programme, a copy of which was obtained by AFP, the International Atomic Energy Agency said Iran was still not enriching uranium beyond the five percent level sufficient for use as reactor fuel.

From August 13 to November 2, Iran fed "a total of approximately 34 kilogrammes" (75 pounds) of feedstock uranium gas into centrifuges, producing a small amount of uranium enriched to low levels, the report said.

It did not detail how much uranium was produced but said enrichment levels seemed to be below five percent, nowhere near the 90 percent level needed to make atom bombs.

Ahmadinejad: Iran Open To Talk With U.S. (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini

AP, November 15, 2006

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Tuesday that Iran would talk to the United States if it "corrects its behavior," but the White House said there would be no discussions until Tehran took a more constructive role in the region.

Ahmadinejad's comment was the highest-level Iranian statement in recent months that the government is willing to talk to Washington, which it has long demonized as "the Great Satan." It also came a day after British Prime Minister Tony Blair advocated seeking Tehran's help in ending the violence in Iraq.

At a news conference, Ahmadinejad did not spell out any other conditions for U.S.-Iranian talks, but he accused the Bush administration of pursuing a foreign policy based on aggression, oppression, unilateralism and disrespect for other nations.

Ahmadinejad did not define the scope of any talks with the United States, nor did he say that Iraq or the nuclear dispute would be on the agenda of such discussions.

At the news conference, Ahmadinejad said: "We are after positive interaction with the whole world, excluding a country that we don't recognize" — a reference to Israel.

"We won't talk to the Zionist regime because it is a usurper and an illegitimate entity. But we will talk to the U.S. government under certain conditions. Should it correct its behavior, we will talk to them," the president said.

In Washington, White House National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe said: "I don't think this is about a U.S. attitude adjustment. The collective attitude of the world is that Iran needs to play a constructive role in the region, not meddle in Iraq and stop its enrichment activities."

The United States and the Iraqi government have long accused Iran of aiding the insurgency in Iraq — a charge Iran denies. Johndroe pointed out that Blair had said Monday that Iran must stop interfering in Iraq and cease uranium enrichment.

Iran has proposed talks with the United States about Iraq twice this year, first in March and then on Nov. 5. In the most recent proposal, Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini said Tehran would consider talks with the U.S. over regional issues, including Iraq, if Washington requested.

Weeks after the first proposal of talks, Iran withdrew the offer. When Tehran renewed the offer this month, analysts said that Iran was concerned about the escalating turmoil in Iraq and might also be seeking to slow Washington's push for sanctions over its nuclear program.

The United States welcomed the first offer of talks, but said the negotiations would be confined to Iraq.

On Tuesday, President Bush said his line on Iran was: "We are willing to come to the table with the European Union, as well as Russia and China to discuss a way forward" in relations.

DOJ_NMG_0094849

Speaking to reporters at the White House, Bush said repeated the condition that he set weeks ago — that for talks, Iran must agree to verifiably suspend its uranium enrichment activities.

One option under discussion at one point by a bipartisan Iraq Study Group headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton was for greater cooperation with Iran and Syria.

Hamas Insists It Won't Recognize Israel (AP)

By Karin Laub

AP, November 15, 2006

Hamas insisted Tuesday it would not recognize Israel even after a unity government takes power in the Palestinian territories, complicating efforts to form a more moderate coalition that would clear the way for vital foreign aid.

The militant Islamic group suggested, however, that the emerging coalition would be free to stake out a different position, apparently hoping the ambiguity in its statements will allow it to preserve its anti-Israel ideology but loosen international sanctions that have crippled the Palestinian economy.

The tough talk came despite Hamas' promises to Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas that it would refrain from incendiary public statements during the delicate coalition talks.

Abbas was meeting with the leaders of Jordan and Egypt on Tuesday and Wednesday to win their blessing for what he hopes will be a broader package deal, including not only formation of a moderate government, but also a cease-fire with Israel and an Israel-Hamas prisoner swap.

On Wednesday, envoys of the so-called Quartet of Mideast mediators — the United States, the U.N., the European Union and Russia — were to meet in Cairo, in part to be briefed on the coalition talks. Abbas met the U.S. envoy, Assistant Secretary of State David Welch, on Tuesday night.

President Bush also called Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, a key peace meditator, to discuss the latest developments, Egypt's semi-official Middle East News Agency reported.

For Abbas' plan to work, Israel and the West must accept the premise that Hamas is largely ceding power by making room for a 24-member Cabinet of independent administrators — even though the Islamic militants get to appoint nine of the ministers and would retain considerable control.

The monthslong deadlock over whether the new government would recognize Israel is to be solved by a division of labor: Abbas and his Palestine Liberation Organization would lead peace talks with Israel, while the government of experts runs daily life in the Palestinian territories.

In such a constellation, the argument goes, the government does not need to take a position on whether to recognize Israel or renounce violence, because it deals with more mundane issues.

However, the international community has demanded such declarations in exchange for lifting its aid boycott.

So far, Israel and the West have withheld judgment on Abbas' efforts — and the latest Hamas comments might make it harder for the Palestinian leader to market a future agreement.

Moussa Abu Marzouk, a top official in Hamas' exiled leadership, said demands that the group recognize Israel are "illegal and illegitimate."

However, Abu Marzouk and other spokesmen differentiated between Hamas and a new government. "It's not Hamas that will pronounce on this subject," he said.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the Palestinian political activity is an indication of Hamas' inability to govern. "It's a simple reflection of the reality that because of their policies, they have failed," he said.

Despite the latest damper, negotiators reported more progress Tuesday, saying they reached agreement on the division of Cabinet portfolios. Hamas would choose nine ministers, Fatah would appoint six, and four smaller factions would pick one each. Five more independent ministers would require the approval of Hamas and Fatah, negotiators said.

On Monday, the two sides reached agreement in principle on a new prime minister — U.S.-educated microbiologist Mohammed Shabir, former president of the Islamic University in Gaza City. Shabir, 60, has ties to both Hamas and Fatah.

One sticking point could be control over the Interior Ministry, in charge of key branches of the security forces. Hamas seeks guarantees that its Executive Force, a security branch it set up in recent months, will not be dismantled, but Abbas has not made any promises.

In Cairo on Tuesday night, Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit said the peace process could also be advanced if Israel and the Palestinians would agree to swap the Israeli corporal whom Hamas-allied militants kidnapped in June with some Palestinians detained in Israeli prisons.

US Confirms Meeting Of Mideast Peace Quartet (AFP)

AFP, November 15, 2006

The sponsors of the Middle East peace process will meet in Cairo Wednesday to discuss efforts to revive negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians, the State Department confirmed.

US Middle East envoy David Welch will represent Washington at the meeting with his counterparts from Russia, the European Union and the United Nations -- a grouping known as the Middle East "quartet," spokesman Sean McCormack said.

McCormack said the meeting did not signal a major initiative to break a months-long deadlock in peacemaking efforts but an opportunity to "take stock" of the situation.

He also said the meeting was arranged before last week's US elections in which opposition Democrats took control of Congress and immediately pressed President George W. Bush to reinvigorate his Middle East diplomacy.

"A lot of developments, a lot of different things are going on in the Middle East. We all thought this was an appropriate time for the envoys to get together," he said.

A key development to be discussed will be efforts by moderate Palestinian leader Mahmud Abbas to form a new power-sharing government that would sideline members of the radical Islamic movement Hamas, he said.

"This is all part of our diplomacy ... doing what we can here and there to try to make sure that if the Palestinians do produce a government that meets the standards of the quartet statement, then you do have a political horizon that you can potentially move forward," he said.

Welch is also expected to hold separate meetings with Egyptian officials before travelling to Amman for talks the Jordanians, McCormack said.

It was unclear whether Abbas, who was due in Cairo later Tuesday, would join any of the talks.

The meeting follows complaints by Arab countries that the quartet was not doing enough to revive peace talks between the Palestinians and Israelis and unease by Russia over its partners' handling of the deadlock.

Russian President Vladimir Putin called during a visit by Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak to Moscow earlier this month for regional countries to play a bigger role in the deliberations of the quartet.

Moscow has distanced itself from demands made by the quartet earlier this year for the current Islamist-led Palestinian government to renounce violence and recognize Israel and past peace deals.

The European Union and the United States suspended direct aid until the demands are met but Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov last month described them as "unrealistic."

Abbas has been engaged in intensive talks with Islamist prime minister Ismail Haniya on forming a government of national unity acceptable to Western donors.

Arab League assistant secretary general Ahmed Ben Helli hit out at the quartet for not doing enough to rein in the deadly offensive launched by Israel after the capture of a soldier by Gaza-based militants in June.

"Unfortunately the quartet has been absent from every action we have taken. It's a body that has been set up but that is not fit for purpose," Ben Helli said.

He condemned what he described as the "silence" of the quartet in the face of the "Israeli crimes against the Palestinian people" and its "failure to assume its responsibility for relaunching the peace process."

The quartet drafted the roadmap peace plan which has made next to no progress since its launch in 2003.

Egypt Wanes As Power Broker (WSJ)

By Mariam Fam

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

CAIRO, Egypt -- As the White House considers recalibrating its Middle East strategy, an important ally's waning clout in the region underlines some of the challenges ahead: Egypt, which for decades has acted as peacemaker and behind-the-scenes political broker for the U.S. in the Arab world, has seen its status ebb as Mideast dynamics have been shifting.

The destabilization of Iraq, the ascent of the Palestinian militant group Hamas, last summer's war in Lebanon and Iran's resurgent influence have helped erode Cairo's traditional leading role in the region. Egypt remains a strong U.S. ally, but its diminished authority, coupled with internal stagnation, have weakened Egypt's capacity to help the U.S. navigate the region's dicey political waters.

Others, such as Qatar, which is trying to carve out a role as mediator and regional heavyweight, have emerged. And pressure has increased on the Bush administration to reach out directly to Syria and Iran, which it has snubbed despite their undeniable influence in the region's trouble spots. On Monday, President Bush met with members of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which may recommend engaging both those governments to help pacify Iraq.

"The Egyptian role has taken a back seat, to the benefit of other regional powers. The Israeli-Palestinian issue used to be an Egyptian-Jordanian issue, but now it is more influenced by Syria and Iran," said Emad Gad, a senior researcher at the al-Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies in Cairo.

Gehad Auda, a political scientist and an official in Egypt's ruling National Democratic Party, said that despite new challenges, Cairo remains a main force of stabilization in the region and, along with other moderate Arab governments, provides a counterweight to countries such as Syria and Iran. He added that Egyptian diplomacy draws on the country's network of relations to "exert subtle pressure" behind the scenes on various parties. "I believe that in the final analysis, the Egyptian role will come up on the winning side."

Egypt is hosting talks this week involving Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and representatives of the U.S., European Union, Russia and United Nations. In the past, Egypt proved invaluable in helping to secure Washington's goals, such as defusing Israeli-Arab tensions and drumming up Arab support for driving out Iraq after it invaded Kuwait in 1990.

Today, weeks of Egyptian efforts have failed thus far to secure the release of an Israeli soldier captured by Palestinian militants in June. Cairo's attempts to coax Syria away from Iran and back toward the Arab sphere have also come up short. Meanwhile, President Hosni Mubarak's harsh treatment of political opponents -- jailing activists and cracking down on protests -- has undermined President Bush's agenda of fostering democracy in the Mideast.

The U.S.-led toppling of Saddam Hussein in Iraq in 2003 was a watershed. Swapping this longtime Iranian nemesis for a Shiite Muslim-led government empowered the Shiite rulers in Tehran. The ensuing chaos also fostered a closer alliance between Iran and Syria, Iraqi neighbors that U.S. and Iraqi officials have accused of fueling Iraq's disorder. Meanwhile, the resurgent Shiite influence has sparked concern among Sunni Muslim Arab regimes, including stalwart U.S. allies Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Jordan.

Further chipping away at Egypt's clout was Hamas's January victory in elections that were encouraged by the Bush administration. This left rival Fatah, Egypt's close ally among the Palestinians, playing second fiddle in the territories. Keen to maintain its status as regional mediator, Egypt kept communication channels open with Hamas. But the Palestinian group is an outgrowth of the Muslim Brotherhood, an Islamist movement challenging the Mubarak regime at home, and Egypt so far has failed to persuade Hamas to recognize Israel, as demanded by the international community.

In Lebanon, meanwhile, the U.S. democracy push opened the door to Hezbollah, a militant Shiite organization that won enough legislative seats to join the ruling coalition in Beirut. In July, Hezbollah, which is backed by Syria and Iran, kidnapped two Israeli soldiers, igniting a monthlong battle.

To the detriment of established regional powers such as Egypt, the war made heroes of Hezbollah and its leader, Hassan Nasrallah, in the eyes of many Arabs and Muslims angry at Israel and the U.S. Egypt and other so-called moderate Arab regimes -- Jordan, Saudi Arabia and some Persian Gulf states -- alienated many of their people by appearing to be criticizing Hezbollah in the early days of the war.

All along, Egyptian and other Arab officials have argued that the Bush administration's hands-off approach to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, a flash point for many Arabs and Muslims, has exacerbated regional tensions.

Analysts say the Egyptian regime's domestic woes have also contributed to its diminished regional stature. Steps toward democratization -- such as liberalizing the economy, allowing multicandidate presidential elections and tolerating greater freedoms -- have all suffered setbacks. Since last year's presidential election won by Mr. Mubarak -- who has ruled for a quarter century -- authorities have cracked down on protests, arrested activists and bloggers and postponed municipal elections, apparently fearing further gains by the Muslim Brotherhood, which scored big in parliamentary elections last year.

U.S. officials say the Bush administration remains committed to promoting democracy. But many in Egypt say Washington has taken the pressure off the Mubarak regime out of concern that political openings will further strengthen Islamists.

Now, many Arabs hope Democratic control of the U.S. Congress and the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld will usher in changes to U.S. policies in Iraq and elsewhere. But while some sort of shift seems likely in Iraq, few think Arab calls to do more to revive talks between Israel and the Palestinians -- which many analysts deem crucial to strengthening U.S. allies such as Egypt -- will bear fruit soon.

"Realistically, this administration is losing time, and the time left will be devoted to Iraq," said Amr Hamzawy, a senior associate at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in Washington.

U.N. Says Somalis Helped Hezbollah Fighters (NYT)

By Robert F. Worth

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0094852

UNITED NATIONS, Nov. 14 — More than 700 Islamic militants from Somalia traveled to Lebanon in July to fight alongside Hezbollah in its war against Israel, a United Nations report says. The militia in Lebanon returned the favor by providing training and — through its patrons Iran and Syria — weapons to the Islamic alliance struggling for control of Somalia, it adds.

The report, which was disclosed by [a news service] on Monday, appears to be the first indication that foreign fighters assisted Hezbollah during the 34-day conflict, when Israel maintained a tight blockade on Lebanon.

The report also says Iran sought to trade arms for uranium from Somalia to further its nuclear ambitions, though it does not say whether Iran succeeded.

The 86-page report was issued by four experts monitoring violations of a 1992 United Nations arms embargo on Somalia, which was put in place after the country lapsed into civil war and remains in effect. The report is to be discussed Friday at the Security Council.

The panel does not say how the information was obtained. But the members had access to information from the intelligence agencies of the Security Council's 15 current members, including Britain, France, China, Russia and the United States, a United Nations official said.

Any involvement by Somalis would be surprising because Hezbollah's effectiveness is widely attributed to its deep familiarity with the region.

Hezbollah officials could not be reached Tuesday night for comment.

An official at the Israeli mission to the United Nations said he had not seen the report, and was not aware of any Somali fighters having taken part in the conflict with Hezbollah. The official asked not to be identified, citing diplomatic protocol.

While the sources of the information remain unclear, the report is dense with details about arms shipments to the groups vying for power in Somalia.

It states that in mid-July, Aden Hashi Farah, a leader of the Somali Islamist alliance, personally selected about 720 combat-hardened fighters to travel to Lebanon and fight alongside Hezbollah.

At least 100 Somalis had returned by early September — with five Hezbollah members — while others stayed on in Lebanon for advanced military training, the report says. It is not clear how many may have been killed, though the report says some were wounded and later treated after their return to Somalia.

The fighters were paid a minimum of $2,000 for their service, the report says, and as much as $30,000 was to be given to the families of those killed, with money donated by "a number of supporting countries."

In addition to training some Somali militants, Hezbollah "arranged for additional support to be given" by Iran and Syria, including weapons, the report found. On July 27, 200 Somali fighters also traveled to Syria to be trained in guerrilla warfare, the report says.

It also indicates that Iran appears to have sought help in its quest for uranium in Dusa Mareb, the hometown of Sheik Hassan Dahir Aweys, the leader of the Islamist alliance in Somalia, which is known as the Council of Islamic Courts.

"At the time of the writing of this report, there were two Iranians in Dusa Mareb engaged on matters linked to the exploration of uranium in exchange for arms" for the Council of Islamic Courts, says the report, which is dated Oct. 16.

Those claims, if proved, could worsen global tensions over Iran's nuclear program. Iran ignored an Aug. 31 deadline to suspend its uranium enrichment, and the United States has been leading a United Nations effort to impose sanctions.

The United Nations report is focused mostly on the increasingly volatile situation in Somalia, where Islamists took control of the capital, Mogadishu, in June from warlords backed by the United States.

Not only has the volume of arms flowing into Somalia grown, according to the authors, but more sophisticated weapons like surface-to-air missiles are being brought in. The conflict could grow into a regional war, with Somalia's neighbors, Ethiopia and Eritrea, backing opposing sides.

The report also accuses Djibouti, Egypt, Iran, Libya, Saudi Arabia and Syria of supplying the Somali Islamists with arms, advisers and fighters. It says three nations — Ethiopia, Uganda and Yemen — are aligned with the so-called transitional government based in Baidoa, an inland city.

Asked about violations of the arms embargo, the report states, officials in those countries either denied any involvement or failed to answer.

The report recommends that the Security Council blockade Somalia. It also warns urgently against sending any peacekeepers to the country, saying such a force could become "the catalyst that sparks a serious military confrontation between the opposing sides."

U.N. Report Cites Outside Military Aid To Somalia's Islamic Forces (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0094853

UNITED NATIONS, Nov. 14 -- Iran, Syria, Libya, Egypt and the Hezbollah militia in Lebanon are providing arms, training and financing to Islamic militants as they seize political and military control in the East African state of Somalia, according to a confidential U.N. report.

The 86-page report, prepared by a panel of U.N. weapons and financial experts, warned that the conflict could reignite a war between Eritrea, the chief foreign sponsor of the Islamics, and Ethiopia, which is backing Somalia's weak transitional federal government.

The report asserts that a huge inflow of outside military assistance, in violation of a U.N. arms embargo, is contributing to the emergence of an alliance of militants called the Islamic Courts Union as the first Islamic government since the United States overthrew Afghanistan's Taliban in 2002. It warns that Somalia could become the site of insurgency tactics used in Iraq, including "suicide bombers, assassinations and other forms of terrorist and insurgent-type activities."

"The strongly sustained trend toward total military, economic and political dominance by the Islamic Courts Union in central and southern Somalia continues," according to the report by the U.N. Monitoring Group on Somalia, which will be presented to the Security Council this week. "They are currently the most powerful force in Somalia."

The report was obtained Tuesday by The Washington Post; it was first reported Monday by [a news service]. The report's authors recommend that the Security Council tighten a U.N. arms embargo, impose sanctions on Somali individuals and businesses buying weapons, and launch an international diplomatic effort to dissuade states from arming the combatants.

The developments in Somalia represent a setback for the United States, which had sought to prevent the militants from taking power. But the report provided no evidence to suggest that the United States provided clandestine support to anti-Islamic forces, as officials in Somalia's interim government have alleged.

It did, however, underscore the degree to which the United States' chief Middle East rivals, Iran and Syria, and its allies, Saudi Arabia and Egypt, are prepared to challenge U.S. interests in East Africa.

The U.N. team detailed three Iranian consignments of arms, ammunition, medical supplies and doctors to the Islamic fighters since summer. The report says one July shipment included land mines, 1,000 machine guns and M-79 rocket launchers, and 45 shoulder-fired surface-to-air missiles. The report also says two Iranian nationals were negotiating the possibility of selling more weapons for access to Somalia's uranium deposits.

The report asserts that Syria has trained 200 Somali fighters in guerrilla warfare tactics and that Libya has provided arms and advanced military training to another 100. Libya also allegedly provided $1 million to finance future training missions and to pay salaries.

Iran and Syria denied in separate letters to the U.N. team that they had shipped weapons to Somalia or trained Somali forces. The U.N. team did not receive a response from the Libyan government. Representatives from the Islamic Courts Union said the allegations that they had received illegal arms shipments are "baseless."

To shore up support for their cause, Somalia's Islamic fighters provided military support in the summer to Hezbollah, sending 720 of its most experienced fighters to help battle Israeli forces, according to the report. The fighters were promised $2,000 in payments to their families for serving, and as much as $30,000 if they fell in battle.

In exchange for their backing, Hezbollah allegedly provided advanced training to Somali fighters and sent five Hezbollah advisers to Somalia. It also allegedly solicited support for the movement from Iran and Syria.

The report cites a case in which Egypt agreed to train Somalia's Islamic militants. And it accuses Saudi Arabia of providing several shipments of food and medicine to Islamic combatants. Egypt denied the allegation; Saudi Arabia has yet to fully respond to the charges.

The report asserts that the most flagrant violations of the U.N. arms embargo have been committed by Eritrea and Ethiopia, which have sent dozens of weapons shipments and thousands of combat troops into Somalia on behalf of their proxies. It also charged that Uganda and Yemen had joined Ethiopia in supporting Somalia's losing Transitional Federal Government.

Hezbollah Decries Lebanese Cabinet (WP/AP)

Associated Press

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

BEIRUT, Nov. 14 -- Hezbollah's leader said the radical Shiite Muslim group would continue efforts to replace the Lebanese government, saying the Western-backed cabinet had lost all credibility after six ministers resigned, according to published reports.

Hassan Nasrallah, who has threatened to stage demonstrations if Hezbollah's demand for a national unity government is ignored, also assured citizens that there would be no new civil war as a result of mounting political tensions among the country's rival factions.

DOJ_NMG_0094854

Nasrallah's remarks came a day after the government, defying the objections of President Emile Lahoud and the resignations of six ministers, approved a U.N. plan for an international tribunal to try suspected killers of former prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri, who died in a car bombing in February 2005 that has been widely blamed on Syria.

Lebanon's New Crisis (WP)

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

THE RECKLESS attack on Israel by the Lebanese Hezbollah movement this summer led to the devastation of the southern third of the country. About 1,200 Lebanese died, including many civilians whom Hezbollah deliberately placed in the middle of the fighting, and some 15,000 homes were destroyed. Now Hezbollah's leader, Hasan Nasrallah, has launched an even more dangerous campaign. Through political bluff and the threat of violence, he is attempting to stage a coup against the democratically elected Lebanese government. The pro-Western administration of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, which lacks Hezbollah's ruthlessness or military strength, has been resisting. But without help from the outside world, Lebanon could soon experience the reversal of its popular Cedar Revolution of 2005 or even a return to civil war.

As was the case in the summer war with Israel, Hezbollah's new offensive is backed by Iran and Syria and serves those governments' agendas as well as its own. The Shiite Islamic party is demanding that it be given enough seats in Mr. Siniora's cabinet to provide it with a veto over all major decisions. That would allow it to block the implementation of U.N. Security Council Resolution 1701, which calls for Hezbollah's disarmament. It could also impede the formation of an international tribunal by the Security Council and Lebanon to try the perpetrators of the February 2005 assassination of former prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri. Senior Syrian officials, including some of the closest collaborators of President Bashar al-Assad, are among those implicated. Not coincidentally, the six Lebanese ministers already allied with Hezbollah and its allies resigned in the past few days, just as the cabinet was preparing to vote on a preliminary agreement on the tribunal.

To its credit, the Siniora government rejected Hezbollah's intimidation, and the 18 remaining ministers approved the tribunal unanimously. But the crisis is far from over. Hezbollah is threatening to begin street demonstrations that could easily lead to violence. That would serve the interests of the increasingly radical Iran-Syria axis, which is attempting to prevent the spread of democracy in the Middle East, drive out the West and ultimately destroy Israel.

The response to this vicious campaign should be the same concerted multilateral action that followed Mr. Hariri's assassination last year and that forced Syria to withdraw its army from Lebanon. First the Security Council should act swiftly to establish the tribunal and begin criminal proceedings. It should also consider other actions against Syria, including sanctions, if Syria continues trying to block the formation of the tribunal and sponsoring political violence in Lebanon. At the same time, Security Council action against Iran for its refusal to suspend its nuclear program is long overdue; governments that are holding it up, beginning with Russia, must be forced to choose between supporting sanctions and breaking off strategic cooperation with the West. Until Iran and Syria are made to pay a price for their attempts to radicalize the Middle East, they will have no incentive to rein in clients such as Hezbollah.

Arab Gunmen Kill Hundreds Of Villagers In Chad (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

DAKAR, Senegal, Nov. 14 — Hundreds of Chadians have been killed by roving groups of Arab gunmen in dozens of villages over the past 10 days, according to aid workers and human rights officials along Chad's troubled border with Sudan.

At least 220 people have been killed, and dozens of wounded people have overwhelmed small, poorly equipped local hospitals, the United Nations said Tuesday. Chad's government has declared a state of emergency over the attacks and has accused Sudan, its neighbor to the east, of fomenting a crisis in Chad.

"By exporting its Darfur conflict to Chad, Sudan wants to weaken Chad by making different Chadian communities fight each other," Hourmadji Moussa Doumgor, a government spokesman, told The Associated Press on Monday. "All this is to prepare the ground for a large-scale war."

For more than two years, Chad and Sudan have traded accusations about support for insurgents across their shared border. Sudan is fighting non-Arab rebel groups in the western region of Darfur that seek greater autonomy, while Chad is fighting rebels seeking to overthrow the government of President Idriss Déby.

The conflict in Darfur, which pits the non-Arab tribes against the Arab-dominated government, has been marked by brutal intertribal violence in which the Sudanese government has armed Arab militias to fight the non-Arab insurgents. At least 200,000 people have died, and more than two million have been driven from their homes. That ethnic warfare has spilled over into Chad, inspiring copycat violence among Chadian Arabs and cross-border raids on villages by Sudanese militias.

DOJ_NMG_0094855

The recent violence has been particularly brutal. One man's eyes were gouged out with bayonets, said David Buchbinder, a researcher with Human Rights Watch who is traveling in the region affected by the attacks. Two women were burned alive in their hut, he said.

"It is extremely horrific violence," Mr. Buchbinder said. "It is as if it is driven by hatred. It is a coordinated action over a large part of eastern Chad, and not always with theft as a motive. Sometimes the motive is only to kill."

The attacks represent a sharp escalation of the violence in the volatile region around Darfur and threaten to further destabilize one of the most dangerous and lawless corners of the world.

The attacks appear to be the work of Arab militias from both sides of the Chad-Sudan border, and because they are occurring deep inside Chad, about 60 miles from the border, the violence is particularly ominous.

While the initial clashes between non-Arab villagers and Arab raiders appeared to involve mainly local tribes, the fresh set of attacks appears to be linked directly to the fighting in Darfur and involves a mix of Chadian and Sudanese Arabs. But even that distinction is largely academic — the porous border has little meaning for most villagers, who move back and forth freely.

The United Nations Security Council has approved a United Nations peacekeeping force to stanch the violence spreading out of Darfur and replace the largely ineffective and undermanned African Union force currently working there. But Sudan has adamantly refused to allow the new force to deploy. The United Nations plans to convene a high-level meeting on Thursday in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, the headquarters of the African Union, to discuss ways to end the violence.

U.S.-EU Airbus Rift Grows (WSJ)

By John W. Miller

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

BRUSSELS -- Adding to growing commercial woes at European aircraft maker Airbus, the U.S. is set to file a revised complaint as soon as today at the World Trade Organization against subsidies that European governments give the company, U.S. trade officials said.

With a previous U.S. complaint just months from expiring, European Union trade officials had hoped to negotiate a deal with the U.S. and avoid a WTO case, which could restrict EU politicians from offering further public aid to Airbus. Avoiding a court case now looks unlikely.

The U.S. decision is just the latest in a series of setbacks for Airbus, which has recently been wracked by management changes and order cancellations caused by development delays that are causing the company to lose market share in the $50 billion industry to its U.S. rival, Boeing Co.

The EU yesterday said it would respond by moving ahead with its own WTO complaint against U.S. government subsidies given to Boeing.

"Once the U.S. launched the WTO action, we were left with no choice," said Peter Power, a spokesman for Peter Mandelson, the EU trade commissioner.

The essentials of the dispute haven't changed since 2004, when the U.S. argued that Airbus had unfairly used some $20 billion in subsidies to overtake Boeing as the world's leading civil-aircraft maker by market share.

The so-called launch aid had been allowed by a 1992 agreement between the U.S. and the EU, because Airbus was smaller then and needed a boost.

Once it passed Boeing in global market share, the U.S. argued two years ago, Airbus was no longer entitled to that kind of government help.

The U.S. filed complaints at the WTO in 2005 and 2006. Each time, the EU counterattacked with complaints of its own, saying that the U.S. had given Boeing more than $20 billion in government help.

Those four cases, two on each side, were suspended in February so that trade representatives could try to hammer out a new version of the 1992 agreement that would allow subsidies on both sides.

EU officials say the U.S. move to restart the case this week has taken them by surprise and ends the de facto truce.

Airbus, a unit of European Aeronautic Defence & Space Co., has suffered financial and order-book losses this year after announcing delays in development of its two big new aircraft, the double-deck A380 and the A350 XWB, a response to Boeing's fuel-efficient 787 Dreamliner.

Airbus's troubles have been compounded by a management shake-up.

French Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin told a French newspaper yesterday that his government would offer €80 million, or about $102 million, to Airbus suppliers threatened by the rollout delays.

A U.S. official said that wasn't a concern for the U.S., as many of the suppliers also work for Boeing. He added, however, the U.S. is concerned about direct aid to Airbus.

DOJ_NMG_0094856

"A line needs to be drawn in the sand now," said Charlie Miller, a spokesman for Boeing. "Airbus is financially strong and does not need additional launch aid."

"The good news is that the WTO process finally will demonstrate that Boeing is guilty of receiving billions and billions of government money for commercial aircraft," said Clay McConnell, an Airbus spokesman. "On the other hand, the only tangible result of the process is likely that a lot of trade lawyers will get rich."

The EU has until February to respond to the U.S. complaint. A panel of three WTO judges will start meeting in March and would likely issue a judgment next September.

The EU says it will file its legal arguments around the beginning of next year.

Leading Democrat Calls For 'open Skies' Rethink (FT)

By Doug Cameron In Chicago And Eoin Callan In Washington

Financial Times, November 15, 2006

The new Democratic leadership in Congress on Tuesday called for a rethink of plans to give overseas investors more say in the running of US airlines, dealing a potentially critical blow to efforts to forge a new transportation deal with the European Union.

The tentative transatlantic "open skies" pact agreed a year ago has been left in limbo by fierce opposition in Congress to the parallel investment reforms, led by James Oberstar, the ranking Democrat on the House transportation and infrastructure committee.

Mr Oberstar is set to take over the chairmanship of the committee in January, and reaffirmed his opposition on Tuesday to the proposed changes first detailed by the administration a year ago.

The Department of Transportation wants to ease restrictions on the involvement of overseas investors in the running of US airlines, though statutory restrictions on ownership levels would remain unchanged.

"We need to go back and think it over," Mr Oberstar said of the plan as he outlined his priorities at a briefing in Washington on Tuesday, suggesting there would be no progress ahead of a meeting of EU transport ministers next month.

The administration has already missed two self-imposed deadlines for presenting its planned rule change to European ministers, delaying any open-skies deal until at least the middle of next year.

Their approval is viewed as a pre-requisite for supporting the two-stage open skies deal, which would liberalise transatlantic routes and trigger co-operation on competition, safety and security matters.

Mr Oberstar did not refer to open skies, but suggested the two issues should not be linked. "I don't know why it became so important [to the EU]," he said of the investment proposal.

The DoT has insisted there are no plans to drop the proposed rule change. Mary Peters, the new transportation secretary, has not made any public comments on either open skies or the investment rules, though senior DoT officials had planned a renewed push to answer critics of the investment reform.

While the DoT revised its original plan in April, the changes failed to defuse opposition in hte Republican-led Congress. The House of Representatives has already voted by two to one in favour of language backed by Mr Oberstar that would block the department from introducing the changes. The Senate Appropriations Committee has also backed blocking manoeuevres.

Opponents also included US labour unions and Continental Airlines, which claimed the rules threatened jobs and posed a threat to national security as foreign investors might be more reluctant to transport US troops on their aircraft.

An earlier attempt to secure a new EU-US deal collapsed in 2004 when it was rejected by European transport ministers.

UK Demands Halliburton Drop KBR Float (FT)

By James Boxell

Financial Times, November 15, 2006

Britain has made a last-minute demand that Halliburton, the US oil services group, withdraw the imminent flotation of its KBR subsidiary or face being stripped of its ownership of the Devonport naval dockyard.

Halliburton had intended to price the offering of KBR on Tuesday night, with its market debut scheduled for Wednesday. However, as reported in the Financial Times last week, Lord Drayson, the British defence procurement minister, has been seeking urgent guarantees from Halliburton about the future financial viability of KBR before giving his support to the float.

KBR has been hoping to raise more than $470m (£248m) from selling a 17 per cent stake, which would value the company at about $2.8bn.

The Halliburton arm, which is known for its logistics contracts with the US military in Iraq, owns 51 per cent of the Devonport ship and submarine maintenance yard in Plymouth, western Europe's largest naval dockyard complex.

In the first nine months of the year, KBR made almost half of its operating profits from Devonport.

DOJ_NMG_0094857

The yard is responsible for refitting and refuelling the British nuclear submarine fleet and its ownership is highly sensitive. It employs about 4,500 people directly in Plymouth, making it the biggest private sector employer in Devon and Cornwall.

Halliburton was not available for comment on Tuesday night. However, one person close to the process said the float was likely to be priced today, in spite of the UK government warning.

In an emergency filing to the US Securities and Exchange Commission on Tuesday morning, just ahead of the proposed float, Halliburton said: "On November 13, the Ministry of Defence asked us to withdraw this offering pending the MoD's financial analysis of KBR on a stand-alone basis.

"The MoD also advised us that if we proceed with this offering without satisfying the MoD, the MoD will have little option but to take steps to cause the MoD to use its power to safeguard the essential security interests of the United Kingdom with respect to the Devonport Royal Dockyard."

In its filing, KBR said the loss of Devonport could have a "material adverse effect on our future prospects, business, results of operations and cash".

As well as KBR, Devonport Management Limited, the company that bought Devonport from the MoD in 1997, is also partly owned by Balfour Beatty and Weir Group of the UK.

If the MoD deems it in the essential security interests of the UK, it can either make DML's interest in Devonport "non-voting" or possibly remove DML directors. It can also at any time assume control and dispose of DML's interest at a fair value, determined by an independent accountancy firm.

Halliburton's KBR Delays IPO After U.K. Shipyard Warning (WSJ)

By Russell Gold And Steve Gelsi

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

Halliburton Co. delayed the initial public offering of its KBR Inc. engineering and government-contracting unit by one day after the British government warned it could take back control of a major shipyard that generates significant profit for the unit.

In a letter this week, the British Ministry of Defence sought to delay the IPO to determine whether the United Kingdom's strategic interests would be preserved by a stand-alone KBR. An underwriter of the stock offering said KBR officials said the letter was a result of a misunderstanding with the British government that would be resolved quickly.

Halliburton, an oil-field-services provider, and KBR declined to comment.

KBR, formerly Kellogg, Brown & Root, is the majority owner of the Devonport Royal Dockyard, the largest dock complex in Western Europe, and has contracts to refuel the British government's nuclear-submarine fleet. The company, which was initially scheduled to price last night for trading today, is now slated to price today for trading tomorrow, say underwriters.

IPO analysts said they were uncertain what effect the U.K.'s demands would have on the pricing of the deal, which aims to sell 27.84 million shares at $15 to $17 a share. The fact that KBR chose to file an updated prospectus with the new warning, rather than withdraw the offering, indicates the company is determined to go ahead with the IPO despite the U.K.'s concerns; the offering before the amended filing also appeared to be attracting strong investor interest, they said.

The shipyard has been a profitable operation for KBR. Through the first nine months of this year, KBR generated $57 million in operating income from the shipyard. Over the same period, KBR posted operating income of $125 million.

Halliburton plans to separate KBR, first by offering a 20% stake through the IPO and then through a tax-free spinoff in coming months.

According to a KBR financial filing, the British government has sought information about the company's financial stability as a separate company. If Halliburton proceeds with the IPO, the government could take control of the shipyard and reimburse KBR for the fair-market value of the assets. If the British government takes such steps, the minority owners of the shipyard could exercise their rights to buy out KBR.

KBR owns 51% of the complex. London-based Balfour Beatty PLC and Glasgow-based Weir Group PLC, both international engineering firms, own the remainder equally. Both companies declined to comment on the matter.

A spokeswoman for the British Ministry of Defence said, "We are disappointed that they've chosen to go ahead without allowing us the time for the analysis." The spokeswoman said the government retained the ability to take back control of the dockyard when it sold the dockyard. Halliburton bought a majority stake in the shipyard in 1997 and has had a contract to operate it since 1987.

KBR is best known for its work as the U.S. government's largest contractor in Iraq. A global construction and contracting firm, it also builds energy facilities around the world. Halliburton has been discussing separating KBR since 2004, although plans were delayed earlier this year because of what the company said was a bad market for IPOs.

South African Parliament Approves Gay Marriages (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0094858

By Sharon Lafraniere

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

JOHANNESBURG, Nov. 14 — South Africa's Parliament overwhelmingly voted today to legalize same-sex marriages, making the nation the first in Africa and the fifth in the world to remove legal barriers to gay and lesbian unions, according to activists.

The legislature voted after the nation's highest court ruled that South Africa's marriages statutes violated the constitution's guarantee of equal rights. The court gave the government a year to amend the legal definition of marriage. That deadline expires in two weeks.

Melanie Judge, program manager for OUT, a gay rights advocacy group, noted that the Netherlands, Belgium, Spain and Canada were the only other countries to allow same-sex marriages nationwide. In most African nations, she said, homosexuality is still treated as a crime. Some penalties are stiffer than those for rape or murder..

Ms. Judge credited South Africa's liberal constitution with forcing change.

"This has been a litmus test of our constitutional values," she said in a telephone interview. "What does equality really mean? What does it look like? Equality does not exist on a sliding scale."

Religious groups and traditional leaders strenuously opposed the measure, arguing that if necessary the constitution should be amended to outlaw same-sex unions. But the ruling African National Congress virtually demanded that lawmakers support the bill.

Despite deep divisions within the party, the measure passed 230 to 41. It must now be approved by the Council of Provinces, a quasi-federal chamber, and be signed the president to become law.

Vytjie Mentor, the party's caucus chairman, told the South African newspaper The Sunday Independent earlier this month that he expected legislators belonging to the African National Congress to vote for the measure, regardless of their personal views.

There is "no such thing as a free vote or a vote of conscience," he said. "How do you give someone permission to discriminate in the name of the A.N.C.? How do you allow for someone to vote against the constitution and the policies of the A.N.C., which is antidiscrimination?"

The new law allows both heterosexual and same-sex couples to register their unions either as marriages or civil partnerships. But in a concession to critics, it also allows civil officers to refuse to marry same-sex couples on the basis on conscience. Ms. Judge, the gay rights advocate, predicted that provision will be challenged in court.

"We can't be in the situation where civil officers can decide who they want to marry and who they don't want to marry," she said. "They aren't able to refuse to marry a black person and a white person. This is unconstitutional."

Gay Marriage Endorsed In S. Africa (WP/AP)

By Clare Nullis, Associated Press

The Washington Post, November 15, 2006

CAPE TOWN, South Africa, Nov. 14 -- The South African Parliament on Tuesday overwhelmingly approved legislation recognizing gay marriages -- a first for a continent where homosexuality is largely taboo.

By a vote of 230 to 41 with three abstentions, the National Assembly passed the Civil Union Bill, a compromise that resulted from months of heated public discussion. Both traditionalists and gay rights advocates have criticized the measure, and there have been warnings that it might be unconstitutional.

Veterans of the ruling African National Congress heralded the bill for extending basic freedoms to everyone and equated it with liberation from the shackles of apartheid.

"When we attained our democracy, we sought to distinguish ourselves from an unjust painful past, by declaring that never again shall it be that any South African will be discriminated against on the basis of color, creed, culture and sex," Home Affairs Minister Nosiviwe Mapisa-Nqakula told the National Assembly.

A Christian lawmaker, Kenneth Meshoe, said Tuesday was the "saddest day in our 12 years of democracy" and warned that South Africa "was provoking God's anger."

His comments reflected the majority view on a deeply conservative continent. Homosexuality is illegal in Zimbabwe, Kenya, Uganda, Nigeria, Tanzania, Ghana and most other sub-Saharan countries. Some countries also are debating constitutional amendments to ban same-sex marriages. Even in South Africa, gay men and lesbians are often attacked because of their sexual orientation.

The outcome of Tuesday's vote was expected, given the ANC's huge majority in the National Assembly. The bill now has to go to the National Council of Provinces, where the vote is expected to be a formality, before being signed into law by President Thabo Mbeki.

DOJ_NMG_0094859

The bill provides for the "voluntary union of two persons, which is solemnized and registered by either a marriage or civil union." It does not specify whether the partnerships are heterosexual or homosexual.

But it also says a marriage officer need not perform a ceremony for a same-sex couple if doing so would conflict with his or her "conscience, religion and belief."

South Africa recognized the rights of gay people in the constitution adopted after apartheid ended in 1994 -- the first in the world to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.

The bill was drawn up in order to comply with a Constitutional Court ruling in December 2005 that said existing marriage legislation was unconstitutional for discriminating against same-sex couples.

Guns And Butter Cuba's Military Puts Business On Front Lines (WSJ)

By José De Córdoba

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

At the height of the Cold War, Cuba's soldiers became a legend on the island when they punched through enemy lines, defeating South Africa's army in Angola. Today Cuban generals are applying capitalist tactics to try to improve bottom lines in businesses that range from growing beans to running hotels and airlines.

Cuba's Revolutionary Armed Forces rent rooms to tourists through Gaviota SA, the island's fastest-growing hotel conglomerate. They sell premium cigars, peddle consumer goods through an island-wide retail chain and serve lobster dinners at the Divina Pastora restaurant in Havana's landmark Morro Castle. The military also has a say in allotting nickel mines and leasing offshore lots for oil exploration. The University of Miami's Institute for Cuban and Cuban-American Studies estimates that soldiers control more than 60% of the island's economy.

The military's economic role will likely become even more critical after the death of Cuba's ailing 80-year-old leader, Fidel Castro, who is widely believed to be dying of cancer. Although Mr. Castro has steadfastly opposed economic reforms during his 47-year communist regime, his younger brother and anointed successor, Raúl, has shown a deep interest in free-market experiments in the past. As defense minister since the 1959 revolution, he has frequently looked to the military as his laboratory.

With Raúl and the military at the helm of the economy, Cuba could be poised to follow what islanders call the "Chinese model" of liberalization. That means carefully experimenting with market incentives in one of the world's few remaining communist economies, while trying to retain tight political control. It's far from clear that a Raúl Castro government could accomplish a Chinese-style transformation. For one thing, China isn't located just 90 miles from the U.S. and a wealthy community of exiles looking to reshape their home country along American lines. And the military could move to extend monopolistic control -- and opportunities for corruption -- after Fidel's death, squelching any competition.

But the seeds of economic reform in Cuba may be planted more firmly than many suspect. One piece of evidence: Raúl has traveled to China a number of times to study Beijing's economic policies and in 2003 he invited the leading economic adviser to then Chinese premier Zhu Rongji, who played a leading role in opening up China to foreign trade and investment, to give a series of lectures in Cuba. Fidel Castro, who deeply opposes reforms, was a notable no-show, says Domingo Amuchastegui, a former Cuban intelligence officer who now lives in the U.S. and keeps close tabs on political developments on the island.

In the 1990s, Raúl sent officers, who had previously trained at prestigious Soviet military schools, to learn hotel management in Spain, and accounting in Europe, Latin America, Asia and Canada, says Mr. Amuchastegui. For a time, business books such as "In Search of Excellence" by Tom Peters and Robert H. Waterman became required reading for ambitious officers looking to advance in the ranks, says Eugenio Yañez, an economist who taught management to army officers at Havana's Superior Institute of Economic Direction.

Raúl, now 75, also adopted capitalist-style accounting and management incentives to run military-owned factories that made everything from uniforms to bullets. In some cases, workers were given incentive pay. Modest by Western standards, these reforms, called "perfeccionamiento empresarial" -- loosely translated as "entrepreneurial improvement" -- were nevertheless cutting-edge for Cuba.

For most of his career, Raúl Castro was considered a tough, even brutal, communist whose hand, as he put it, "didn't tremble" in 1989 when he ordered the execution of a former close colleague deemed a danger to the regime. Some analysts don't think he has changed much since then. "He's a Stalinist," says Jaime Suchlicki a Cuba analyst at the University of Miami, who predicts Raúl will resort to more repression after Fidel dies.

In recent weeks, speculation has grown about Fidel's health problems. The longtime dictator temporarily relinquished power on July 31 to Raúl after announcing he had undergone surgery for intestinal bleeding. After rumors of his death swirled in Havana, the Cuban government released a video on Oct. 28 showing a gaunt and aged Castro in a track suit. U.S. officials believe Mr. Castro has some sort of stomach or colon cancer. With his brother incapacitated, Raúl has taken a blustery communist line. "When the U.S. says there should be a transition in Cuba, they mean a shameful return to the neocolonial garbage of capitalism they imposed on this country for 60 years," Raúl told an audience of government union leaders in September.

But many Cuba watchers believe those statements are meant to give political cover to Raúl, who has become more pragmatic as he has aged, and has been searching for ways to improve Cuba's dismal economic performance, especially after the Soviet Union ended its subsidies in 1990. Between 1989 and 1993, Cuba's gross domestic product fell 35%, while the island's foreign trade slumped by 75%, says Carmelo Mesa-Lago, professor emeritus of economy at University of Pittsburgh.

As living standards plummeted, Havana residents ate many of the city's cats. An epidemic of optic neuropathy, caused by deficiencies in nutrition and resulting in temporary blindness, struck down some 35,000 Cubans. For Raúl, economic security became a critical part of national security. "Beans are more important than cannon," he told troops in 1994.

Desperate to cut costs, Raúl slashed the military from about 300,000 troops in 1990 to some 45,000 today, according to Frank O. Mora, a Cuban military expert at the National Defense University in Washington. To revive the economy, he pushed innovations such as farmers markets and self-employment for plumbers, hairdressers and other small-time entrepreneurs.

At the time, Fidel Castro reluctantly allowed the changes, because Cuba had little alternative. The Castro brothers appointed military and intelligence officers, who were their most trusted and unswervingly loyal supporters, to court foreign capital. Col. Gustavo Loret de Mola, an electrical engineer by training, was named deputy minister of communications and negotiated Cuba's first cellphone deal, with a Mexican company, in 1991, says his son, Camilo Loret de Mola. He helped the military recruit foreign tenants for Soviet-built bases that were turned into duty-free zones.

The experiments sometimes flopped. In 1998, the younger Mr. Loret de Mola says he persuaded a Spanish entrepreneur to start a travel agency and hydroponics vegetable farm inside the cavernous helicopter hangar at a former submarine base in the port of Mariel. The businessman only managed to send a few flights of cucumbers and tomatoes on Aerogaviota, an airline owned by the Cuban armed forces, before the farm went out of business. "When he had workers to harvest the vegetables, he couldn't get a plane, when he could get a plane, he couldn't get workers," says Mr. Loret de Mola, who now sells insurance in Miami.

By 2000, some 1,400 state companies out of about 3,000 were being evaluated for or being run under "perfeccionamiento" management techniques, according to Philip Peters, a former U.S. diplomat who is now a director of the Lexington Institute, an Arlington, Va., think tank. A manager of a tire plant told Mr. Peters in 2001 that using such techniques had tripled profits in just two years. While far from a free-market reform, Mr. Peters believes that the military has laid the groundwork for further-reaching reforms in the future.

Another success: The military found foreign joint-venture partners for Cuba's moribund citrus industry, which almost collapsed after losing its markets in the Soviet block. Today, citrus is an important export. Cuba's most important citrus company is a joint venture with Grupo BM, an Israeli firm that operates a 115,000-acre farm that grows grapefruit using state-of-the-art drip irrigation techniques.

An International Monetary Fund study in 2000 said the limited reforms pushed by Raúl were "instrumental" in helping turn the economy around in the mid-1990s. But then Fidel Castro clamped down on reforms, arguing that they were sullying the revolution. Now, Cuba relies on about $2 billion annually in fuel subsidies provided by Venezuela's populist president Hugo Chávez, and hundreds of millions of dollars of Chinese investment in Cuban nickel mines.

With reforms out of fashion, Cuba since 2004 has canceled business and management courses funded by the European Union, Sweden and Canada, which together trained more than 1,300 high-ranking Cuban officials in capitalist management techniques. Free-trade zones emptied, while the number of self-employed Cubans as well as foreign joint ventures fell sharply.

But the military's own economic empire has continued to grow. Today, the military's web of companies are run by the Grupo de Administración Empresarial SA, or the Business Administration Group. Known by its Spanish acronym Gaesa, the group is headed by Deputy Defense Minister Gen. Julio Casas Regueiro. The group's deputy head is Col. Luis Alberto Rodríguez, Raúl Castro's son-in-law. The group is run from offices on the fourth floor of Cuba's defense ministry, according to Mr. Mora of the National Defense University.

Gaesa's most important business is Gaviota, the tourism company. Gaviota, which means "sea gull," began by turning officers' clubs and navy bases into resorts. Now it has about 8,500 rooms out of Cuba's total of 40,000 hotel rooms. Many of its hotels are luxury four- and five-star establishments managed by companies such as Spain's Sol Melia and France's Club Med.

Gaviota also owns the domestic airline, Aerogaviota, which uses Cuban air-force pilots who fly refurbished Soviet transport airplanes. The company even organizes tours for military enthusiasts who want to visit the island's colonial forts and the no-man's land surrounding the U.S. naval base in Guantanamo, says retired Col. Hal Klepak, Canada's former military attaché in Havana, who has written a book on the Cuban military. Gaviota also rents cars, runs marinas, manages gourmet restaurants and operates an attraction that allows tourists to swim with dolphins, according to a recent study by the Spanish Institute of International Trade.

DOJ_NMG_0094861

Generals also occupy top management slots in the country's economic ministries. Gen. Ulises Rosales del Toro, who was named Cuba's sugar czar in 1997, shut down two-thirds of Cuba's 156 antique sugar mills in 2002 and is still trying to revive production, which reached a 100-year historic low of 1.3 million tons this year. Other generals run the civil aviation, fishing, telecommunications and transportation ministries. A colonel is in charge of Habanos SA, a joint venture with the Spanish firm Altadis, which markets the country's famous cigars abroad. Another colonel runs the tourism ministry.

The military has the power to cut bureaucratic red tape that stifles other Cuban state entities that want to engage in business, says Mark Entwistle, a former Canadian ambassador to Havana who now advises foreign companies in Cuba. In 2004, he says that a Canadian business that wanted to grow soybeans on the island was having a hard time getting permission through the ministry of agriculture. But once the Canadians began dealing directly with the military, the red tape vanished. "The military has a whole unit devoted to doing joint ventures in agriculture," says Mr. Entwistle. "There was zero ideological content, it was 100% business."

Giving the armed forces a critical role in running the economy has helped the Castro brothers reward their supporters and gives them a stake in the preservation of the regime. But it has also introduced a corrupting influence in the military that could worsen if the military's role expands further in a post-Fidel Cuba. A number of high-ranking "entrepreneur soldiers" have already been dismissed and sometimes jailed for corruption.

The military also faces potential dissension within its ranks: Soldiers involved with foreign joint ventures, who live far better than others in the military, are viewed by many officers with distrust and envy, analysts say.

Another problem sign is what Ricardo Pascoe, a former Mexican ambassador in Havana, calls the rise of the "juniors" -- the sons of high-ranking military officers who often live abroad and enjoy privileges undreamed of by ordinary Cubans. During his time in Havana from 2001 to 2003, Mr. Pascoe says, many Mexican businessmen complained to him that the "juniors" charged commissions for contracts through their fathers.

Mr. Mora of the National Defense University believes that if unchecked the "juniors" could become the kernel of semicriminal mafias that could dominate much of the economy if Cuba liberalizes its economy. Instead of China becoming the model for Cuba, he says, Raúl Castro could inadvertently turn Cuba into a Caribbean version of oligarchic, post-Communist Russia.

Mexico Passes Resolution On Deportation (AP)

By Julie Watson

AP, November 15, 2006

Mexico's Congress was swayed Tuesday by a 7-year-old boy on a mission to save his mom.

Second-grader Saul Arellano, a U.S. citizen, appeared in Mexico's 500-member Chamber of Deputies to plead for help in lobbying Washington to stop the deportation of his mother, an illegal immigrant who has taken refuge in a Chicago church. His efforts paid off with a resolution calling on the U.S. Congress to suspend the deportation of Elvira Arellano and any other illegal immigrant parents of U.S. citizens.

If the U.S. agrees, it would "create a precedent that will benefit more than 4.9 million children who have been born in the United States and whose parents live under the threat of deportation," said Mexican congressman Jose Jacques, who lived in the United States for 33 years and has an American daughter and granddaughter.

Flashing cameras and swarms of reporters surrounded the boy as he entered the chamber. Lawmakers rose from their seats to shake his hand. But instead of stepping to the podium, he was swept into a side room, where he hid his face and ducked under a table.

"I think being so small he was kind of freaked," family friend Jesus Carlin said.

Saul then took the microphone and spoke to reporters in Spanish, describing what he wanted from Mexico's lawmakers: "I want them to tell President Bush to end the deportations so that my mother and other families can stay together in the United States."

U.S. officials say there is no right to sanctuary in a church under U.S. law, and nothing to prevent them from arresting Elvira Arellano, who has lived at the church since Aug. 15, the day she was supposed to surrender for deportation. So far, they have not moved to seize her.

Saul and his mother live on the second floor of the church, where a small bedroom is crowded with the boy's toys and schoolbooks. They have a miniature pinscher, Daisy, to keep them company.

Arellano, 31, said she was nervous about sending her son to Mexico, and Saul was afraid she would be deported while he was away. "I told him to be calm, everything would be fine and I would be here waiting for him," she told The Associated Press in Chicago.

President Vicente Fox, who leaves office Dec. 1, failed during his six-year term to persuade the U.S. Congress to approve a migration accord allowing thousands of Mexicans to work legally in the United States. While Bush personally supports a temporary guest-worker program, Republicans in Congress opted to strengthen border security instead.

Arellano said she should not have to choose between leaving her son or taking away his rightful opportunities as an American. But conservative columnists and anti-illegal immigration activists say Arellano put herself and her son in this difficult spot by repeatedly breaking the law.

Arellano illegally crossed into the United States in 1997 and was quickly sent back. She returned within days, living for three years in Oregon before moving to Chicago in 2000. Her current troubles began when she was arrested at O'Hare International Airport, where she worked as a cleaning woman. Convicted of working under a false Social Security number, she served three years probation before being ordered to appear at the immigration office in Chicago.

Fox's spokesman Ruben Aguilar acknowledges that Arellano broke U.S. law, but "we think there exist certain elements of a humanitarian nature that should be taken into account to avoid splitting up the family."

Bring In The Green Cat (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, November 15, 2006

Chongming, China

I've been a regular visitor to China since 1990, and here's what strikes me most: Each year that I've come here, China's people seem to speak with greater ease and breathe with greater difficulty.

Yes, you can now have amazingly frank talks with officials and journalists here. But when I walked out of my room the morning after I arrived in Shanghai, the air was so smoky — from the burning of farm fields after the harvest — that for a moment I honestly thought my hotel was on fire.

And that's why, for the first time, it's starting to feel to me like China is reaching its environmental limits. If it doesn't radically change to greener, more sustainable modes of design, transport, production and power generation, the Chinese miracle is going to turn into an eco-nightmare.

For some three decades now, China's economy has grown at around 10 percent per year, based on low-cost labor and little regard for the waste it pumps into its rivers and the air. When a country grows that fast, year after year, it can start to think that the laws of nature don't apply to it.

Guess again. China has been doing the environmental equivalent of jumping from an airplane and thinking that it's flying, argued Rob Watson, an expert on China's environment who heads the green building services firm EcoTech International. "After you jump out of a plane, for about five miles you can actually feel like you're flying," he added. But then reality hits. "It's not the fall that kills you — it's the sudden stop at the end, and China may be approaching that sudden stop. ... When you stress a system to a certain point, it just stops working."

China's top leaders understand the crisis. But their response is complicated by so many Chinese flooding from the countryside to cities. In their view, political stability depends on finding those people jobs, and jobs depend on growth, and growth depends on China continuing to be the low-cost producer of everything — environment be damned.

But China can't do what the West did: grow now, clean up later. Because the unprecedented pace and scale of its growth are going to make later too late. The China Daily reported this week that at least 24 million acres of cultivated land in China — one-tenth of the country's total arable land — is now polluted, posing a "grave threat" to China's food safety. More than half its rivers are also polluted, which is why less than 9 percent of "drinkable water" met government standards for bacteria in 243 rural supply stations recently tested. Many wells have excessive nitrates that can cause diabetes or kidney damage. No wonder some high-tech workers are starting to avoid China, because they don't want to live in a dirty cloud.

Chinese officials fear that if they move to U.S.-level green production and environmental cleanup, "China will not be such a low-cost producer anymore, and that will affect jobs," noted Dan Rosen, an expert on China's economy and head of China Strategic Advisory. But what they are missing is that going green is not just a problem, but an opportunity. Pollution represents waste and inefficiency. Green companies are always more efficient, adds Mr. Watson, and China has a chance to become a major innovator of low-cost green solutions. When U.S. companies went green, they consistently overestimated the costs and underestimated the savings.

The other day, I sailed with Mr. Rosen from Shanghai up the Yangtze Delta to Chongming Island, the world's largest alluvial island. There, Shanghai is trying to expand, by building the first eco-metropolis in China, based on eco-tourism, farming, wind and solar power. When you see the parklands created there, or when you stand in the protected wetlands and watch the water buffalo lounging in the mud, while peasants collect crabs, you can almost believe that China can change course.

But then, off in the distance, you see this massive bridge that is about to connect Chongming to central Shanghai, and you wonder what will happen to all the green plans here when all the overloaded trucks and consumers start rushing in. If Chongming is just a green ornament attached to Shanghai, it will never survive. If it is a model for a whole new kind of development, it, and China, have a chance.

Deng Xiaoping once famously said of China's economy: "Black cat, white cat, all that matters is that it catches mice" — i.e., forget about communist ideology, all that matters is that China grows. Not anymore, said Mr. Rosen. "Now the cat better be green, otherwise it is going to die before it catches the mouse."

'I Am Not Guilty' (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 15, 2006

On Monday in a Bangladesh courtroom, a judge read the following charge to a defendant: "By praising the Jews and Christians, by attempting to travel to Israel and by predicting the so-called rise of Islamist militancy in the country and expressing such through writings inside the country and abroad, you have tried to damage the image and relations of Bangladesh with the outside world. For which, charges under section 295-A, 120-A, 124-A, 105-A and 108-A are brought against you. Are you guilty or not?"

Answered the defendant: "I am not guilty."

The defendant is journalist Salah Uddin Shoaib Choudhury. As editor of the Weekly Blitz, Mr. Choudhury wrote articles friendly to Israel and critical of Islamic militants, and sought to travel to Israel in 2003 for a writers' conference. He never made it. Instead, he was detained at the airport in Dhaka, imprisoned in solitary confinement and without trial for 17 months and denied medical treatment for glaucoma.

Mr. Choudhury was finally released in early 2005, largely thanks to pressure from Illinois Representative Mark Kirk. But the campaign against him, official and otherwise, never abated. The offices of his newspaper were bombed and later overrun by a mob. The government continued to press the charges. If convicted, Mr. Choudhury could be hanged.

The good news is that Congress is paying attention: Yesterday, Mr. Kirk and New York Democrat Nita Lowey introduced a resolution demanding the charges be dropped. That should get the attention of a government that receives $64 million a year in American aid. The government of Bangladesh might also consider that the harm it claims Mr. Choudhury's journalism has done to its national "image" has, in fact, been wholly self-inflicted.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Federal Prosecutors Urge Conviction Of Colombian Rebel Leader. The AP (11/16, Yen) reports, "The government urged jurors Wednesday to convict Colombian rebel leader Ricardo Palmera, saying he should be held responsible in a plot to keep three Americans hostage, whatever his politics. … But the defense portrayed Palmera as a man who deserves jurors' benefit of the doubt as a tangential leftist sympathizer caught in the middle after trying to negotiate a deal between guerrilla fighters and the U.S.-backed Colombian government. … 'By definition, if you're a rebel, no state is ever going to recognize you. By definition, a prosecutor is always waiting for you,' said Palmera attorney Robert Tucker. 'It tells you, "Don't go for the labels of terrorist. Don't go for the misstatements of evidence."'" The AP continues, "In closing arguments, Justice Department attorney Kenneth Kohl exhorted the jury to look past the 'political smoke' in the five-week trial of Palmera, who has called the aims of his FARC leftist group noble and peaceful. … 'FARC is not above the law,' Kohl said, as Palmera, dressed in khaki pants, a navy blazer and green tie, quietly scribbled on a notepad. 'Holding people against their will for political purposes is what terrorism is.'" The AP adds, "Chief U.S. District Judge Thomas Hogan instructed the 12-member jury to begin deliberations Thursday in a case in which the lives of the three Americans – who are still being held in the thick jungles of south Colombia – may hang in the balance. … Palmera, 56, is charged with hostage-taking, conspiracy and providing material support to terrorists after a plane carrying the U.S. military contractors encountered engine trouble and crashed in Colombia in February 2003. … Palmera, who is better known by his nom de guerre Simon Trinidad, was extradited in late 2004 after his capture in Ecuador. If convicted, Palmera could face 30 years in prison, the maximum allowed under the extradition treaty between Colombia and the United States."

Padilla Case Raises Questions Over Torture And Subsequent Prosecution. The Christian Science Monitor (11/16, Richey, 59K) reports the Jose Padilla case "is raising fundamental questions about whether a US citizen's harsh treatment -- and alleged torture -- while in US military custody should prevent his later prosecution in the criminal-justice system." Padilla's lawyers say he "was tortured while being held for three years and eight months as an enemy combatant," and want all criminal charges against him to be dropped "because of the government's alleged illegal and abusive treatment." While federal prosecutors said in a written motion this that Padilla "was not tortured or abused," even if "he had been tortured, they added, there is no legal support for Padilla's request that all charges against him be dismissed." Assistant US Attorney Russell Killinger wrote, "Padilla has not cited a single precedent absolutely barring a federal criminal prosecution because of alleged due process violations committed during a prior military detention."

Detainee's Lawyer Tries To Prevent Heart Procedure At Guantanamo. The AP (11/15, Selsky) reports an attorney for Saifullah Paracha, a "69-year-old multimillionaire businessman" from Pakistan who is being detained at Guantanamo Bay, "has asked a judge to block a planned medical procedure on the prisoner's heart, saying that performing it at the U.S. base puts his life at risk." Paracha has "already had one heart attack while in U.S. custody and in recent days has suffered chest pains, his lawyers said." The lawyer says the procedure should be carried out at a hospital in the US or Pakistan.

German High Court Finds Motassadeq Guilty Of Abetting Murder. Bloomberg (11/16, Rach) reports, "Germany's highest criminal court found Mounir el-Motassadeq guilty of abetting the murder of more than 2000 people in the Sept. 11 attacks in the U.S., overturning part of a lower court's decision. The Federal Court of Justice today upheld the lower court's ruling that el-Motassadeq, a 32-year-old Moroccan, was guilty of being a member of the Hamburg terror cell that participated in the attacks. El-Motassadeq's seven-year jail sentence will be reassessed by the Hamburg Higher Regional Court," in light of the ruling.

Motassadeq Case Said To Expose Flaws In International Anti-Terror Cooperation. The Christian Science Monitor (11/16, Wiltenburg, 59K) writes, "If convicted terrorist-cell member Mounir el-Motassadeq walks free Thursday from a German courtroom, he may have US security policy to thank." Motassadeq, "direct and respectful before his judges," is "less well-known than recently sentenced 9/11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, whose courtroom theatrics drew broad attention to his trial in the US. But the dramatic legal odyssey of the first man ever tried in connection with the Sept. 11 attacks has been the focus of bitter recrimination between German and US officials, who have denied the case's lawyers access to statements from a key witness. As both countries attempt to strike the right balance between national security and the rule of law, observers say the case is a prime example of why it will take better global cooperation to succeed in the war on terror."

Ex-Pentagon Official Says Terror War Tactics Must Reflect US Values. In a Washington Post (11/16, A27, 690K) op-ed, Center for Strategic and International Studies President John Hamre, a former deputy defense secretary, writes, "In the warm glow of post-election bipartisanship, Congress and President Bush would do well to take on a crucial task: forging a new legal foundation for the global war on terrorism. The current policy framework is a disaster. While I know it's not true, still, the world believes that America condones torture, prison camps and 'disappearance' tactics." The US "will lose the global war on terrorism if we feel we must adopt tactics that undermine our civic values. For generations the world has admired America's commitment to the rule of law and government accountability. Much of the world now questions that commitment."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

US Seen As Unprepared For Dirty Bomb Attack. In a story titled "Dirty Bombs: A Nation Unprepared," KTVT-TV Dallas (11/15, Riggs) reported on its Web site from a piece broadcast yesterday, "Agents gather outside the nation's capital at the FBI's Training Academy in Quantico, Virginia to train on how to prevent or identify the perpetrators of such an attack. … Travis Callaway, a nuclear specialist with the FBI, says it's easy for terrorists to get their hands on the key ingredients. 'Getting an industrial or medical isotope is not that difficult to come by. There are literally millions of sources around the world. They are used in industry and medical purposes all the time. Most are not guarded at all or under simple lock and key.' Two dozen response teams, based at FBI offices across the country, receive 300 hours of specialized training on weapons of mass destruction. … The teams maintain a low profile at high profile events says John Fraga the chief of the Hazardous Materials Response Unit. 'The majority of our work in prevention has been deploying to special events or events that would attract the attention of certain groups. Having us on site is certainly the better thing to have so we can assess threats and packages and things like that.'" However, Charles Ferguson of the Council on Foreign Relations "says there is a lot of worry that the government is not prepared" for a dirty bomb attack, "especially in the wake of its slow response to Hurricane Katrina." KTVT added, "At the current pace of research and planning, reliable safety advice from the government may be a long time coming."

FBI Arrests Massachusetts Student For Bomb Threat Hoax To NSA. The Boston Herald (11/16, Johnson, 184K) reports, "A 21-year-old University of Massachusetts student sent a booze-fueled bomb hoax to the National Security Agency, claiming a man he'd randomly plucked from facebook.com was planning a suicide attack on the Sears Tower, according to an FBI affidavit. Agents yesterday arrested Adam Hart of Georgetown, at UMass Amherst, where he now goes to school. … He pleaded not guilty to malicious conveying of false information and was released on a $10,000 unsecured bond."

Judge Upholds Law Banning Instruction On How To Make Firebombs. The San Diego Union-Tribune (11/16, Soto, 324K) reports US District Judge Jeffrey A. Miller in San Diego "has rejected a radical activist's request to invalidate a law making it illegal to tell people how to make a firebomb with the intention that they go out and commit a violent crime." Rodney Coronado "argued that the law infringed upon the First Amendment protections of free speech," but "Miller Wednesday sided with prosecutors, who said the law was tailored to apply to specific criminal activity which the government has a responsibility to control." The Union-Tribune notes, "On Aug. 1, 2003, Coronado gave a speech…in which, in response to a question from the audience, he demonstrated how he made a gasoline-fueled device he used to burn down a Michigan State University laboratory in 1992. Hours earlier, an arson fire destroyed a huge housing complex under construction in University City causing $50 million in damage. A group for which Coronado has acted as spokesman, the Earth Liberation Front…took credit."

Hatfill Urges Judge To Fine NYTimes Over Refusal To Disclose Sources. The New York Sun (11/16, Gerstein) reports that in his libel lawsuit against the New York Times, Steven Hatfill "has asked a federal judge to fine the newspaper $25,000 a day for refusing to disclose its confidential sources and to increase the fine amount by $25,000 each month in an attempt to encourage the paper to comply." The Sun notes, "While the FBI searched Mr. Hatfill's home and the Justice Department eventually named him as a 'person of interest' in the anthrax case, neither the scientist nor anyone else was ever charged in connection with the crimes." In the fine motion, Hatfill lawyer Thomas Connolly "painted the Times's refusal to comply as brazen and willful," but NYTimes lawyers note that "the names of only two sources are being withheld. Mr. Kristof has said both were FBI employees."

Attorney Disputes US Claims Of Sexual Activity On Airplane. The AP (11/16) reports from Raleigh, NC, "A man arrested for allegedly engaging in 'overt sexual activity' with his girlfriend on an airliner was lying with his head on her lap because he was not feeling well, his attorney said. … That gesture was misinterpreted by a flight attendant, who humiliated and harassed the couple, said attorney Deb Newton, who represents Carl Persing." The AP continues, "Persing and Dawn Sewell, both of Lakewood, California, face federal charges of interfering with flight crew members, allegedly by disobeying a flight attendant's request that they stop their public displays of affection. … They were arrested on Sept. 15 when they arrived at Raleigh-Durham International Airport on a Southwest Airlines flight from Los Angeles. … 'The one witness I've talked to and the defendant dispute almost everything in the government's affidavit as to what happened on that airplane,' Newton said."

Gonzales Meets With Allard About SuperMax Funding. The Rocky Mountain News (11/15) reports, "U.S. Sen. Wayne Allard, R-Colo., met today with U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez to seek support in adding $12 million to the Commerce, Justice and State Appropriations bill to fund a perimeter fence at Supermax in Florence." The News continues, "Allard's office said that during the meeting, Gonzalez pledged to work with Allard to address the funding issue for the fence." The News adds, "The prison holds a number of the nation's most notorious terrorists such as 9/11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui and 1993 World Trade Center bomber Ramzi Yousef. … A Justice Department inspector general's report in September criticized the prison for a number of shortcomings, including a lack of security and failure to monitor the mail. … 'Today's meeting was extremely productive,' said Allard. 'Attorney General Gonzales assured me that the mail deficiencies raised in the inspector general's report are being addressed, and he agreed to discuss the need for a perimeter fence with the Bureau of Prisons director and follow up with me on the potential avenues to funding the fence.'"

KCNC- TV Denver (11/15, 6:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "For years, neighbors have been asking the government to improve the security. Today, Allard met with Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. They talked about money for the fence and a recent study that cites several safety issues."

WAR NEWS:

Abizaid Rejects Iraq Withdrawal Timetable. USA Today (11/16, Kelley, 2.27M) reports on its front page that Gen. John Abizaid, the top US commander in the Middle East, "urged Congress to resist withdrawing American troops from Iraq any time soon, a stance that drew sharp disagreement from top Republicans and Democrats."

The three broadcast networks focused largely on the domestic political aspect of the story, with ABC World News (11/15, lead story, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) saying Abizaid "found himself caught between sort of a rock and a hard place, today, on Capitol Hill. The rock: the unrelenting violence in Iraq. The hard place: the rising tide of American disapproval for the war. A week after voters sent a strong signal of dissatisfaction for the war," Abizaid "warned the Senate Armed Services Committee, do not set a timetable for troop withdrawal."

The CBS Evening News (11/15, lead story, 1:40, Couric, 7.66M) cast it slightly differently, beginning, "They won control of Congress with calls to start pulling US troops out of Iraq. But one week later, the Democrats have run into their first big roadblock, a roadblock with a green uniform and four stars." Meanwhile, NBC Nightly News (11/15, lead story, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) focused more directly on the military aspect, saying, "For those Americans in a rush to get out of Iraq, the top US Commander on the ground had a warning today: Don't do it." While Abizaid "is no stranger to incoming fire he faced a lot of tough questions and a lot has changed since his last visit to Capitol Hill, including what the voters had to say."

CNN's The Situation Room (11/15, Bash) said Abizaid "came here to Capitol Hill, and a lot of what he did was reject the ideas coming from both sides of the aisle. First and foremost, he said once again that the idea that Democrats are proposing for a timetable for withdrawal, even starting in four to six months, is a non-starter. … He even said no to the idea, floated for some time now by Republican Sen. John McCain, to put more troops into Iraq." The Financial Times (11/16, Sevastopulo) says Abizaid "drew the ire" of McCain "by saying he did not believe more troops would help the US stop the bloodshed." But Abizaid did say he "had requested an increase in the number of U.S. military advisers in Iraq and had sent another 2,000-Marine unit into the country's restive western region," the Los Angeles Times (11/16, Spiegel, 850K) reports.

The New York Times (11/16, Gordon, Mazzetti, 1.16M) reports midway through its front-page story that Abizaid "also publicly said for the first time that the American position in Iraq had been undermined by the Bush administration's decision not to deploy a larger force to stabilize the country in 2003." That decision came after then-Army Chief of Staff Gen. Eric Shinseki "told Congress that several hundred thousand troops would be needed. His testimony was derided" by Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

McCain, Clinton Among Most Vocal Critics. The Washington Post (11/16, A22, Ricks, Tyson, 690K) says the "first major Iraq hearings since the Nov. 7 midterm elections revealed blunt impatience among Democrats as well as open frustration from Republicans, and produced the rare spectacle of presidential hopefuls from both parties taking aim at the general." McCain "voiced disappointment that Abizaid seemed to be clinging to the 'status quo,'" while Sen. Hillary Clinton "took exception with Abizaid's talk of all the steps that the Iraqi government needs to take. 'Hope is not a method,' she told him. 'We've had testimony now for four years about what 'must be done' -- and it doesn't get done.'" The Washington Times (11/16, Scarborough, 88K) says McCain said, "It's not encouraging to those of us who heard time after time that things are, quote, 'progressing well,' that we're making progress, et cetera, because we're hearing from many other sources that that's not the case."

The New York Times (11/16, Zernike, 1.16M) says in a front page story that "there were three contenders for president" on hand -- Clinton, McCain, and Sen. Evan Bayh, as well as Sen. Joseph Lieberman, "the self-described 'Independent Democrat'…who is at risk of bolting and taking his party's new narrow majority with him."

Levin Says He Was Surprised By Abizaid's Assessment. Sen. Carl Levin said on CNN's The Situation Room (11/15, Blitzer), "What Gen. Abizaid basically said which did surprise me is that he thinks that things are getting somewhat better in Iraq. And according to the two leaders of our intelligence community, the head of the Defense Intelligence Agency and the head of the Central Intelligence Agency, who testified this afternoon, things are getting worse in Iraq."

Levin said on the CBS Evening News (11/15, story 2, 1:15, Couric, 7.66M), "I was somewhat frustrated because I thought basically he was saying that we should stay the course, which is, I think, clearly a position that's been rejected by the American people overwhelmingly, staying in course in Iraq is not a strategy for success. The horrible violence on the ground, it seems to me, is proving that everyday."

The AP (11/15, Flaherty) reports Levin "told reporters he was encouraged the general said all options should remain on the table." Levin said, "The only way for Iraqi leaders to squarely face that reality is for President Bush to tell them that the United States will begin a phased redeployment of our forces within four to six months."

Reed Sees No "Specific Time" For Withdrawal. Asked about withdrawal timelines on MSNBC (11/15, Mitchell), Sen. Jack Reed said, "I don't think there's a specific time. I think we understand that that is essentially a military judgment. But there's a series of very important questions. One is, is there a tipping point in which the chaos is going to become out of control and our presence there will not be particularly effective? Have we reached that tipping point?"

Casey Opposes Timetables. McClatchy (11/16, Youssef, Brown) reports that while Abizaid argued against withdrawal timetables in Washington, US Iraq commander Gen. George Casey said in an interview that the situation "remains too unstable to withdraw troops and that setting a date for U.S. troops to start leaving would 'just allow folks to wait us out.'"

Senate Democratic Leaders Worry Bush Not Ready For Iraq Changes. The Christian Science Monitor (11/16, Feldmann, 59K) reports the "leadership of the new Senate Democratic majority expressed concern Wednesday that President Bush does not understand the urgency of the situation in Iraq, and does not appear to be planning for change beyond replacing Donald Rumsfeld as secretary of Defense." At a Monitor breakfast, incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said, "We are bound and determined to change course in Iraq. We have a plan, we have enunciated that plan, we have done it through legislation and a lot of talk, and we'll continue to do that." The Monitor adds Reid was "accompanied by his deputies in the Democratic leadership, Richard Durbin of Illinois, Charles Schumer of New York, and Patty Murray of Washington." Later, the senators "added that they were not pushing for impeachment, of either Bush or Cheney." Reid said, "One of the things that we were able to cut off pretty quickly is the 'impeach Bush' program. That was because of two words: Dick Cheney." The Monitor adds Schumer "blamed the administration for not listening to multiple points of view, saying that when someone does, 'they kneecap him.'"

Iraq Study Group's "Washington Insiders" Seek Solution. NBC Nightly News (11/15, story 2, 2:15, Williams, 9.87M) profiled the Iraq Study Group, a group of "Washington insiders who hope to forge a way out of a bad spot in Iraq." NBC (Mitchell) added, "To the rescue: Ten Washington veterans -- five Republicans and five Democrats -- battled scarred by decades of political wars, trying to find a way out of a real one. … How to bridge the divide between staying the course and withdrawing starting in four to six months? People close to the commission say it will be tough, a phased withdrawal tied to deadlines for Iraq's government to control the violence."

Iraqis Also Debating Future Of US Operations. The New York Times (11/16, A17, Tavernise, 1.16M) writes, "While Americans in a faraway land debate their fate, Iraqis have already decided on the cure. The only problem is that there is more than one set of Iraqis. Shiites want their country back. Sunni Arabs want a strongman. They cannot agree." As the US "grapples with difficult decisions over the war, Iraqis are also debating. But just when they need to band together, they have never been further apart. … The landscape is that of a country sliding into war, and Sunnis and Shiites, like Republicans and Democrats, desperately look for ways out." Shiites "agree with many Democrats: American soldiers should withdraw to their bases. Sunnis say total control by the Shiite-dominated government could mean massacres."

The Washington Post (11/16, Knickmeyer, 690K) reports on its front page that "while American commanders have suggested that civil war is possible in Iraq, many leaders, experts and ordinary people in Baghdad and around the Middle East say it is already underway, and that the real worry ahead is that the conflict will destroy the flimsy Iraqi state and draw in surrounding countries." The Post says that "according to U.S. and Arab analysts and political observers," whether the US "departs Iraq sooner or later, the United States will be hard-pressed to leave behind a country that does not threaten U.S. interests and regional peace."

Iran Now Concerned About Rapid US Exit From Iraq. Meanwhile next door, Iran is expressing concerns about a prompt US withdrawal. The Los Angeles Times (11/16, Murphy, 850K) reports the fresh post-election "talk of a phased pullout have touched off a discussion in Tehran about the outright anarchy that could result." A political commentator on Tehran's English-language news channel said Tuesday night that the US should "remain in Iraq until it has established a strong, stable central government capable of providing adequate security."

Kondracke Says More US Troops Needed In Iraq. In his Roll Call (11/16) column, Morton Kondracke writes, "To salvage stability from what looks like inevitable chaos in Iraq, the United States needs a new strategy that produces security, political reconciliation and hope. That should involve sending more U.S. troops -- at least on a temporary basis -- while pressuring the Iraqi government for reform and mounting a massive jobs project to reduce unemployment in the country." While it "would be politically impossible" for the White House to seek a troop level increase following the midterm elections, "conceivably it could be done if the idea is blessed by the Iraq Study Group."

About 70 Freed, But Iraq Kidnapping Leads To Confusion, Infighting. The AP (11/15, Wagner) reports kidnappers "released about 70 people snatched in a mass abduction by suspected Shiite militiamen," a sign the militants "went too far and Iraq's leader may be yielding to intense U.S. pressure to crack down on sectarian violence." But PM Nouri al-Maliki "clearly has more work to do. Iraqi police, hospital and morgue officials reported 105 new violent deaths Wednesday; 54 of the victims were tortured and shot, their bodies dumped in Baghdad." The CBS Evening News (11/15, story 3, , Couric, 7.66M) said officials "are trying to sort out the details of the mass kidnapping. … It's still not clear exactly how many people were kidnapped yesterday, estimates range from 40 to 150, or how many people are still being held."

The New York Times (11/16, A16, Semple, 1.16M) reports that a "dispute erupted Wednesday between Iraqi officials" over the incident. A spokesman for Minister of Higher Education Abed Dhiab al-Ajeeli said "nearly 100" captives were still being held," but chief government spokesman Ali Dabbagh "contended that only 39 people had been kidnapped and that all but 2 had been released. Both men angrily dismissed the other's comments as false."

Educators See Incident As Assault On Schools. The Washington Post (11/16, A23, Raghavan, 690K) runs a feature on the woes of Iraq's colleges in the wake of the "brazen daylight raid on a Ministry of Higher Education building." The "most profound effect of what many Iraqis view as a national calamity was felt in university halls and campuses across Iraq. Here, the abductions highlighted the plight of academics and an educational system besieged by sectarian tensions, lawlessness and government ineffectiveness."

Platoons' Investigation Of Mass Kidnapping Recounted. The Los Angeles Times (11/16, Smith, 850K) runs the third installment of its four-part series on the platoons of the 4th (Tomahawk) Battalion, 23rd Infantry Regiment, 172nd Stryker Brigade Combat Team that spent part of October investigating the kidnapping of at least 22 Iraqi men from a meatpacking plant in southwest Baghdad.

More Commentary On Sectarian Violence. In a Los Angeles Times (11/16, 850K) op-ed, Michael Rubin of the American Enterprise Institute writes that the Maliki government "has proved a grave disappointment. Security has worsened since Maliki has been in power. Ignoring the pleas of U.S. officials, he has been unwilling to crack down on the militias and death squads that fuel sectarian violence -- and the mass kidnapping from a Ministry of Higher Education building in Baghdad on Tuesday by gunmen in police uniforms shows the consequences. … But does this mean that the U.S. ambition to bring democracy to Iraq was a mistake? As a supporter of the war, and later an advisor to the U.S. occupation authority, I don't think so. Despite our disappointment with Maliki, the strategic rationale for promoting democracy in the Middle East -- and in Iraq in particular -- remains sound."

In a Los Angeles Times (11/16, 850K) op-ed, the American Prospect's Laura Rozen writes, "A debate is emerging inside the Bush administration: Should the U.S. abandon its efforts to act as a neutral referee in the ongoing civil war and, instead, throw its lot in with the Shiites? A U.S. tilt toward the Shiites is a risky strategy, one that could further alienate Iraq's Sunni neighbors and that could backfire by driving its Sunni population into common cause with foreign jihadists and Al Qaeda cells. But elements of the administration, including some members of the intelligence community, believe that such a tilt could lead to stability more quickly than the current policy of trying to police the ongoing sectarian conflict evenhandedly, with little success and at great cost."

Six More US Troop Deaths Reported In Iraq. ABC World News (11/15, story 2, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In Iraq today, the US military reported the deaths of six American forces. Two were killed in a roadside bombing in Baghdad. The others died in fighting in al Anbar province, the volatile region west of the capital."

Locals Afraid To Join Police Force In Anbar. USA Today (11/16, 11A, Brook, 2.27M) examines the lack of protection and pay for police in Iraq's Anbar Province. The volatile "Sunni stronghold" is "lightly held by about 33,000 U.S. troops spread across 53,000 square miles." USMC Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer, the regional commander, "has said he doesn't command enough forces to defeat the insurgency. Instead, American forces are training Iraqi soldiers and police officers to do it." But "locals are reluctant to join the police because insurgents are waging an effective intimidation campaign and there aren't enough American forces to protect every recruit."

Soldier Pleads Guilty In Mahmoudiya Rape-Murder Case. The AP (11/15, Lenz) reports Spc. James Barker, one of the four US soldiers "accused of raping a 14-year-old Iraqi girl last spring and killing her and her family" in Mahmoudiya, has pleaded guilty and agreed to testify against the others. His civilian attorney David Sheldon said Barker "agreed to the plea deal to avoid the death penalty." When military judge Lt. Col. Richard Anderson asked Barker why he participated in the assault, Barker replied, "I hated Iraqis, your honor. They can smile at you, then shoot you in your face without even thinking about it."

Resurgent Taliban, Al Qaeda Using Iraq Methods In Afghanistan. The Washington Post (11/16, A22, Linzer, Pincus, 690K) reports CIA Director Gen. Michael Hayden and Defense Intelligence Agency Director Lt. Gen. Michael Maples told the Senate Armed Services

DOJ_NMG_0094874

Committee that al Qaeda's "influence and numbers are rapidly growing in Afghanistan, with fighters operating from new havens and mimicking techniques learned on the Iraqi battlefield for use against U.S. and allied troops." They said both al Qaeda and the Taliban "are back, waging a 'bloody insurgency' in the south and east of the country." Hayden said, "The direct tissue between Iraq and Afghanistan is al Qaeda. The lessons learned in Iraq are being applied to Afghanistan." Senators "noted the increased use of roadside bombs and the relatively new phenomenon of suicide attacks, which had not been seen in Afghanistan before the Iraq war."

Al Qaeda Finds Fruitful Recruiting Grounds In Pakistan. ABC World News (11/15, story 3, 2:40, Ross, 8.78M) reported, "Al Qaeda's ability to find new recruits is of great concern to officials. … Much of that recruiting is taking place in Pakistan. This is one of the places where US and Pakistani officials say Al Qaeda has been able to find new recruits: A yearly gathering in a field, held this week outside Lahore, Pakistan, attended by more than one million religious, conservative Muslims who belong to a group that opposes violence. But intelligence sources tell ABC News Al Qaeda uses the setting as cover."

Christmas Trees Donated To Troops, Families At Home. USA Today/AP (11/16, 9A, Kates) reports Christmas tree growers across the US "are donating thousands of trees to them and their families stateside. … The 'Trees for Troops' effort is part of a campaign by the National Christmas Tree Association's Christmas Spirit Foundation to collect more than 11,000 trees in 27 states."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Enron CAO Sentenced For Securities Fraud. The AP (11/16, Lozano) reports, "Richard Causey, the last of the top Enron Corp. executives to learn his punishment, was sentenced Wednesday to five-and-a-half years in prison for his role in one of the biggest corporate scandals in U.S. history." The AP continues, "Causey, the company's former chief accounting officer, pleaded guilty in December to securities fraud two weeks before he was to be tried along with Enron founder Kenneth Lay and former Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling on conspiracy, fraud and other charges related to the company's collapse." The AP adds, "Causey, 46, had agreed to serve seven years in prison. Prosecutors indicated they could have recommended it be reduced to five if they were pleased with his cooperation. … The maximum penalty for securities fraud is 10 years in prison and a fine of $1 million or twice the amount illegally gained." The AP notes, "Causey also agreed to fork over $1.25 million to the government and forfeited a claim to about $250,000 in deferred compensation as part of his plea deal. Unlike others at Enron, Causey didn't skim millions of dollars for himself from shady deals. … Prosecutors dropped their plan to seize Causey's home, a $950,000 two-story, red brick house in a Houston suburb. … Causey, the government's 16th cooperating witness who entered a guilty plea, had faced more than 30 counts of conspiracy, fraud, insider trading, lying to auditors and money laundering."

USA Today (11/16, Farrell) reports, "Causey's sentence includes $1.25 million in forfeiture and a fine of $25,000. He could have received up to seven years under the plea deal he entered last year." USA adds, "Earlier this year, a jury in Houston convicted Enron's two former CEOs, Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling, of lying to the public about the company's financial health. For his role in the fraud, Skilling was sentenced to 24 years and four months in prison. Lay's conviction was vacated because he died in July before he had the chance to appeal the verdict. … Causey was originally scheduled to go to trial as a co-defendant with the two men. … Former Enron chief financial officer Andrew Fastow, the other member of the company's inner sanctum of management, pleaded guilty in early 2004, agreeing to serve a 10-year sentence for crimes he committed at the company. But because of his cooperation, which culminated in one week of trial testimony on behalf of the government against Lay and Skilling, a federal judge in September reduced his sentence to six years."

The Washington Post (11/16, D01, Johnson) reports, "Corporate insiders portrayed Causey, a former accountant at Arthur Andersen LLP known for his genial personality and his love of golf, as a man cowed by Enron's aggressive, rules-bending culture. But prosecutors on the Justice Department's since-disbanded Enron Task Force contended that fraud could not have flourished without Causey's actions and his failure to blow the whistle on others. … His get-along attitude helped Causey steadily climb the corporate ladder, and he became Enron's top accountant in 1998, three years before the company's demise. Causey and his wife, Elizabeth, last year forfeited $1.25 million in a bank account, and he gave up the rights to about $250,000 more in deferred pay from Enron."

SEC Launches Formal Probe Of Dell's Accounting Practices. The Austin American-Statesman (11/16, Zehr) reports, "Federal securities regulators have launched a formal investigation into Dell Inc.'s financial record-keeping, upgrading an informal inquiry they started a year ago." The A-S continues, "Dell disclosed the development Wednesday evening. At the same time, it said it would postpone its third-quarter financial report, which had been scheduled for today, until the end of the month. … Dell said the move was related to ongoing reviews of its accounting, not the upgrading of the Securities and Exchange Commission investigation. … 'It really is just a high degree of prudence that's being placed on all our financial reporting right now,' said spokesman Jess Blackburn. 'There's just a high degree of care being given to reviewing that material and being certain of what we want to report before we report it.'" The A-S adds, "The SEC does not comment on investigations, and there have been few clues about what the probe involves. Dell previously has said the reviews focus on 'issues related to accruals, reserves and other balance-sheet items.' … A formal investigation indicates the agency has reason to believe there are problems with Dell's books and gives the agency the authority to subpoena testimony and documents. … The formal investigation and postponed earnings come just as Dell appeared to have shrugged off the most serious effects of a yearlong stretch of setbacks." The A-S notes, "Dell first revealed concerns about its financial reporting in August, when it said it had been the subject of an information investigation by the SEC. In response to that inquiry, Dell said it had found some accounting problems stretched back before the investigation started and asked the audit committee to begin an independent probe. … By September, the reviews had raised the interest of the Justice Department. The U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York asked for documents going back to 2002."

The Wall Street Journal (11/16, A2, Lawton) reports, "Neither Dell nor the SEC has disclosed the exact nature of the issues being investigated. In September, Dell issued a statement noting that the probe could involve potential issues 'relating to accruals, reserves and other balance- sheet items.' Companies use accruals and reserves when they sell services but deliver them at a later date. In Dell's case, the company typically sets aside funds from current operations to cover the cost of future warranty claims." The Journal adds, "The intensifying investigation is the latest in a series of setbacks for Dell. Over the past year, the onetime highflier has suffered slower growth and falling profits amid a struggle to compete against resurgent rivals such as Hewlett-Packard Co. Dell recently lost its position as the world's largest personal-computer seller, according to market researchers IDC and Gartner. It also announced a battery recall involving millions of laptops in August because the batteries were a potential fire hazard. Dell's stock has fallen 14% so far this year."

The New York Times (11/16, Darlin) reports, "The announcement surprised analysts, as had previous announcements about the accounting investigations. Dell had announced preliminary results for its second quarter in August, but has not yet filed the required 10-Q quarterly report of those earnings with the S.E.C. The company also canceled an analysts' meeting in September at the last moment, citing the S.E.C.'s investigation. … The company said that it would announce its third-quarter results in a news release at the end of the month and its top executives would not hold the customary conference call with analysts and journalists."

Former Hewlett-Packard Chairwoman Pleads Not Guilty. The AP (11/16, Robertson) reports, "Former Hewlett-Packard Co. Chairwoman Patricia Dunn pleaded not guilty Wednesday to four felony identity theft and fraud charges for allegedly instigating the company's ill-fated spying probe into boardroom leaks." The AP continues, "Dunn appeared briefly for her arraignment in Santa Clara County Superior Court and was released on her own recognizance after her lawyer entered the plea for her. … She and her attorney, Raj Chatterjee, declined to comment as they left court." The AP adds, "Dunn, 53, is one of five people charged in the computer and printer maker's clandestine efforts to unmask board members who discussed company business with reporters. Investigators used a shady ruse known as 'pretexting' to obtain the confidential phone logs of directors, reporters and others to trace the source of the leaks. … Testifying before a congressional in September, Dunn said she was repeatedly reassured by HP's lawyers about the legality of its detectives' subterfuge. … She resigned from HP's board after the scandal broke in early September. The two-time cancer survivor recently began chemotherapy for ovarian cancer."

Auditors Clear SEC's Financial Statements. The Washington Post (11/16, D02, Johnson) reports, "Auditors gave the financial statements of the Securities and Exchange Commission a clean bill of health, a sign that the market watchdog has taken steps to fix problems that prompted a lawmaker last year to chide the agency for what he called 'hypocrisy.'" The Post continues, "The Government Accountability Office, which reviewed the SEC's books for the fiscal year ended in September, said in documents issued yesterday that the SEC had come close to fully resolving past weaknesses in its financial controls. … The GAO had cited problems with how the SEC tracks penalties it levies, with its information systems controls and with its financial reporting process. Now, auditors say, those issues are far less serious than they were." The Post adds, "This is the third year the SEC has allowed outside audit of its books and financial controls, which are designed to help prevent fraud and mistakes. … The problems were exposed in March 2005, the same time securities regulators were imposing stiff new rules that forced managers at publicly traded companies to assess their own controls. The rules have proven expensive and controversial and are the focus of an aggressive and well-funded business lobbying campaign. This week, leaders at the SEC and the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, which oversees the audit industry, have been working to resolve differences in their approach to modifying the rules."

Corporate Board Ousters Could Spur More Options Probes. The Los Angeles Times (11/16, Petruno) reports, "By ousting KB Home chief Bruce Karatz over inflated stock option awards, the Los Angeles company's board instantly made the executive a high-profile potential target for federal prosecutors, legal experts say." The Times continues, "More than 50 corporate officers nationwide have resigned or been fired in the continuing scandal over alleged option manipulation, but most of those have been at relatively small companies. …As the head of a business with $10 billion in annual sales, Karatz automatically would present a higher priority to government investigators than executives who ran much smaller firms, several attorneys said. … 'Especially if it's someone senior, I think those go to the top of the list' for prosecutors, said John Olson, a partner at Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher in Washington." The Times adds, "Authorities have not accused Karatz of wrongdoing, and spokesmen for both the U.S. attorney's office and the Securities and Exchange Commission declined to comment Wednesday on Karatz or KB Home. The company in August disclosed that the SEC was conducting an informal investigation of its option practices. … On Sunday, the company's board announced that Karatz had resigned following an internal investigation that determined he was responsible for setting 'incorrect' stock option grant dates from 1998 to 2005. The effect was to boost the value of those grants for Karatz and other KB Home executives. … 'It's a huge thing for a board to kick out a CEO,' said Thomas Curran, an attorney at Ganfer & Shore and a former assistant district attorney in New York. … The directors said that Karatz and Gary A. Ray, who had been the company's human resources chief, chose the option grant dates."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Abramoff Reports To Federal Prison. ABC World News (11/15, story 10, 0:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "And the man who once wielded tremendous influence in Washington, is tonight, a Federal prisoner. Former lobbyist, Jack Abramoff, at the center of a Capitol Hill corruption scandal, began serving an almost six-year sentence in Maryland. He was convicted of fraud in a Florida business deal. Meanwhile, ABC's George Stephanopoulos reports the Democratic Party's first order of business on Capitol Hill, will be to ban all gifts and travel paid for by lobbyists, once they, the Democrats, take control of the House and Senate in January."

The CBS Evening News (11/15, story 6, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "A former Washington insider has a new roof over his head. Lobbyist Jack Abramoff reported today to the Federal pen in Cumberland, Maryland. He'll serve six years for business fraud. Abramoff is still cooperating with a corruption investigation allegedly involving members of Congress and White House officials."

The AP (11/16) reports from Cumberland, MD, "Disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, convicted of federal charges after using expensive gifts, campaign donations and exotic trips to win access to the powerful in Washington, went to prison Wednesday." The AP continues, "Abramoff arrived at about 6:30 a.m. EST at a relatively secluded prison facility in western Maryland to begin serving a nearly six-year prison sentence for a fraudulent deal to buy a fleet of casino ships in Florida. … Abramoff was delivered out of sight of waiting reporters and camera crews and his arrival was announced in a two-paragraph statement by a prison representative." The AP adds, "The part of the camp where Abramoff will be kept is a 334-bed minimum security facility located near an industrial park along the north branch of the Potomac River. … The camp is all male. It consists of a number of two-story dormitories that are light red cinderblock structures. Each dormitory contains a number of six-bed cubicles, and Abramoff was being assigned to one of those. The prison is nearly surrounded by Appalachian Mountain ridges rising along either bank of the Potomac on the Maryland and West Virginia sides of the river. … Stephen Finger, executive assistant at the prison, said all inmates work while there. Incoming inmates such as Abramoff typically are assigned to menial jobs such as food service work. Finer said that inmates can work their way up from low-level jobs paying 12 cents an hour to better positions paying up to 40 cents an hour."

The Legal Times (11/16, Palmer) reports, "Abramoff also faces jail time after pleading guilty in Washington to fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy to bribe public officials. Justice Department lawyers have put off Abramoff's sentencing related to those charges, citing his cooperation with the department's ongoing corruption probe. He is expected to be sentenced in that case next year." The Times adds, "Although Abramoff was originally supposed to report to prison in Pennsylvania, the Justice Department intervened in late October, suggesting the Federal Correctional Institute in Cumberland as its preferred choice. Located in western Maryland, the medium-security facility is within driving distance of Washington, allowing federal prosecutors easy access to Abramoff. … Abramoff was sentenced in March by U.S. District Judge Paul Huck in the Southern District of Florida after pleading guilty to wire fraud, conspiracy to commit wire fraud, and mail fraud. He was also sentenced to three years of supervised release."

Third Man Pleads Guilty In 2002 New Hampshire Phone-Jam Case. The Manchester (NH) Union Leader (11/15, Distaso) reports, "A third conspirator has agreed to plead guilty to federal criminal charges in connection with a Republican operation that jammed Democratic get-out-the-vote telephone lines on election day, 2002." The Leader continues, "Shaun Hansen, whose former telemarketing firm placed the hundreds of line-jamming calls after being hired by a Republican operative, admits violating federal statutes outlawing telephone harassment and conspiracy to commit telephone harassment. … He faces maximum penalties of $250,000 and five years in prison for the harassment charge and a fine of $250,000 for the conspiracy charge. But under an agreement filed in U.S. District Court in Concord this week, federal prosecutors agreed not to oppose Hansen's request for sentence reduction 'based upon the defendant's apparent prompt recognition and affirmative acceptance of personal responsibility for the offense.'" The Leader adds, "The Justice Department also agreed not to prosecute Hansen on any additional charges.Hansen owned the former Idaho-based Mylo Enterprises, a telemarketing firm that was paid $2,500 by GOP consultant Allen Raymond to place hundreds of hang-up calls to five Democratic Party offices and the Manchester firefighters union headquarters to jam their get-out-the-vote and rides-to-the-polls telephone lines. The operation proceeded for about 90 minutes on the morning of election day, 2002, before being called off by the former GOP state chairman.According to previous court documents and testimony, Raymond was hired by former state Republican executive director Charles McGee for $15,600 to find a firm to make the calls. McGee and Raymond also spoke with former Republican National Committee official James Tobin about the operation, according to court documents and testimony."

Television Pitchman Sentenced For Selling Faulty Computers. The AP (11/16, Dale) reports from Philadelphia, "A TV pitchman who defrauded customers, banks and vendors out of $39 million by selling them faulty computers was sentenced to more than seven years in prison by a judge who called his conduct 'unforgivable.'" The AP continues, 'George Capell, 51, continued to scheme until the end, tapping a secret bank account even after his bankruptcy and guilty plea to indulge a taste for strip clubs, fancy cars and a Florida condominium, authorities said. … 'This to me is unforgivable,' U.S. District Judge Anita B. Brody said Tuesday in handing down an 86-month sentence, near the top of the sentencing guidelines. … Capell's lawyer, Scott DiClaudio, blamed the losses on 'a failed business model.'" The AP adds, "After seeing Capell's TV infomercials, some customers spent upward of $2,000 apiece on computer systems that arrived, if at all, with broken or missing parts. Many of the customers were disabled or unemployed, and needed the computers to find jobs, the judge said. … Others lived in rural areas far from an electronics store, and were forced to buy computers sight unseen, said bankruptcy court trustee Lawrence Lichtenstein. … The bilked customers, from more than a dozen states, have received restitution of 25 cents on the dollar, Lichtenstein said. He hopes to eke out another 10 cents on the dollar for them through the sale of Capell's condominium and half the proceeds of Capell's $1 million home. … Capell pleaded guilty to 41 fraud and money laundering counts in April. His company, which did business as the Video Computer Store, ran a call center and warehouse from 1999 to 2001."

Global Police Unit Created To Hunt Down Pedophiles. USA Today (11/16, Leinwand) reports, "U.S. agents are joining authorities in Canada, Britain and Australia to form a global police unit that will help monitor the Internet for child molesters who seek victims online." USA continues, "Law enforcement representatives from each country met here Wednesday to discuss the program, one of the latest in a series of initiatives aimed at countering the rising number of ways in which pedophiles and pornographers use the Internet to harm children. … Under the program, known as the Virtual Global Taskforce (VGT), agents from each nation will take turns monitoring a London-based website (www.virtualglobaltaskforce.com) that responds to reports from youths and others about suspected predators, says VGT Chairman Jim Gamble, chief executive officer of the United Kingdom's Child Exploitation and Online Protection Center." USA adds, "Investigators can immediately trace a suspect's location through his Internet connection and contact a local police agency to further investigate the case or make an arrest, Gamble says. As authorities have done in anti-child-pornography programs, VGT investigators also will go undercover in chat rooms and on websites where pedophiles are likely to be, he says. … The VGT is one of dozens of ways police and child protection groups try to catch predators and stem the trade in pornographic photos of children. The groups work with Internet service providers and credit card companies to identify websites used to trade such photos. Congress has boosted funding for investigations and prosecutions aimed at child porn."

Judge Rules Alleged Cuban Spy's Statement To FBI Should Be Admitted. The AP (11/16) reports US Magistrate Judge Barry Garber in Miami "refused Wednesday to throw out a lengthy statement given to the FBI by a college professor charged along with his wife with acting as illegal agents of Cuba's communist government." Garber "ruled that…Carlos Alvarez gave the statements voluntarily, was free to leave the FBI interviews any time and was never promised immunity from prosecution. The statements Alvarez gave to the FBI in summer 2005 are the cornerstone of the federal case." The AP notes, "Alvarez's lawyer will have a chance to contest the ruling before U.S. District Judge K. Michael Moore, who is overseeing the case, issues a final decision."

Boston US Attorney's Office Says Reported Bulger Sighting Inconclusive. The Boston Globe (11/16, Murphy, 413K) reports, "The tip sounded like a scene out of a movie: Fugitive gangster James 'Whitey' Bulger was believed to have been spotted at a San Diego theater last month, checking out Jack Nicholson's portrayal of him in the new gangster film, 'The Departed.' … But yesterday, the US attorney's office in Boston, which is overseeing the hunt for Bulger, 77, one of the FBI's 10 Most Wanted, said the sighting remains uncorroborated. 'Bulger Fugitive Task Force investigators have reviewed all relevant material related to the recently reported sighting of James Bulger in San Diego,' Robert Krekorian, executive assistant US attorney, said in a prepared statement. 'At this time, no one has concluded that the individual in question is, in fact, James Bulger.' Krekorian added that, as with every lead in the manhunt, all 'logical and appropriate investigative steps' are being taken."

Federal Agents To Be On Lookout At Funeral For Bulger's Girlfriend's Mother. The Boston Herald (11/16, Sweet, 184K) reports, "The South Boston mother of James 'Whitey' Bulger's girlfriend, Catherine Greig, will be laid to rest today, presumably never to know if her fugitive daughter is dead or alive." Jenit L. Greig "died Monday. … Sources said federal authorities, who have been hunting for Bulger and Greig nearly 12 years, will be watching." The Herald also notes the US attorney's office statement about the sighting report.

Former New Jersey Councilman Pleads Guilty To Taking Bribe. The Newark Star-Ledger (11/16, Martin) reports former West Long Branch Councilman Joseph DeLisa "yesterday admitted taking a $1,500 bribe in an FBI sting, the latest conviction in a long-running investigation of municipal corruption in Monmouth County. …

DOJ_NMG_0094879

Under questioning from Assistant U.S. Attorney Marc Larkins, DeLisa acknowledged taking the bribe in November 2003 from a cooperating FBI witness posing as a demolition contractor. He said he had been introduced to the contractor by then mayor Paul Zambrano. In return for the money, DeLisa promised his support on no-bid township contracts." The Star-Ledger notes, "Zambrano was the first to enter a plea more than a year ago; he admitted taking $15,000, but has not yet been sentenced." The AP (11/16) adds that DeLisa "could receive as much as 20 years in prison when sentenced in March."

FBI Searches Home Of Philadelphia Labor Leader In Ongoing Tax-Fraud Probe. The Philadelphia Inquirer (11/16, Shiffman, Schaffer, 385K) reports, "Federal agents executed a search warrant at the home of labor union leader John J. Dougherty last week as part of their tax-fraud investigation into a local electrical contractor, sources said. The sources, who declined to be identified because the matter remains under investigation, said agents entered the South Philadelphia home of Dougherty, a possible 2007 mayoral candidate, early Friday morning. Philadelphia FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams said she could neither confirm nor deny the raid." The Inquirer notes, "Friday's search represents the most recent turn in the sprawling investigation of the contractor, Donald 'Gus' Dougherty, who is a close friend of but no relation to John Dougherty. … Sources said agents have asked whether electricians' union leaders knew about an alleged scheme by Gus Dougherty to avoid paying federal taxes and union health and pension payments by paying union electricians in cash."

FBI Joins Corruption Probe Of Kentucky School Official. The Lexington Herald-Leader (11/15, Mueller, 113K) reported, "The FBI has joined a Johnson County grand jury investigation into allegations that a former school district finance director allegedly had her son on the system's payroll while he was in jail." Peggy L. VanHoose "allegedly paid her son, Michael D. VanHoose, thousands of dollars between 2000 and 2005, although he spent 92 weeks of that time in the Big Sandy Regional Detention Center, according to jail records and a recent audit conducted for the school district. Assistant Commonwealth's Attorney David Blankenship said yesterday that an FBI agent had contacted Johnson County prosecutors about the case." The Herald-Leader added, "Meanwhile, a Johnson County grand jury is scheduled to meet Thursday to question witnesses, including new schools Superintendent Steve Trimble, a school board member and VanHoose's former payroll officer, Shelby Jean Coleman."

NYPD, FBI Bust Billion-Dollar Sports Betting Ring. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/16, Hays) reports, "More than two dozen people, including a former professional baseball scout and a high-stakes poker player, were charged Wednesday in connection with a billion-dollar-a-year gambling ring that rivaled casino sports books. The massive illegal betting scheme was orchestrated through a site called Playwithal.com, run by the poker player, James Giordano, 52, of Pine Crest, Fla., Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly and Queens District Attorney Richard Brown said. A break in the case came last year when New York Police Department investigators secretly hacked into a laptop computer that Giordano had left in a Long Island hotel while attending a wedding, police said. He was arrested early Wednesday by FBI agents who had to scale the walls of his fortess-like Florida compound." The AP notes, "The scheme involved placing sports bets through bookies, who would assign bettors a secret code to track their wagers and monitor point spreads and results through the restricted Web site. The bets were taken on all kinds of sports, including football, baseball, basketball, hockey, car racing and golf."

The Miami Herald (11/16, 286K) reports, "At first, FBI agents and Miami-Dade County police tried to trick Giordano, 52, into letting them onto his property. They phoned him from a call box next to the entrance gate of his walled Pinecrest estate, saying they needed to get in to catch a burglar. He said no. Armed with arrest and search warrants, they then climbed over Giordano's four-foot wall and knocked on his front door. They arrested him about 6 a.m. Tuesday, and he was placed in police custody. FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela said FBI agents also searched the South Florida homes of some other suspects and the offices of companies involved." The Washington Post (11/16, E2, 690K) notes, "Also arrested was Frank Falzarano, 52, of Seaford, N.Y., who was identified by prosecutors as a scout for the Washington Nationals and a former scout for the San Francisco Giants. He allegedly was a top earner in a network of 2,000 bookies who took more than $3.3 billion in cash wagers since 2004 from tens of thousands of customers nationwide."

Newsday (11/16, Parascandola) notes that FBI agents arrested Giordano and reports Police Commissioner Ray

Kelly said, "This is the largest illegal gambling operation we have ever encountered. It rivals casinos for the amount of betting: $3.3 billion over the last 28 months alone. … The suspects in New York, New Jersey, Florida and Nevada have been charged with various counts of enterprise corruption, money laundering, gambling and conspiracy, according to Queens District Attorney Richard Brown, whose office is prosecuting the case because it started in that borough. Seized were gambling records, about $6 million in cash, real estate and a football signed by the 1969 Super Bowl champion Jets." Also noting the FBI arrest in Florida, the New York Post (11/16, Venezia, Martinez, Livingston, 631K) adds, "Authorities said the ring even had 'wire rooms' in Costa Rica and St. Maarten. It was busted in Queens because authorities there got wind of the operation while investigating a prescription drug resale scheme linked to the Bonanno crime family in 2005." The New York Daily News (11/16, Moore, Shifrel, 729K) also reports the story, under the headline "You Lose! 3B Ring Bashed."

Puerto Rico Secretary Of State Ordered To Turn Over Documents For Fundraising Probe. In a story distributed by McClatchy, the Miami Herald (11/16, Robles, 286K) reports, "Puerto Rico's Secretary of State has until Friday to produce documents relating to dozens of people and firms in the latest chapter of a months-long federal probe of donations to a political campaign in 2000 by the current governor. The office of Secretary of State Fernando Bonilla has confirmed that it received a subpoena for all documents…on more than 60 individuals or companies tied to a handful of Philadelphia fundraisers. The fundraisers helped collect campaign contributions for Anibal Acevedo Vila's 2000 race for resident commissioner." McClatchy notes, "FBI San Juan office spokesman Harry Rodriguez said federal law prohibits him from discussing grand jury probes. 'The FBI has jurisdiction to investigate public federal election law violations involving excessive campaign contributions, corporate contributions and conduit contributions made through third parties,' Rodriguez said. 'It is not unusual for these illegal contribution cases to be connected to schemes to corruptly influence elected officials.'"

California City's Mayor, Administrator Charged With Corruption. The Los Angeles Times (11/16, Becerra) reports, "Capping years of investigations into Vernon, Los Angeles prosecutors today filed public corruption charges that accused the small industrial city's longtime mayor of voter fraud and the former city administrator of using public funds for personal use." The Times continues, "The indictment came after decades of complaints by critics that the city south of downtown Los Angeles operates as a fiefdom by leaders, including Mayor Leonis Malburg, who has been in office for more than 50 years. He is the grandson of Vernon's founder." The Times adds, "Most of Vernon's homes are owned by Malburg, other council members and the city. Most of the 91 residents are city employees. .. Prosecutors charged that Malburg has been fraudulently voting in Vernon elections, even though he has long lived in a posh estate in Hancock Park, 20 miles from the gritty city that is home to various manufacturing businesses and factories. … The district attorney's office charged that longtime city administrator Bruce Malkenhorst Sr. used $60,000 in city money for personal uses. Makenhorst was the highest paid city official in the state before stepping down two years ago, earning more than $600,000 a year for running a city of fewer than 100 people."

New Evidence Found In New York Murder Case. The New York Times (11/16, Dwyer) reports, "More than two years ago, investigators from the Queens district attorney's office sat in Jaime Acevedo's living room and listened to him describe a night in 1992 -- an instant, really -- that has yet to end." The Times continues, "Mr. Acevedo, seen by the authorities as an ordinary, law-abiding, working man with no reason to lie, said that he knew the inside details on a little-noticed murder in Woodside, one that seemed to have been solved and settled long ago." The Times adds, "Investigators had never spoken with Mr. Acevedo or realized that he knew anything about the case. But in fact, Mr. Acevedo told them, he had unwittingly given the killer a ride to and from the murder scene. The man he named had never been connected or charged with the crime. .. .There was more. .. .Mr. Acevedo said the one person accused and convicted of the murder had nothing to do with it. That man, Joshua Rivera, sentenced to 37 years, had not even been present, according to Mr. Acevedo. … The story did not end there. The district attorney's investigators found another man who told essentially the same story as Mr. Acevedo: he, too, said that he had been in the car with the killer and that Mr. Rivera was not involved." The Times notes, "Two years later, Mr. Rivera, 36, is still serving time for the murder, and the man named as the real killer by the two new witnesses has not been charged. .. .In an era when DNA tests seem to have made unraveling convictions as easy as untying a shoe, Mr. Rivera's case is a reminder that the criminal justice system, by law and custom, generally resists the reopening of jury verdicts, at times even in the face of new evidence that seems strong. … It is also a vivid example of the discretion that prosecutors can exercise in not only bringing cases but also reviewing their outcomes."

Simpson Book On Murders Roundly Condemned. The Los Angeles Times (11/16, Abcarian, Miller) reports, "The two abiding emotions that characterized the O.J. Simpson double murder case -- revulsion and fascination -- surfaced again this week when, just in time for November television sweeps, Simpson revealed that he will take part in a two-part Fox television special and release a book that will address how he might have killed his ex-wife, Nicole Brown, and her friend Ron Goldman. … 'If I Did It,' is to be released Nov. 30 by Regan, an imprint of HarperCollins, which is owned by Rupert Murdoch's News Corp. Another division of News Corp, the Fox network, will air a two-part interview with Simpson, conducted by his publisher, Judith Regan, on Monday, Nov. 27 and Wednesday, Nov. 29. In the book and the interviews, according to a statement from HarperCollins, Simpson will give a 'bone-chilling account of the night of the murders,' which took place on June 12, 1994." The Times adds, "As condemnation flowed from victims' families, publishers, broadcasters, bloggers and others involved in the sensational criminal case, Regan defended her decision to publish the book. . 'It's not fiction,' she said Wednesday evening at a dinner for the National Book Awards in New York. As to whether Simpson would agree with that, she replied, 'I don't know.' She sidestepped questions about whether the former football star had approached her, or the other way around, and how he might be paid. But she acknowledged the torrent of criticism already directed at the joint television-book project. … Simpson, who was acquitted of murder, was found responsible for the killings in a subsequent civil trial. The televised trial deeply divided the U.S., often along racial lines, changed the way crime scenes are handled and spawned a new category of TV personality -- the courtroom legal analyst."

Unions Object To Latest Bonus Plan For Dana Officials. The AP (11/16, Hopkins) reports, "Unions representing Dana Corp. employees say its proposal to pay millions to executives while it plans to cut health care and retiree benefits should be struck down. … 'It is precisely this double standard — insulating executives from the consequences of bankruptcy while workers must cope with harsh, draconian consequences — that Congress sought to eliminate' with the a recent bankruptcy reform act, the unions said in court papers." The AP continues, "The joint objection from the United Autoworkers and United Steelworkers unions comes in the midst of Dana's renewed efforts to get bankruptcy court approval for a long-term incentive plan. … Dana, of Toledo, Ohio, makes axles, frames and other large components for cars and commercial trucks and is highly dependent on customers General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co. … The company is one of at least a half-dozen large U.S. auto-parts companies that have fallen into bankruptcy due to production cutbacks by the country's biggest auto makers." The AP notes, "Under the proposal, Dana Chief Executive Michael J. Burns will receive up to $4.5 million during 2007 and up to $2.25 million in 2008. The payments are tied to the achievement of various earnings benchmarks. The payments aren't guaranteed. … Dana's latest proposal is a step down from a previous plan that entitled Burns to $9.1 million over the next few years, including a $6 million bonus once the auto-parts supplier emerged from bankruptcy protection. … The latest proposal is Dana's second attempt to get Judge Burton Lifland to sign off on the bonus plan. He denied the first plan on Sept. 5, saying it clashed with provisions of the 2005 bankruptcy law. Those provisions allow retention bonuses only if the employee has a competing offer for equal or higher pay. … The Justice Department has consistently opposed Dana's efforts, and in court papers Tuesday, U.S. Trustee Diana G. Adams said the company again failed to meet the requirements for bonus payments under the reform act."

Man Alleging LAPD Beating Pleads No Contest To Resisting Arrest. The Los Angeles Times (11/16, Hong, McGreevy, 850K) reports, "The man who was repeatedly punched by a Los Angeles police officer on a video circulated on the Internet struck a plea bargain Wednesday and was released from jail." William Cardenas "pleaded no contest to a misdemeanor charge of resisting, delaying or obstructing an officer." The Times adds, "Asked whether the video had led to the deal, Deputy Dist. Atty Michael Yglecias said: 'I would be lying if I said it didn't.'" However, "LAPD Chief William J. Bratton told Patt Morrison in an interview on KPCC-FM…that he did not think the release of the video, and the widespread exposure that followed, had an effect on Cardenas' getting a reduction in charges." Bratton added, "If anything, the video would show he resisted arrest." In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/16) notes, "The clip caused a sensation, with 155,000 views, and eventually prompted the FBI and the Los Angeles Police Department to investigate. Police said Cardenas had been wanted on charges of receiving stolen property when they confronted him."

Video Shows Third Alleged Excessive Force Case. The Los Angeles Times (11/16, Covarrubias, Silverstein, 850K) reports, "The latest in a recent spate of cellphone videos documenting questionable arrest tactics surfaced Wednesday, this one showing a UCLA police officer using a Taser to stun a student who allegedly refused to leave the campus library. Grainy video of the Tuesday night incident at UCLA's Powell Library was broadcast Wednesday on TV news and the Internet, prompting a review of the officers' actions and outrage among students at the Westwood campus. The footage showed the student, Mostafa Tabatabainejad, falling to the ground and crying out in pain as officers stunned him." The Times notes that some witnesses disputed the police account, "saying that when campus police arrived, Tabatabainejad had begun to walk toward the door with his backpack. When an officer approached him and grabbed his arm, the witnesses said, Tabatabainejad told the officer to let go, yelling 'Get off me' several times."

Los Angeles Police Officers Cleared In Arrest Probe. The AP (11/16) reports, "A district attorney's investigation has cleared police officers of wrongdoing in a videotaped incident in which a transient in handcuffs was apparently pepper-sprayed in a police car, police Chief William Bratton said Tuesday." The AP continues, "The February 2005 incident came to light this week when the videotape, shot by a citizen, was released by the man's attorney. … The tape of Benjamin Barker's arrest surfaced on the heels of an 18-second video showing a Los Angeles officer repeatedly punching a suspect in the face while another officer tried to handcuff the man during a struggle on a Hollywood street on Aug. 11." The AP adds, "At a news conference, Bratton cited a Nov. 15, 2005, decision by the Los Angeles County district attorney's office in which prosecutors declined to file any charges against officers in the arrest of Barker, who had been in a scuffle with a Venice merchant. … 'Examination of the videotape clearly shows (the officers) did not use excessive force on Benjamin Barker, nor did they assault him under color of authority,' Bratton said, quoting the decision. 'The officers showed remarkable restraint and demonstrated professional courtesy to Barker despite his belligerent, threatening and combative behavior.' … The Los Angeles Times reported Tuesday that the tape shows an officer take pepper spray out of a holster, then raise it toward Barker's face, but the actual spraying is obscured by shadows."

Maryland Police, FBI Continue Investigation Into Racist Graffiti Incidents. The Washington Post (11/16, SM3, Morse, 690K) reports, "Local and federal investigators continued this week to probe a string of racist graffiti incidents in Charles County, the latest one occurring at an African American church that had received a bomb threat a week before." Last weekend at the Zion Baptist Church in Welcome, "someone had used bright orange paint to spray 'KKK,' 'White Power' and 'Bang Boom' on a roadway leading to the church's parking lot." The Post notes, "In all, there have been 11 such cases in Charles since August. … In September, local officials contacted the FBI, and the agencies have conducted a joint investigation of the incidents since, said Kristen Timko, a sheriff's office spokeswoman. 'Our detectives meet regularly with them,' she said."

NYTimes Says Election Reform Necessary. The New York Times (11/16, 1.16M) editorializes, "Last week's elections provided a lot of disturbing news about the reliability of electronic voting," and serious questions about some races "only add to the high level of mistrust that many people already feel about electronic voting." With Democrats in control of Congress, "fortunately, that may be about to change," and "there is an excellent chance of passing tough electronic voting legislation." Election reform "has tended to be a partisan issue," but "Congressional Democrats should make fixing this country's broken system of elections a top priority, and Republicans should join them."

DOJ Opens Price-Fixing Probe Of Banks' Municipal Bond Deals. Bloomberg (11/16, Selway, Braun) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice is conducting a criminal investigation into whether banks and brokers conspired to rig the bidding for contracts that U.S. local governments use to invest bond proceeds." Bloomberg continues, "Municipalities purchase guaranteed investment contracts, known as GICs, with bond money until they need the funds to pay for projects. The contracts are what banks and brokers used to invest at least $7 billion of bond proceeds raised by local governments across the U.S. in the past decade that were never spent, according to an Oct. 4 Bloomberg News report. … 'It's about time,' said Mark Schwartz, a Bryn Mawr, Pennsylvania-based lawyer and former head of municipal bonds for Prudential Financial Corp.'s mid-Atlantic region, about the investigation. 'This is an incestuous little business.'" Bloomberg adds, "Dexia SA's Financial Security Assurance Holdings Ltd. unit today said it was subpoenaed by the U.S. Justice Department as part of the probe by antitrust regulators. Investment Management Advisory Group Inc., a GIC broker and municipal derivatives adviser based in Pottstown, Pennsylvania, was searched by Justice Department officials, Gene Grabowski, a spokesman for the firm, said. … The actions by the Justice Department show that an investigation into how banks compete for the right to reinvest the money raised in the $2 trillion tax-exempt bond market has expanded beyond the U.S. Internal Revenue Service. The IRS has been looking into whether brokers awarded the work to favored banks, potentially boosting the cost of the investment agreements and depriving the federal government of tax revenue. … Kathleen Blomquist, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Department of Justice, confirmed an 'investigation of anticompetitive practices in the municipal bond industry.' She declined to provide further detail of the subpoena of Financial Security or whether other subpoenas were issued."

Shareholders Sue Private Equity Firms Alleging Rigged Buyouts. Bloomberg (11/16, Glovin) reports, "Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and Carlyle Group, the manager of the biggest U.S. buyout fund, are among 13 private equity firms accused in a class-action lawsuit of rigging the market to take companies private." Bloomberg continues, "The class action was filed in Manhattan federal court by investors who claim they didn't receive full value for their shares because of a conspiracy that violated antitrust laws. … 'Investors in the target company are deprived of the full economic value of their holdings and `squeezed out' at artificially low valuations,' the suit says." Bloomberg adds, "The U.S. Justice Department launched an informal antitrust investigation into allegations that private-equity firms collaborated on leveraged buyouts, according to a person familiar with the matter. … The suit alleges violations of federal antitrust laws, which entitle successful plaintiffs to recover triple damages. It seeks to represent tens of thousands of shareholders in dozens of deals in which public companies were taken private."

US Airways Makes $8 Billion Bid For Delta. The Washington Post (11/16, D01, Wilber) reports, "US Airways Group Inc. yesterday launched an $8 billion bid for Delta Air Lines Inc., a move that would create the nation's largest carrier and possibly trigger other airline mergers in an industry recovering from a major downturn." The Post continues, "US Airways chief executive Doug Parker said combining carriers would boost profit and substantially cut costs by eliminating overlapping work and flights. Parker, who is credited with helping to successfully merge US Airways and America West in 2005, said he wanted to take advantage of Delta's status in Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection. If he waited until after the carrier exited bankruptcy, it would be harder to jettison unneeded Delta aircraft, he said. … Topping the list of potential obstacles is Delta's management, which isn't excited about any merger. Chief executive Gerald Grinstein sent a memo to employees later in the day, saying he didn't want Delta to emerge from bankruptcy protection as a 'merged, acquired or otherwise consolidated airline.'"

The New York Times (11/16, Sorkin) reports, "The surprise offer may presage a wave of mergers in the struggling airline industry. While consolidation of companies often leads to higher prices, it is unclear at this point whether this merger would do anything like that. … But any deal for Delta would have to overcome high hurdles, including antitrust scrutiny and a lack of support from Delta's management, which rebuffed advances from US Airways this summer." The Times adds, "In an unusual tack, the unsolicited offer is being made to the creditors of Delta, which is operating under bankruptcy protection — a process that will give Delta management control over any plan to get out of bankruptcy for at least several more months. … Delta said yesterday that it would review the offer. Delta is now the fourth-largest domestic airline and US Airways is No. 5. US Airways said the combined carrier would be bigger than the current leader, American Airlines, and would be called Delta Air Lines. It noted that Delta is a 'very, very powerful' brand worldwide."

The Financial Times (11/16, Cameron) reports, "Doug Parker, US Airways chairman and chief executive, launched his second effort in 18 months to buy a bankrupt carrier and push an enlarged US Airways into the global airline elite. … However, Delta quickly repeated its opposition to the move after rebuffing an approach this year, forcing US Airways to appeal directly to its unsecured creditors." The Times adds, "Mr Parker maintained that the rise of low-cost carriers in the US meant there would be no antitrust issues with the proposed takeover. He intends to close the deal by mid-2007 when Delta aims to emerge from the bankruptcy protection it sought in September last year. The US justice department blocked an attempt by United to acquire the old US Airways in 2000 on competition grounds, scuppering another proposed combination between American and Northwest."

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (11/16, Fitzpatrick, Belko) reports, "A longtime cheerleader for industry consolidation, Mr. Parker wants the Delta deal done before the nation's No. 3 carrier emerges from bankruptcy next year, making it easier for the combined company to cut costs, give back planes to lenders, renegotiate contracts and shed unprofitable leases -- just as the twice-bankrupt US Airways did last year while merging with America West Airlines. … After that, 'it will be too late,' he said yesterday. 'We will all regret not acting sooner.'"

The Los Angeles Times (11/16, Pae) reports, "If approved — and there are several hurdles to overcome, including federal regulatory approvals — the merger could set off a wave of consolidation in the domestic airline industry, analysts said. … The takeover bid is a fallout of overcapacity in the airline industry that has financially hurt the larger airlines, analysts said. According to the Airline Transport Assn., U.S. commercial airlines have lost $35 billion since 2001, though the industry is recovering and may turn a profit this year. … For its part, Delta said in a statement that it intends to emerge from Bankruptcy Court protection as a stand-alone carrier."

Bloomberg (11/16, Schlangenstein) reports, "A combined US Airways-Delta would retain Delta's name and vault past AMR Corp.'s American Airlines to become the world's largest carrier, as measured by miles flown by paying passengers. By that standard, Delta is the third-largest U.S. airline and US Airways is the seventh-biggest." Bloomberg adds, "The combined airline would be the largest in terms of passengers carried in the northeastern and southeastern U.S. and Florida, and second-biggest in the Southwest, US Airways said. … A merged US Airways-Delta also would have more than 18 percent of the U.S. industry's capacity, US Airways said. Any merger agreement must be approved by the U.S. Justice Department, US Airways shareholders and the court overseeing Delta's bankruptcy."

USA Today (11/16, Adams) reports, "The takeover bid would require the approval of Delta's bankruptcy judge, US Airways' shareholders, Delta's creditors and the U.S. government. And it might not be the only offer for Delta, a potentially attractive target as the USA's third-biggest carrier. … A merger between two such big carriers needs Justice Department approval. The agency would have to determine whether the deal would help or hurt consumers in terms of fares and flight options. Antitrust considerations are particularly strong along the East Coast, where the route networks of both Delta and US Airways are heavily concentrated."

Experts Differ On Antitrust Challenges. The Washington Times (11/16, Lengell) reports, "Under the proposal, the combined airline would serve as many cities as US Airways currently does but with 10 percent fewer flights because some duplicate routes would be eliminated. … The merged company also would sell one of its shuttle operations that operate in the Northeast, mostly between Washington, New York and Boston, to eliminate the overlapping routes and to alleviate antitrust concerns. … But Delta's management has said it is committed to leaving Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection in the first half of 2007 as a stand-alone carrier. … 'We received a letter from US Airways [yesterday] morning and will of course review it,' said Delta's chief executive, Gerald Grinstein. But 'our plan is working, and we are proud of the progress Delta people are making to achieve this objective.'" The Times notes, "Justice officials declined to comment on the proposal. … But some industry watchers doubt the Justice Department would approve the proposal. … Ray Neidl, an equity analyst for the airline industry, agreed that the merger proposal wouldn't be an easy sell to the Justice Department, saying the offer has a 30 percent to 40 percent chance of rejection."

The Wall Street Journal (11/16, Perez) reports, "While antitrust concerns would be among several hurdles to the combination, Mr. Parker said he didn't think there were any issues that couldn't be resolved. He suggested that either of US Airways' and Delta's competing Northeastern U.S. 'shuttles,' which connect Boston, New York and Washington, DC, could be put up for sale in order to satisfy antitrust problems. The merger last year of US Airways and America West, Mr. Parker said, shows that mergers 'can be good for investors and consumers.' … US Airways said frequent-flyer customers at the two carriers would have their current mileage balances combined as part of a Delta takeover. But the airlines participate in different global marketing alliances, so US Airways would have to narrow that to a single partnership."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (11/16, Geewax) reports, "If US Airways Group can persuade investors and creditors to accept its unsolicited $8 billion bid for Delta Air Lines Inc., federal regulators likely will approve the deal as well, analysts said Wednesday. … 'I don't believe there will be any antitrust problems,' said John Pincavage, a longtime airline adviser with Pincavage & Associates." The AJC continues, "US Airways spokeswoman Valerie Wunder said the airline will work with regulatory agencies to free up whatever routes, airport slots and gates might be necessary to eliminate monopoly concerns. 'We are confident any antitrust issue can be resolved,' she said. … Pincavage noted that US Airways has specifically said that the combined company would sell off one of its two lucrative shuttle services linking Boston, New York and Washington to avoid gaining a monopoly in that market." The AJC notes, "To avoid antitrust problems, the Justice Department likely would want the combined carrier to scale back operations at those hubs to make room for competitors. It also might insist on reductions in operations at Delta's hub in Salt Lake City, which is relatively close to US Airways' hubs in Phoenix and Las Vegas. … But Justice Department spokeswoman Gina Talamona said it is too soon say exactly which concessions would be required to win approval. … If the proposed takeover were to move forward, 'we would be interested in taking a look at it,' she said. Divestiture decisions then 'would have to be made on a case-by-case basis,' she said."

The Financial Times (11/16, Kirchgaessner) reports, "US Airways' hostile bid for Delta will face a tough antitrust review by the Department of Justice, according to Washington experts who say authorities are likely to take into account the companies' concentration of routes along the east coast." The Times continues, "US Air is likely to approach an antitrust probe with an arsenal of arguments to support the proposed deal. … These include the changing dynamics of the troubled airline industry, the fact that it is willing to divest one of the companies' north-east shuttles and that the emergence of cheaper airlines has given passengers more options." The Times notes, "The airline may also highlight proposed synergies of $1.65bn a year - an argument that has resonated in the past with Thomas Barnett, the head of the antitrust division. … But one Washington source with knowledge about such investigations said the division has historically not always been swayed by divestiture offers from airlines, because they may not create enough competition in the marketplace. … Although the justice department would not make an antitrust ruling based on Delta's willingness to be taken over, an unwilling merger partner could offer ammunition to build a case against the deal."

The AP (11/16, Weber) reports, "Rep. James Oberstar, D-Minn., who is set to become chairman of the House Transportation Committee, said he is concerned the combination would reduce competition and increase costs for travelers. … 'If the Justice Department on its own does not initiate an antitrust review, I would ask them to do that,' he said."

Deal Could Alter Airline Industry. The Wall Street Journal (11/16, D1, Everson, Mckay) reports, "US Airways Group Inc., which yesterday bid $8.67 billion to acquire Delta Air Lines, believes consolidation would help the troubled airline industry. But in the wake of US Airways' own purchase by America West, it's less clear how much consumers stand to benefit." The Journal continues, "Delta has rejected the offer by US Airways. But if the hostile bid should prove successful, analysts say there could be some advantages for consumers, but also some risks. Users of US Airways frequent-flier miles, for instance, could benefit from having access to Delta's extensive international route system. On the other hand, overlaps in service, especially in some Southern cities where both airlines have major operations, could reduce competition and lead to increased fares. What's more, persistent glitches in the process of integrating US Airways and America West raise concerns about customer service should the Delta bid succeed." The Journal adds, "So far, US Airways has disclosed little about how a takeover of Delta would affect each airline's operations. One exception: One of the two companies' overlapping East Coast shuttle services, which connect Boston, New York and Washington, would probably have to be sold to satisfy antitrust concerns, US Airways says. … Beyond the shuttles, there is significant overlap in the South, with Delta's main hub situated in Atlanta and US Airways having significant operations in Charlotte. The concentration means that 'it would destroy competition in the deep South,' says Michael Boyd, president of Boyd Group Inc., an aviation-industry advisory group in Evergreen, Colo."

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram (11/16, Banstetter) reports, "Imagine booking a flight on Americanorthwest Airlines, an aviation behemoth with six domestic hubs and unmatched service to Asia, Latin America and Europe. .. Or flying on United-Continental Airways (or perhaps Continental United Airlines, or even UniCont Air), a powerhouse in the West and on the East Coast. And for a low-fare trip, you could check prices on FronTranBlue. … The airline industry is buzzing over those potential airline combinations and more, after US Airways sparked the latest round of merger speculation Wednesday with a hostile bid to take over the bankrupt Delta Air Lines for $8 billion in cash and stock." The Star-Telegram adds, "The chatter sent airline stocks soaring, despite warnings from some experts that industry consolidation is likely to move slowly and that any US Airways-Delta deal faces significant challenges. Delta executives said they weren't interested, and even if creditors sign on, a merger would receive intense scrutiny from regulators and the Justice Department. … And some analysts pointed to the industry's record of failed airline mergers. … 'It's a terrible idea,' said consultant Mike Boyd of the Boyd Group of Evergreen, Colo. 'It's a bad deal for the customers, the employees, for everybody, really, except the financial types.'"

More Commentary. The Los Angeles Times (11/16) editorializes, "The nation's airline industry has been in a gradual recovery lately. But US Airways Group Inc.'s announced bid to acquire Delta Air Lines Inc. promises to set off a needed consolidation of the business that will make it better able to weather the next financial downturn. Let's hope federal regulators don't block such a transformation this time around. … That's precisely what happened in 2001 when the Department of Justice ill-advisedly blocked the merger of US Airways and UAL Corp.'s United Airlines on antitrust grounds. The airline industry then had to confront an economic slowdown and the post-9/11 trauma with excess capacity, losing billions of dollars. Since 2002, four major U.S. airlines have sought bankruptcy protection; two (Delta and Northwest Airlines Corp.) are currently in Chapter 11." The Times adds, "The federal government should carefully review the deal if it goes forward, as well as any other such mergers. (Continental Airlines Inc. and Northwest have been eyeing each other for years, and United Chief Executive Glenn Tilton has been a vocal advocate of more aggressive consolidation in the industry.) Some routes will need to be dropped, some gates surrendered to competitors. … But regulators need to recognize that the industry is changing. The country needs fewer first-tier coast-to-coast airlines with a broader reach at home and abroad. … If Congress really wants to help consumers and shore up the financial health of airlines, it should allow the entry of foreign carriers and investors, which it has repeatedly declined to do. This is a global industry, after all."

DOJ Subpoenas Micron Technology In SRAM Price-Fixing Probe. The Idaho Statesman (11/16, Dey) reports, "Federal prosecutors have subpoenaed Micron Technology in an investigation into possible price-fixing of static random access memory, or SRAM, by semiconductor companies. This week, Micron was also named with more than 20 other semiconductor companies in a price-fixing lawsuit filed in Boise." The Statesman continues, "The lawsuit, filed Tuesday on behalf of Idaho residents Mark Alon Davis and Kenneth W. Herbert, alleges that between Jan. 1, 1998 and Dec. 31, 2005 the companies agreed to combat declines in prices for SRAM — a type of memory used in computers and electronic products — by manipulating the wholesale price. The lawsuit alleges the manipulation ultimately led to higher prices of consumer electronic products that used SRAM." The Statesman adds, "Micron confirmed in documents filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission that it received a subpoena Oct. 11 related to the investigation. … 'Micron believes that it is not a target of the investigation and will fully cooperate with the Department of Justice,' Micron said today in a statement to the Idaho Statesman. 'Micron will vigorously defend against any civil class action cases that are filed.' … The Justice Department hasn't said what period its SRAM investigation covers, but a similar department investigation of alleged dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, price fixing covered 1999 to 2002. Micron has cooperated with the Justice Department in that investigation."

Inouye Says Senate Commerce Committee To Review AT&T-BellSouth Merger. The San Antonio Express-News (11/16, Nowlin) reports, "The next chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee said San Antonio-based AT&T Inc.'s purchase of BellSouth Corp. needs more scrutiny and should be the focus of a hearing when Democrats assume control of Congress in January." The Express-News continues, "Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, the incoming chairman, told reporters late Tuesday that his committee should take a look at the telecommunications megamerger. He said he would like the Federal Communications Commission to delay approval until after the hearing. … 'We'd like to know what the impact would be,' Inouye said. 'I think the people of the United States would like to know.'" The Express-News adds, "The hearing will take place, a spokesperson for Inouye later said, whether or not the FCC approves the merger by the end of the year. … Investors appear to be bracing for what the congressional power shift means for AT&T. .. .Company shares dropped 1.52 percent to $32.46 on Wednesday on concern the new Congress will bring a less-friendly regulatory environment for the telecom giant. … The shift comes on top of investor worries that the FCC has three times delayed a vote on the deal. … Although the Justice Department and 18 state bodies have cleared the AT&T-BellSouth deal, it's still awaiting a nod from the FCC, the last regulatory agency needed to approve it. The commission's two Republican and two Democratic commissioners are divided over what conditions to apply to the deal."

EU Says Microsoft Has Not Supplied Data In Antitrust Probe. The AP (11/16, White) reports, "Microsoft Corp. still has not supplied the 'complete and accurate' documentation necessary to comply with a 2004 antitrust order, European Union regulators said Wednesday. They warned that new fines could be imposed unless Microsoft supplies full information by Nov. 23." The AP continues, "The European Commission, which fined Microsoft $357 million in July for not providing the technical information, said it expects 'the remaining omissions and deficiencies' to be remedied quickly. … 'Our patience is finite,' EU spokesman Jonathan Todd said. 'Until we have the whole set of documents, it's worth nothing.'" The AP adds, "Microsoft said it already had made "very significant progress" in improving the information it has given regulators, which aims to help rivals make server software that works smoothly with its desktop operating system Windows. … 'We stand ready to do any additional work that is required to comply with the commission's decision,' Microsoft said. … But the EU's executive arm said that what Microsoft has done so far is not enough and that there are still problems with the technical manual that will eventually be turned over to rivals to check before Microsoft can get the all-clear."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Group Sues Administration Over Global Warming Report. The AP (11/16, Chea) reports, "Environmentalists sued the Bush administration for failing to produce a report on global warming's impact on the United States' environment, economy and public health." The AP continues, "Tuesday's lawsuit seeks to compel the U.S. Climate Change Science Program to issue the national assessment, which should contain the most recent scientific data on global warming and projections for its future impacts. The plaintiffs claim the government must complete such a report every four years under the Global Change Research Act of 1990. … 'Global warming is one of the most serious threats facing humanity today,' according to the complaint. Without the report, decision makers and the public 'are without one of the most important tools to grapple with this complex, potentially overwhelming and yet all important issue.'" The AP notes, "The White House Office of Science and Technology Policy, which was named in the lawsuit, had not received the complaint Tuesday and could not comment on it, said spokesman Ben Fallon. … But Fallon defended the administration's record on combating global warming, pointing to increased funding for alternative energy research and partnerships with other countries."

9th Circuit Panel Asked To Rescind EPA Field-Burning Policy. The AP (11/16, Johnson) reports, "The dense plumes of smoke that arise when grass-seed farmers in Idaho burn their fields cause asthma in children, reduce visibility on highways and actually kill people, but the Environmental Protection Agency did not study those effects before changing a federal rule to allow such fires, a lawyer for a clean-air group told judges Wednesday. … 'The smoke from this burning is so thick it sends people to the hospital,' attorney David Baron told the three-judge panel from the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, where such cases are heard." The AP continues, "Baron represents Safe Air For Everyone, a Washington and Idaho clean-air group, as well as the American Lung Association, which sued late last year to undo the EPA's rule change on the grounds that the agency made the decision without first studying what the effects would be." The AP adds, "Kentucky bluegrass seed grown in northern Idaho is shipped across the nation to be used in landscaping and golf courses. Farmers contend they must burn the stubble left on fields to improve the production of the next year's crop and control pests. The smoke often drifts into neighboring states and Canada. … Hundreds of doctors have signed petitions seeking an end to the burning, saying their patients suffer ill effects from the dense smoke; in 2000, a coroner determined that a Rathdrum, Idaho, woman died from inhaling it. Clean-air groups argue that a 1998 decision to ban grass-field burning in Washington state has not harmed the seed industry. … The field burning has gone on for years in Idaho, where it is allowed under state law but historically not under the federal plan for Idaho established under the Clean Air Act. Last year, after health groups threatened to sue farmers for burning fields, the EPA changed the plan for Idaho, saying it had intended to allow grass-field burning all along."

USDA Reports Says 12% In US Have "Very Low Food Security." The Washington Post (11/16, A01, Williamson, 690K) reports that in an annual report, the USDA said "that 12 percent of Americans -- 35 million people -- could not put food on the table at least part of last year." Eleven million of them "reported going hungry at times," and "beginning this year, the USDA has determined 'very low food security' to be a more scientifically palatable description for that group." The report suggests that the USDA "scrap the word hunger, which 'should refer to a potential consequence of food insecurity that, because of prolonged, involuntary lack of food, results in discomfort, illness, weakness, or pain that goes beyond the usual uneasy sensation.'"

Senate Approves New Mexico Tribal Land Settlement. The AP (11/16) reports from Albuquerque, "The Senate has passed a $40 million settlement negotiated by Isleta Pueblo and the federal government over past mismanagement of tribal land. … The measure, unanimously approved by the Senate on Monday, now heads to President Bush for his consideration." The AP continues, "The pueblo sued the government, seeking compensation for damages to its land south of Albuquerque. The pueblo, the Interior Department and the U.S. Justice Department spent years reviewing the claims and reached agreement in June on how to resolve the matter." The AP adds, "The legislation establishes a natural resources fund of more than $32 million for the pueblo to use to restore agricultural, range and forestry property. The measure also authorizes $7.2 million, but that money is subject to administration budgeting and the federal appropriations process. … Members of New Mexico's congressional delegation said the legislation, once signed by the president, will allow Isleta Pueblo to improve drainage on its agricultural lands and rehabilitate lands damaged by trespass grazing and excessive logging."

FBI Arrests Alleged Philadelphia Mob Soldiers On Drug Trafficking Charges. The Philadelphia Daily News (11/16, Caparella, 106K) reports that "after a four-year rebuilding phase in Philadelphia and South Jersey, organized crime is making a comeback in federal court. Today, reputed mob soldier Damion Canalichio, 37, once a top aide to jailed mob underboss Steve Mazzone, will seek bail on federal drug-trafficking charges, according to his attorney Joseph Santaguida." Canalichio "and his sidekick, Christopher Cerr, 36, of Glenolden, were arrested yesterday without incident by FBI agents in South Jersey and in Delaware County." The Daily News notes, 'During a one-month investigation by FBI agent John Augustine, the two allegedly sold" more than 300 grams of cocaine "in South Philadelphia, according to the indictment."

Detroit Man Accused Of Causing 2 Heroin-Laced Fentanyl Deaths. The AP (11/16) reports federal prosecutors "charged a Detroit man with causing the deaths of two people by giving them heroin laced with the painkiller fentanyl, a combination blamed in the deaths of more than 100 drug users in southeast Michigan over the past year. James E. Coleman, 36, was arraigned Wednesday in U.S. District Court on two counts of delivery of a controlled substance resulting in death."

The Detroit News (11/15) reports, "They are the first such state or federal charges in connection with the street sale of fentanyl-laced heroin in the Detroit area in 2005-06, which killed an estimated 133 drug users between September and July."

Track Coach To Be Arraigned In BALCO Case. USA Today (11/16) reports, Trevor Graham, who "triggered the BALCO steroid scandal, is expected to appear in federal court Thursday in San Francisco for his arraignment on a three-count indictment. Graham, a high-profile coach whose track athletes have accumulated medals as well as drug positives, is accused of lying to federal investigators three times in BALCO inquiries."

Michigan Bikers To Serve Prison Time For Making Meth. The AP (11/15) reports several people "affiliated with a biker gang will face prison time for a methamphetamine-making operation in Macomb and St. Clair counties, the U.S. Attorney's Office said. Prosecutors describe it as the first major meth case in U.S. District Court in Detroit. Seven individuals from the Devils' Disciples motorcycle gang will serve sentences ranging from 30 to 97 months."

The Detroit Free Press (11/15) reports a similar story.

Port Huron, Michigan's Times-Herald (11/15) reports, "In March 2005, law enforcement agencies raided several locations, including the bikers' clubhouse in Mount Clemens. Authorities also discovered working meth labs in Harrison and Macomb townships. Evidence from other searches in New Haven, the Algonac area and Chesterfield Township revealed labs frequently had been relocated."

City Councils In California Seek To Ban Marijuana Dispensaries. The Tri Valley Herald (11/15, Foley) reports Livermore city "are moving forward with plans to permanently ban medical marijuana dispensaries. An existing moratorium is scheduled to expire Sept. 11, 2007, after the council voted to extend it two months ago. City officials say that the City Council didn't want to wait until the last minute to make a permanent decision. … On Monday, a handful of opponents urged the council to show restraint, reminding them that with Congress shifting to Democratic control that federal marijuana laws might change."

Torrance, California's Daily Breeze (11/15) reports, "Weeks after ordering two medical marijuana dispensaries to close, the Gardena City Council imposed a moratorium on such facilities Tuesday night. … The council passed the 45-day moratorium with little fanfare on Tuesday night. The temporary ban will give the city's planning staffers time to draft permanent regulations."

Report: Mexican Cartels Step-Up Meth Operations Following US Crackdown On Labs. On its Web site, ABC News (11/15) reports Mexican drug-trafficking cartels "have moved in to fill the void left by the successful crackdown on small methamphetamine labs across the United States, and the foreign traffickers have brought the highly addictive drug into parts of the country where it was rarely seen before, according to a new report by the National Drug Intelligence Center. … DEA officials believe that five main Mexican drug cartels have increased operations in the United States. Mexican drug-trafficking organizations have 'gained considerable strength and greatly expanded their presence in drug markets throughout the country, even in many smaller communities in Midwestern and Eastern states,' said the report." Since 2004, there "have been fewer U.S.-based labs, judging from the DEA's seizure data. 'We've had a significant reduction in domestic labs, with Mexican [drug trafficking organizations] filling the void,' one DEA official, who requested anonymity, told ABC News." The DEA "has engaged in a series of training programs with Mexican law enforcement agencies to try to dismantle their networks."

Heroin Use Increasing Among Painkiller Abusers. In its report, ABC News also says the threat assessment "notes that the Mexican groups have the 'ability to advance Mexican heroin beyond traditional Western state heroin markets.' … The assessment also found that heroin use has increased among some drug addicts who abuse prescription painkillers."

The Washington Times/UPI (11/16) reports larger amounts of drugs "are coming into the United States from Mexico, Colombia and Asia," according to the National Drug Intelligence Center. The center "said organizations producing ice methamphetamine in Mexico have expanded their presence throughout the United States. … Rates of prescription drug abuse top those of other drugs, except marijuana, but the center said law enforcement agencies have had recent success in reducing illegal use of prescription drugs. However, that has caused some addicts to substitute drugs such as heroin for prescription narcotics."

Canada-Based Traffickers Expand Reach. The Canadian Press (11/16) reports, "Asian drug traffickers based in Canada have gained control over most of the Ecstasy distribution in the United States and expanded their reach, said an American drug report released Wednesday. Department also said the production of high-potency marijuana in Canada is a problem, although marijuana use has declined slightly."

Canada's Globe and Mail (11/16) writes, "Canadian-based Asian crime syndicates have become the No. 1 distributors of ecstasy in the United States, according to a new report released yesterday. The business of Vietnamese and other Asian gangs, who started out by growing the popular form of marijuana known as B.C. Bud, has boomed, according to the U.S. Department of Justice. … It adds that in the United States 'an estimated $5.2-billion (U.S.) to $21.2-billion is generated through the wholesale distribution of marijuana and MDMA [Ecstasy] by Canada-based [drug-trafficking organizations], and much of the illegal drug proceeds are transported in bulk' back to Canada."

Surrender Program Allows "Favorable Consideration" To Fugitives. USA Today (11/16, Wagner, Collom) reports, "Sean White, wanted on criminal warrants for a probation violation and failure to appear in court, went to church Wednesday morning to get right with the law. … The 32-year-old man was among the 120 suspects who turned themselves in during the first four hours of Fugitive Safe Surrender." USA continues, "The program, which ends Saturday, basically is an invitation from federal and state authorities who are telling fugitives they might receive 'favorable consideration' by turning themselves in at a makeshift justice center at Pilgrim Rest Baptist Church. … Doug Weiner, a former Cuyahoga County, Ohio, prosecutor and co-founder of Fugitive Safe Surrender, said the long-term goal is to conduct programs nationwide. Plans already are underway for ones in Indianapolis; Rochester, N.Y.; Akron, Ohio; and Richmond, Va." USA adds, "David Gonzales, U.S. Marshal for Arizona, said the program gives suspects a chance to deal with criminal warrants at a neutral site, which cuts costs for the public and reduces the chance of a dangerous situation for law officers. … Defendants who show up at the Phoenix church find public defenders to represent them and judges to conduct hearings. Often, when fugitives are caught in traffic stops or tracked down by agents, they face the humiliation of being handcuffed in front of family and the hassle of going straight to jail. … Under Safe Surrender, Gonzales said, most of those wanted for non-violent offenses will be processed within hours and released without going behind bars. The fugitives who turned themselves in Wednesday morning were suspects in cases involving drunken driving, disorderly conduct and failure to pay fines."

IMMIGRATION:

ICE Arrests 29 Muslim Immigrants For Religious Worker Visa Fraud. USA Today (11/16, 3A, Leinwand, 2.27M) reports, "Federal agents on Wednesday arrested 29 people, mostly Pakistanis, who allegedly posed as Muslim religious workers to obtain special visas to enter the USA. The immigrants, arrested in Boston; New York City; Buffalo; Hartford, Conn.; Atlanta; St. Paul; Newark, N.J.; Philadelphia; Washington, D.C., and Harrisburg, Va., face civil immigration charges and could be deported if they are found to have violated federal law, said Marc Raimondi, spokesman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement." ICE spokesman Dean Boyd said that "the immigrants paid fees, sometimes several thousand dollars, for the fraudulent paperwork." USA notes, "The immigrants arrested Wednesday worked at non-religious jobs, Raimondi said. Among them: gas station attendant, truck driver and factory worker."

DHS IG Says Virtual Border Fence Could Cost Up To $30 Billion. The Washington Post (11/16, A10, Hsu, Witte, 690K) reports DHS Inspector General Richard L. Skinner said yesterday that the agency's Secure Border Initiative program, which would create "virtual fence" along US borders, "is likely to cost far more than the $2 billion that industry analysts initially estimated, possibly up to $30 billion," providing a new source of skepticism in "the national debate to curb illegal immigration, which has focused in large part on gaining control of the borders. … Immigration-policy experts said the red flags raised over the border-security initiative could increase pressure on Congress to act on other measures they say are needed, such as stepping up enforcement against US employers who hire illegal workers, cracking down on immigrants who overstay their visas, and overhauling legal immigration channels." Meanwhile, "Gregory Giddens, director of the DHS Secure Border Initiative program, and Deborah J. Spero, deputy commissioner of Customs and Border Protection, said cost estimates are premature because the administration has not settled on a strategy or decided what it will buy."

Tancredo Says Democrats Will Not Build Physical Fence. Rep. Tom Tancredo, appearing on MSNBC's

DOJ_NMG_0094891

Situation Room (11/15, Carlson) said a border fence is "an easy thing for people to understand. They know what the fence is all about. And when the Democrats stop this, we're going to be out on the stump about it -- certainly I will. And people understand this. It's clear. They're not going to build the fence. They come up with the stuff about: 'Oh, don't worry, we're going to have sensors and monitors.' Hogwash. You can have sensors and monitors across 2,000 miles, that's not going to stop anybody from coming. We can't get to them quick enough. You need a fence."

Congress To Restart Immigration Reform Debater. The CBS Evening News (11/15, story 8, 2:55, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Congress will once again debate whether to start a guest worker program which would allow more immigrants to work here temporarily. President Bush and House Speaker in waiting Nancy Pelosi both say it's urgently needed," but as Bill Whitaker reports, "finding the votes won't be easy." CBS (Whitaker) added, "We have Democrats who will not vote for anything that has a new temporary worker program in it. We have Republicans who will not vote for anything that has a broad-ranging legalization program in it. But now, with the President and presumed House leader Nancy Pelosi both wanting a guest worker program and both parties eager to win alienated Latino voters, the time might be right for immigration reform."

Manuel A. Miranda writes in a column for The Hill (11/16), "We all need to take a deep breath and start working for a reform short on slogans and Band-Aid solutions and long on far-sighted policy." He says that achieving "a cohesive reform requires abandoning Band-Aid solutions." Exit polls" show that 57 percent of voters want to offer a legal status to illegal immigrants, while 38 percent want to deport them." The White House "needs to give up the guest-worker program as the only solution, and congressional leaders on each side must distance themselves from the simplistic desires of their supporters." He adds, that no one could "reasonably disagree with placing security and employment enforcement first," and "political reality suggests that there will be no solution that disguises an amnesty or fails to legalize millions, but there will be no cohesive reform if millions today translate into tens of millions tomorrow."

More Commentary. Mark Krikorian, executive director of the Center for Immigration Studies, writes in USA Today (11/16, 19A, 2.27M), "President Bush and his Democratic allies on immigration are pointing to the results of last week's elections as a mandate for what they call "comprehensive" reform — but what most people would rightly call amnesty for illegal aliens." He suggests "there is a third way, and that is the approach embodied in the bill passed nearly a year ago by the House," called "attrition through enforcement." This policy "would strictly enforce immigration laws (something we have never tried) so as to limit new illegal settlement and cause illegal immigrants already here to go home over time." The result would be "an annual decrease in the illegal population," and research by Center for Immigration Studies show that this approach "could cut the illegal population by half in five years, requiring only a modest increase in resources and using only normal law-enforcement tools."

TAX:

WPost Says Democrats Should Back Tax Reform. The Washington Post (11/16, A26, 690K) editorializes, "The midterm elections were in part a repudiation of Republican economic priorities. The economy has grown strongly for five years even though it is slowing now, but the fruits of prosperity have not been shared widely. … Raising the federal minimum wage makes sense because it is so low that lifting it probably won't hurt job creation. Beyond that, Democrats need to come up with policies that address inequality while not damaging growth, starting perhaps with tax reform. The existing system of tax breaks for savings, homeownership and health care favors the wealthy while draining billions from the government. Restructuring these tax breaks could shrink the deficit while freeing money for Democratic spending plans. Moreover, the Bush administration is on record as supporting tax reform. Here is an opportunity to make bipartisan progress: in a word, to govern."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Resubmit Six Judicial Nominees. The New York Times (11/16, Lewis) reports, "White House officials said Wednesday that President Bush would renominate six of his earlier choices to sit on the federal appeals court, leaving Democratic senators and other analysts to ponder what message he is sending." The Times continues, "At least four of the nominations have been declared dead on arrival in the Senate by Democrats who have consistently opposed them as unacceptable. All six nominations will remain before the Senate through the lame-duck session of Congress and then will expire. … When the 110th Congress is seated in January, Mr. Bush can deliver another list of judicial nominees to the Senate, which will by then have a Democratic majority." The Times adds, "Mr. Bush's motive in sending up the nominations has been closely analyzed, with several Democrats and liberals labeling it as provocative and a sign that he does not intend to seek compromise as he suggested he would after Republican losses in the elections last week. … The four nominees whose chances of confirmation are viewed as nearly impossible are: William J. Haynes II, the Pentagon's general counsel who was involved in setting many of the interrogation policies for detainees; William G. Myers III, a longtime lobbyist for the mining and ranching industries and a critic of environmental regulations; Terrence W. Boyle, a district court judge in North Carolina; and Michael B. Wallace of Mississippi, a lawyer rated unqualified for the court by the American Bar Association. … The other nominees, who have not aroused as much opposition, are N. Randy Smith, a district judge in Idaho, and Peter D. Keisler, assistant attorney general for the civil division of the Justice Department."

The AP (11/16, Barrett) reports, "Under Senate rules the nominations must be resubmitted after Congress takes an extended break, as was the case this year for the 2006 election. … 'Democrats have asked the president to be bipartisan, but this is a clear slap in the face at our request,' said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., a member of the Judiciary Committee. 'For the sake of the country, we hope that this is an aberration because the president feels he must placate his hard-right base, rather than an indication of things to come.'"

Bloomberg (11/16, Rowley) reports, "The Judiciary Committee's current chairman, Pennsylvania Republican Arlen Specter, said yesterday, 'It is obvious that they cannot move' through the Senate before the Democrats take control."

The Washington Post (11/16, A3, Baker, 690K) says all six nominees were "previously blocked" by Democrats, and adds the move is "triggering the first real battle with ascendant Democrats since the midterm elections and signaling what could be the start of a fierce two-year struggle over the shape of the federal judiciary." Bush's decision "heartened conservatives who worried that Bush would scale back his ambition to move courts to the right and outraged liberals, who called it a violation of the spirit of bipartisanship promised since Democrats captured Congress. Both sides saw it as a possible harbinger for the remainder of Bush's presidency, particularly if a Supreme Court vacancy opens."

The Washington Times (11/16, Dinan, Hurt, 88K) reports Republicans said the nominations were "a signal…Bush will fight over judges even under Democratic control." The Times notes that "in addition to the six resubmissions -- needed because the nominees had been automatically returned to the White House during the October recess -- Mr. Bush also sent over four new nominees." The new nominees "are James Edward Rogan to the U.S. District Court for the Central District of California, Benjamin Hale Settle to the District Court for the Western District of Washington and Margaret A. Ryan and Scott Wallace Stucky to the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces." A "Republican aide, who…asked not to be identified," said, "There is zero, zip, zilch chance of any of these judges making it through the Senate killing fields in the waning days. … Without a plan for successful confirmation from the White House, the only point is to fly the flag as the judicial-confirmation ship slips beneath the waves. Burble, gurgle."

Congress Passes Stopgap Spending Bill. The AP (11/16, Taylor) reports, "Congress passed a bill Wednesday that keeps open those agencies awaiting approval of their budgets as lawmakers seek a deal on lots of unfinished fiscal business. The temporary spending measure sped through the House and Senate on voice votes. Without passage, 13 Cabinet agencies would have had to close down Friday at midnight. When President Bush signs the bill, the government will remain open through Dec. 8." The AP adds "there are divisions among Republican over whether to even try to advance the spending bills. Without GOP unity, it will be virtually impossible to do so. That raises the prospect that Democrats will have to tackle the difficult task after taking control of Congress in January."

Democrats Who Opposed Gates In 1991 Said To Face Dilemma. The Hill (11/16, Schor) reports Senate Democrats "could find themselves walking a fine line as the chamber takes up" the nomination of Robert Gates to lead the Pentagon, "weighing the value of regime change at the Pentagon after six stormy years of Secretary Donald Rumsfeld against their new position of power as an incoming majority." The "dozen sitting Democrats who voted against Gates when he took over as CIA director in 1991 face a particular challenge." The first of the 12 "to reveal that he would reverse an old vote against Gates" was Sen. Joseph Biden, who said this week that "a desire to change course in Iraq would overcome his former skepticism." Biden said, "To put it very, very bluntly, as long as he's not there, Rumsfeld is there."

Seniors Said To Face Confusing Choices For Medicare Drug Plan. ABC World News (11/15, story 8, 2:45, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "It is time, again, for older Americans to sign up for a Medicare drug plan. Most remember the confusion just a few months ago of choosing between dozens of very different plans. Well now, 43 million senior citizens, eligible for the drug benefit have to enroll for 2007. And there is no prospect that it's going to be any easier." ABC (Stark) added, "Those who've studied next year's options warn that seniors need to look closely at the fine print." Ron Pollack, Families USA: "The premium is likely to be different. What drugs are covered are different. Other out-of-pocket costs will be different. What drugstore you can go to may be different." Stark: "More than three-quarters of the plans will increase premiums next year, some more than 25%. Premiums for the most widely used plan, sponsored by AARP, jump 6%. Those for the second-most popular, from Humana, go up 60%. Melvin London is angry his monthly premium for his Humana plan will nearly triple next year." Humana "insists, even with the increase, it still has among the lowest premiums. Seniors have until the end of the year to sign up or switch plans. But the government is urging them not to wait until the last minute. Saying it's better to sign up early, making sure there is no interruption in coverage." Leslie Norwalk, Center for Medicare & Medicaid Services: "They should make that choice, and hopefully early. We say December 8th. Don't be late." Stark: "That leaves just three weeks for seniors to make a decision that will impact them for the next 12 months."

Lott Elected Senate Minority Whip. In what ABC World News (11/15, story 9, 0:25, Gibson, 8.78M) called a "remarkable comeback," Sen. Trent Lott yesterday was elected Senate Minority Whip. The Hill (11/16, Schor) reports Lott bested Sen. Lamar Alexander "by 25 votes to 24." The Wall Street Journal (11/16, A6, Rogers, 2.04M) reports that for President Bush, "the Mississippian's return could be a mixed blessing. Mr. Lott blamed the White House for contributing to his ouster, but he brings a set of legislative skills that the administration sorely needs to move its agenda in the new Democratic-controlled Congress." USA Today (11/16, Nichols, Kiely, 2.27M) describes Lott as "a blunt White House critic," and notes President Bush called him "from Air Force One to offer congratulations after Lott won the GOP's minority whip job over Sen. Lamar Alexander of Tennessee, who had predicted victory Tuesday night. 'We have a lot of important priorities to work on and as the president told Sen. Lott, he very much looks forward to working with him,' White House spokesman Scott Stanzel said." Lott "stepped down as Senate majority leader in 2002 after he suggested the nation would have been better off if then-senator Strom Thurmond of South Carolina had been elected president in 1948. Thurmond had run as a segregationist 'Dixiecrat.' Since then, Lott has not shied from criticizing the White House."

The AP (11/16, Kellman) reports Vice President Dick Cheney also called Lott to congratulate him, and "a few hours later, Cheney again delivered an atta-boy in person during a GOP policy lunch. So did White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolton." The AP adds, "Lott's redemption had begun -- just four years after the same White House helped engineer his ouster as the party's Senate leader. It must have been sweet." Lott "did little to hide his resentment during his exile from the party's top Senate ranks." Now he is "powerful enough to get the White House's attention once again."

The Los Angeles Times (11/16, Neuman, 850K) reports "the vote within the Republican caucus could also reflect unhappiness with President Bush for engineering the switch to Frist, who was not considered a strong leader."

The CBS Evening News (11/15, story 7, 0:20, Couric, 7.66M) also noted Lott's "big comeback," while NBC Nightly News (11/15, story 6, Williams, 9.87M) referred to the senator's "stunning victory," and went on to show a clip of the comments that got Lott in trouble in 2002: "When Strom Thurman ran for President, we voted for him. We are proud of him. If the rest of the country followed our lead we would not have had all of these problems."

Outgoing Maryland Lt. Gov Michael Steele was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (11/15, Blitzer) about Lott's controversial comments on Thurmond. Steele said, "I think he asked for forgiveness and received it from the party and from the country. And I think he's going to make a good leader in the Senate. … You can't hold stuff like that against him. It was a birthday event, you know? The guy's sitting there in the chair. What are you going to say? You say nice things. You get caught up in the moment. Folks know where his heart is, and I think he's going to be a good leader in the Senate."

DOJ_NMG_0094894

Roll Call (11/16, Billings, Pierce) says Lott proved himself "once again to be the master vote-counter the job requires." Roll Call adds, "In signature Lott style, the veteran Senator was able to win by corralling a solid base of support, picking off a number of Alexander's backers and working his candidacy right up to the Wednesday-morning vote. Lott was seen walking into the Old Senate chambers talking with Sen. Lisa Murkowski (Alaska), whom several GOP Senate aides characterized as one of the few remaining undecided lawmakers." CQ (11/16) notes Alexander "announced a week ago that he had lined up more than 25 votes -- a majority of his caucus. But secret ballot elections for leadership posts are notorious for wrecking all advance nose counts."

The New York Times (11/16, Leibovich, 1.16M) reports, "In their rehabilitation campaign, Senate Republicans will rely heavily on a man whose recent history is itself a testament to sudden falls, unlikely recoveries and the fickle hands of fortune in American politics. … Usually, the choice of a whip, a vital but unglamorous job, would draw little attention. But the election of Mr. Lott offers an unlikely study in professional redemption. 'One thing that this proves is that the United States Senate, like the American public, likes a comeback story,' said" Sen. Alexander. Sen. John McCain, Republican of Arizona, "who was said to be an important supporter of Mr. Lott, added, 'He paid a pretty high price for the statement he made.'"

The Washington Post (11/16, A4, Babington, 690K) says "Lott's feat ranks among the more impressive political comebacks of recent times, just as his fall from grace in December 2002 was spectacular and painful." The Post adds, "As GOP senators emerged from their closed-door meeting at the Capitol yesterday, several said the shock of last week's results prompted wavering colleagues to vote for Lott, who has spent 34 years in Congress (to Alexander's four), and much time negotiating deals and crafting compromises."

McClatchy (11/16, Talev) reports that "as expected, Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky was chosen unanimously for the top job of Senate minority leader, beginning in January." The Senate GOP leadership team "represents a return to pragmatism. They're seasoned GOP parliamentarians who are expected to cross party lines and buck the White House more often than did" Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, "who concentrated more on pleasing the president and the Republican Party base that's key to his presidential hopes for 2008." McConnell and Lott "are Senate traditionalists, and while both are conservative partisans, they also know how to cut deals to get things done."

The New York Times (11/16, 1.16M), in an editorial focusing on the Democratic house leadership dispute, says "the Republicans' defeat at the polls has sparked decidedly Transylvanian initiatives: Mr. Lott, who tripped from power over racially charged remarks he made in a fit of Dixiecrat nostalgia, has returned to new life as No. 2 in the minority leadership."

Alexander Says Loss Will Enable Him To Be More Independent. The Nashville City Paper (11/16, Allen), under the headline "Alexander Spins Leadership Loss As Good For Constituents," reports that Alexander "had said as late as Tuesday night that he had 27 of the 49 Republican votes. … Saying that last minute 'changes or switches are not unusual,' Alexander explained that he was likely beaten by a delayed backlash against those," including Frist, "who helped orchestrate Lott's ouster as Majority Leader four years ago. 'One of the senators said to me at lunch that this was about redemption. Some senators felt as though [Lott] was treated unfairly four years ago and wanted to give him a second chance,'" said Alexander. Alexander said that he "believes his loss will free him up to vote his conscience on issues, rather than fight for party votes. 'I'm a pretty independent fellow, anyway,'" Alexander said, adding, "And having my independence increased on the issues I care about the most appeals to me a lot."

Senate Republicans Assess Election Outcome, Future Strategy. The Hill (11/16, Bolton) reports, "Newly elected Senate Republican Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) convened his new leadership team for the first time late yesterday afternoon to take stock of its party's recent setback at the polls and to plot the future." The new GOP leaders "discussed next month's leadership retreat and the importance of keeping open the channels of communication among themselves, but they did not discuss in depth how to handle the few remaining weeks of the Republican majority. Leaving Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) in charge of next month's agenda has created somewhat of a leadership vacuum in a growing split within the Senate GOP conference over spending priorities." Incoming GOP whip Sen. Trent Lott said, "We might have an opinion, but others are in charge right now." The Hill adds that earlier in the afternoon, "the entire Republican conference met to assess last week's election and discuss what they hoped to accomplish before turning power over to the Democrats.

Behind closed doors, frustrated Republicans voiced concern that they lost six seats because they have drifted away from their core principles, said participants." Republican senators "are distressed that the GOP is no longer regarded as the party of fiscal discipline, an anxiety that is fueling a debate over how to handle the pending appropriations bills."

House GOP Whip Candidates Outline Strategies To Retake Majority. The Hill (11/16, O'Connor) reports House Republicans have "already begun mapping their attack strategy for the next two years." GOP leadership candidates have "highlighted their plans to hammer the incoming Democratic majority for ethical lapses, fiscal irresponsibility and legislative mismanagement, borrowing from a playbook those same Democrats used with great success to unseat the Republican majority." Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.), "who is locked in a tight race with Rep. John Shadegg (R-Ariz.) to retain his post in the next Congress, released a detailed roadmap yesterday to unify Republicans on tough votes, offer viable alternatives to Democratic bills on the floor and target potentially vulnerable Democrats on every tough vote." Blunt is "trying to make his procedural knowledge a big advantage over Shadegg heading into a potentially tight election with the Arizona conservative." In the strategy memo, "entitled '24 Months to a New Republican Majority — A Plan for Victory,' Blunt outlined 60 Democratic seats carried by President Bush in 2004 where Republican leaders will apply pressure either to flip Democrats on the floor or punish them in campaign materials for voting with party leaders." Blunt "outlines amendments he would offer to projected votes implementing pay-go rules in the budget process, raising the minimum wage and allowing the federal government to negotiate drug prices with pharmaceutical companies, each of which is expected to be part of package offered by Democrats in the first 100 hours of their majority." Shadegg also "offered members his own broad vision statement yesterday in which he promises to work with the next chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee to hold freshman Democrats accountable for the campaign promises they made during the last cycle."

On CNN's The Situation Room (11/15, Blitzer), Shadegg discussed his bid, saying, "We got shellacked in this election. The American people, I think, are trying to send us a message. If we re-elect the exact same two top leaders that we had going into the election, when we come out of the election, I think we will have said to the American people: 'We don't really care about the fact that you want change.' And I think we will have said to them: 'Yes, we've become Washington-focused and we want to stay Washington focused.' I don't think we can stay Washington-focused if we want the majority back."

Boehner Says GOP Needs To "Get Back To Basics." In a Roll Call op-ed (11/16), Rep. John Boehner, who is expected to become House Minority Leader, says, "Instead of settling for our minority status back in 1993-94 and adopting the mindset of a permanent minority, we set out to change things in a big way. In 1994 we developed the vision that led to the 'Contract with America,' which proudly said that House Republicans were ready as a team to take on the Washington, D.C., status quo. One of the secrets of the contract's success was that we recognized the things that unite Republicans across the spectrum are tax cuts, spending taxpayers' dollars wisely, ethics and accountability, and reforming government programs to demand results. We also recognized these ideas and policies have the added benefit of bringing in more and more Americans to support the conservative cause." If we "want our majority back in 2008, House Republicans need to get back to these basics and rededicate ourselves to the reform mindset that put us in the majority. We need to rebuild the Republican coalition by focusing on conservative ideas that can win broad-based support not just among House Members, but among the American people."

Democratic Blue Dogs Hope To Enhance Influence In House. The AP (11/16, Abrams) reports that for "a dozen years, the Democratic conservatives known as Blue Dogs have been baying at the moon, ignored by Republicans and tolerated by their more liberal Democratic colleagues. Now, these House lawmakers say that is about to change." Rep. Mike Ross of Arkansas said Republicans "'did not lose their seats to liberal Democrats' in last weeks elections." He added, "Republicans lost their seats to Blue Dog Democrats." The AP adds that with "the addition of nine newly elected freshmen, the Blue Dogs claim 44 members, nearly 20 percent of the incoming Democratic majority. They will be led by Rep. Allen Boyd, D-Fla., and include Rep. Collin Peterson, D-Minn., in line to become the next Agriculture Committee chairman." Already, "leaders from both parties are courting their votes." Incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi "has promised to make 'paygo,' a Blue Dog-backed principle that any new spending be paid for with cuts in other programs or new revenues, one of her first legislative goals." Rep. Mike Pence, R-Ind., "who is running for the position of Republican leader in the next Congress, listed cooperation with the Blue Dogs as part of his platform."

Moderate Democrats, Republicans May Coordinate Efforts. Roll Call (11/16, Yachnin, Davis) reports that in an "effort to boost their influence in the sharply divided chamber, members of the moderate Republican and Democratic House factions indicated Wednesday that the two groups may coordinate efforts in the 110th Congress and could move to create a formal bipartisan coalition in the new session." Members of "the fiscally conservative Democratic Blue Dog Coalition and the centrist Republican Tuesday Group met in advance of the Nov. 7 elections, Rep. Jim Matheson (D-Utah) said Wednesday, to discuss areas where the groups could align." Matheson, who met with Tuesday Group co-chair Rep. Mark Kirk, said, "We have a lot of common interests." Roll Call adds, "According to Matheson, the moderate coalitions are most likely to work together on pro-growth and fiscal legislation, while Kirk cited issues such as expanding stem-cell research and portions of the 'Suburban Agenda,' an effort spearheaded by Kirk that includes legislation to stop online sexual predators and improve access to health care."

Rothenberg Says Incoming Democrats Are "Conventional," Not Conservative. In his Roll Call column (11/16), Stuart Rothenberg says, "It quickly has become conventional wisdom that last week's Democratic House victory swept in a crop of moderate and conservative Democrats who'll both keep party liberals in check and help remake the image of the party of former Vice President Al Gore, Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) and soon-to-be Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). Well, I met dozens of Democrats running in 2006 — no, not everyone, but most of them — and I can't find much more than a couple who merit the label 'conservative.' That's not meant to be either criticism or praise. It's merely a statement of fact." Though there 'were obvious exceptions, most of the House takeovers occurred in swing and Democratic-leaning districts, and those districts elected pretty conventional Democrats."

Gingrich Says Bush Should Build Coalition With Conservative Democrats. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (11/16), former Speaker Newt Gingrich says, "An establishment bipartisanship between the White House and liberal congressional leaders will almost certainly make it necessary to focus narrowly on how to minimize difficulties in Iraq and postpone consideration of the larger threats to America for the remainder of this and into the next presidency. By contrast, a conservative bipartisanship that knits together the House Republicans and the Blue Dog Democrats into a floor majority, working with a White House that emphasizes popular issues at the grassroots, would make it much easier to focus on the larger threats to American safety. (Such a bipartisanship could stress making the cap gains tax cut permanent; controlling set-asides and discretionary spending; oversight on failing bureaucracies and waste; English as the language of government; and biofuels as part of an energy policy.)" Gingrich adds, "Ironically, the very nature of the Democratic victory makes it possible to re-establish the conservative Democrat and House Republican coalition which made the Reagan legislative victories of 1981-82 possible." If President Bush "decides to govern as President Reagan did, he will work to unify the Blue Dog Democrats with the Republicans to win a handful of very large victories while accepting a constant barrage of unhappiness from the liberal leadership."

Murtha Tells Blue Dogs That Ethics Bill Is "Total Crap."

Roll Call (11/16, Bresnahan) reports Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) "told a group of Democratic moderates on Tuesday that an ethics and lobbying reform bill being pushed by party leaders was 'total crap,' but said that he would work to enact the legislation because Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) supports it." Murtha and current Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) "are locked in a battle for the House Majority Leader post, and both men made presentations to the Blue Dog Coalition on Tuesday in a bid for their votes." Three sources "who were at the meeting" said Murtha said, "Even though I think it's total crap, I'll vote for it and pass it because that's what Nancy wants." Roll Call adds Pelosi has "made enactment of the Honest Leadership and Open Government Act the cornerstone of her legislative agenda for the 110th Congress, and she is preparing to make it the first bill introduced under her reign. Murtha voted against the legislation earlier this year on the House floor." A Democratic lawmaker "said he was 'surprised' by the tone of Murtha's comments, especially Murtha's repeated claim that he would back any proposal that Pelosi favored."

Murtha, appearing on MSNBC's Hardball (11/15, Matthews), said, "There's a lot of crap going on in Congress all the time. Guys violate the law, some do. But the problem we have is a few people violate the law and then the whole

Congress has to be changed? … The idea we have to deal with an issue like this -- and it is total crap -- that we have to deal with an issue like this when we've got a war going on and we've got all these other issues."

The New York Times (11/16, Hulse, 1.16M) reports, "In an interview on the MSNBC show 'Hardball' Wednesday afternoon, Mr. Murtha said that at the time of Abscam he was interested in attracting foreign investment to relieve high unemployment in his Pennsylvania district and, though suspicious of the offer, wanted to keep open the possibility of legitimate investment. As for the ethics package promoted by Ms. Pelosi, Mr. Murtha said he was complaining that Congressional wrongdoing was superceding other matters 'when we've got a war going on and we got all these other issues — $8 billion a month we're spending.'"

Majority Leader Race Quickly Divides Democrats. The Washington Times (11/16, Hurt, 88K) reports House Democrats "will decide today whether to install as their majority leader one of the most scandal-tainted members of Congress." The vote on Murtha, "whom likely Speaker Nancy Pelosi enthusiastically supports -- comes 10 days after Democrats seized control of the House and Senate after promising to clean up the corruption that they said had become a hallmark of the Republican Congress." Most "of the attention on Capitol Hill yesterday fell on Mr. Murtha's run for House leadership, which many Democrats worry will sully their stunning victories last week and ruin any hopes of a reputation for ethical reform. Mr. Murtha didn't help his case when reports surfaced yesterday that he dismissed the party's plans for ethics reform during a gathering of newly elected Democrats."

The Hill (11/16, Hearn) reports the race "has reinforced longstanding divisions between different factions in the caucus, members and observers said, and has diverted their attention from a positive message they hoped to project just days after winning control of the House." Many Democrats were "dismayed at the ever more heated and at times ugly battle between two of their most senior members, much of it playing out on national television. Some Hoyer backers questioned Pelosi's political judgment, arguing that the effort to 'purge' Hoyer from the leadership would damage caucus unity."

CQ (11/16, Ferrechio) reports, "Little more than a week after they won control of the House, Democrats appeared deeply divided Wednesday on their first major decision — whether to give the majority leader's job to heir apparent Hoyer of Maryland, the current Democratic whip, or to honor Pelosi's preference for Pennsylvania's Murtha." Many Democrats "were hesitant to assess the impact of the contest, which has divided their caucus into two camps, or to analyze Pelosi's effort to oust Hoyer from the leadership team." But some "said they are worried about long-term damage to the fragile unity of the Democratic caucus." One senior Democrat said, "If Murtha wins, the resentment members are going to feel over the arm-twisting will be devastating. If Hoyer wins, people will never forget she tried to kick him out."

The New York Times (11/16, Hulse, 1.16M) reports House members "acknowledged on Wednesday that the increasingly bitter contest for majority leader was sullying the image of unity and new direction that Democrats hoped to convey." The "downtrodden Republicans were enjoying the spectacle of the split between" Pelosi, "who is publicly pushing" Murtha, "her longtime ally, and Democrats rallying behind Mr. Hoyer." Rep. Ray LaHood said, "I can't believe they are self-destructing before they even get started. Everyone on our side is giddy." The Times adds the race has "left Democrats and Republicans in both the House and Senate straining to understand Ms. Pelosi's strategy. They wonder why, in her moment of victory, she injected herself into a leadership fight that will end with the selection of her rival or her own choice, a lawmaker criticized for his ethics record, after an election in which Democrats campaigned on a clean-government theme." Murtha "himself has thrown more fuel on that fire. Members of the conservative Democratic Blue Dog group said that during an appearance before them Tuesday, Mr. Murtha disparaged an ethics overhaul that Ms. Pelosi and the leadership have been promising as one of their first orders of business."

The Los Angeles Times (11/16, Hamburger, Neubauer, 850K) reports, "Though incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi promises to push through ethical reforms in Congress, both of the Democrats vying to be her second-in-command have long histories of earmarking, close relationships with corporate interests, and using their positions to raise millions of dollars in campaign contributions." Murtha "used his seat on the appropriations committee and the largely secret earmark process to obtain $121 million in earmarks during the current session, making him one of the top earmarkers in Congress, according to the watchdog group Taxpayers for Common Sense." Hoyer, "also on appropriations, sent $61.7 million to his district just outside of Washington during this Congress, the watchdog group says. That put him among the top 10% of earmarkers in the House."

The AP (11/16, Taylor) reports Pelosi "faces a major leadership test Thursday, barely a week into her new role, as Democrats vote on her choice for majority leader. She's supporting a lawmaker once caught up in a bribery scandal and known more recently for trading votes for pork projects." With her "prestige is on the line," Hoyer "appeared to carry a lead into Thursday's secret ballot despite Pelosi's opposition." But "allies such as Rep. George Miller, D-Calif. — also a top confidant of Pelosi — have been working this week to peel away votes from Hoyer. Pelosi also has intervened more directly, making the case for Murtha in one-on-one meetings with Democratic freshmen — sessions in which the incoming lawmakers ask for all-important committee assignments."

The Washington Post (11/16, A1, Wiesman, Romano, 690K) reports the "showdown over the House majority leader's post" has "Democrats bitterly divided only a week after their party took control of Congress and has prompted numerous complaints that" Pelosi "and her allies are using strong-arm tactics and threats to try to elect Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.) to the job." Pelosi's "aggressive intervention on behalf of Murtha has baffled and angered many Democrats, who think she has unnecessarily put her reputation on the line out of misplaced loyalty to a friend and because of a long-standing feud with Hoyer, the minority whip. Pelosi has pushed Murtha's candidacy at social events, in private meetings and with incoming freshman Democrats; they have been called to her office to discuss committee assignments, only to hear first that she needs Murtha in order to be an effective leader." Hoyer "was heavily favored to win the race until Sunday, when Pelosi -- in a move that shocked even her staff -- openly threw her support to Murtha, despite a vow to stay neutral."

The Christian Science Monitor (11/16, Chaddock, 59K) reports Rutgers University political analyst Ross Baker said, "The fight between Murtha and Hoyer is a template for Democrats on the war and corruption. Until this election, Murtha had an iconic status as an outspoken, truth-telling Democrat, and all of a sudden ethics has become a liability. It's an awkward position for Pelosi, whatever the outcome." The Monitor adds, "Most immediately, Murtha's opposition to ethics reform, including past brushes with ethics issues, open Pelosi to charges that she hasn't heard voters on the importance of cleaning up the culture of corruption in Washington."

Asked on Fox News' The Big Story (11/15, Gibson) if Murtha is "actually going to win this thing," ex-Rep. John Kasich replied, "No, no, no. Hoyer's going to win this thing. He has the support of the bulk of the Democratic Party." Pelosi "doesn't like Steny is what I'm told. So she got Murtha as a stalking horse. And then I think she sort of got pinned down and was forced to endorse him, although I'm told she's making no calls. I think Steny will win this comfortably."

On MSNBC's Tucker (11/15), host Tucker Carlson said, "It sounds like when the incoming speaker of the House tells you to do it, you don't necessarily do it, since Steny Hoyer is ahead."

Novak Says Damage To Pelosi Is "Irrevocable." In his column in the Washington Post (11/16, A27, 690K), Robert Novak says "the damage" to Pelosi "was irrevocable when she wrote her colleagues Sunday urging them to pick Murtha over Rep. Steny Hoyer. Close associates of Hoyer say her letter stunned him, and he was not alone. While Pelosi had made it clear that she would vote for Murtha, the public endorsement was unexpected." This is "a no-win situation for Pelosi. If Murtha wins today, she will be accused of personal vindictiveness in derailing Hoyer, who is more popular in the caucus and better qualified for leadership. If Murtha loses, as is much more probable, she will be seen as bumbling her first attempt to lead the new Democratic majority. Pelosi could have avoided this dilemma by standing aside as Newt Gingrich, then the presumptive speaker, did when he voted for his ally Robert Walker as majority whip but did not ask members to oppose Tom DeLay." Pelosi's "mistake confirms long-standing, privately held Democratic apprehension about her abilities." Her "colleagues worry that her decision making may be distorted by personal considerations."

Other Commentary. The Los Angeles Times (11/16, 850K) says in an editorial Rep. Murtha is "an old hand in the sort of politics that voters supposedly rebelled against last week." Murtha's "history would seem to belie Pelosi's call for 'the most honest, the most open and the most ethical Congress in history.' But like the Republicans in the Senate, the new speaker seems willing to go only so far in satisfying the voters' appetite for change. If that disappointing pattern persists, Americans who thought they voted for change might echo the title of the Who classic we quoted above: "Won't Get Fooled Again."

The New York Times (11/16, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "So far, the Democrats seem not to have paid much attention to the tattered baggage lugged into the limelight by Representative John Murtha of Pennsylvania, the Iraq war critic who is Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi's choice for second in command." And while Pelosi is "vowing to hammer home ethics reform as her first order of business, the Capitol newspaper Roll Call reported that Mr. Murtha was vulgarly belittling her program in private meetings with lawmakers."

WSJournal Says Earmark Reform Another Test For Pelosi. The Wall Street Journal (11/16, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "We'll find out when Democrats vote today if Speaker-in-waiting Nancy Pelosi was able to push aside her long-serving deputy in favor of her antiwar friend, John Murtha, as House Democratic majority leader. But an even bigger sign of how Democrats plan to govern is whether they implement the 'earmark' reform they campaigned on this fall." Murtha is "a champion of earmarked spending projects and his brother was a renowned earmark lobbyist. If he wins, Democrats will be rewarding his antiwar stance over the need for a cleaner Congress. All eyes should then turn to whether Ms. Pelosi follows through on her promise to clean up earmarks. So far, she's said the right things about greater transparency that would require every Member to disclose his support for every earmark, which have become such opportunities for corruption. Last weekend she was quoted as saying, refreshingly, that 'I'd just as soon do away with all' earmarks." But some Republicans "are already questioning Ms. Pelosi's sincerity."

Five Congressional Black Caucus Members To Head Key House Committees. The Washington Post (11/16, 690K) reports five members of the Congressional Black Caucus "are poised to take the helm of key House committees when Democrats assume control of Congress next year: John Conyers Jr. (Mich.) of Judiciary, Alcee L. Hastings (Fla.) of intelligence, Juanita Millender-McDonald (Calif.) of House Administration, Reps. Charles B. Rangel (N.Y.) of Ways and Means, and Bennie Thompson (Miss.) of Homeland Security." Another member, Rep. James E. Clyburn (S.C.), is "slated to be named majority whip, which would make him the third-ranking Democrat in the House. Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), the presumed speaker of the 110th Congress, has campaigned on his behalf." University of Maryland political analyst Ronald Walters said, "If they accede to that much power, it would truly be the realization of the kind of dream we've been waiting for since the civil rights movement." Walters added that "is a big 'if.' The appointment of Millender-McDonald is less certain than those of some of the others, and Hastings faces a steep uphill climb in his bid for the intelligence post because of past ethics problems." Further, CBC members, "who tend to be more liberal, might find it hard to push their traditional social agenda. Conservative and moderate 'Blue Dog' Democrats, whose numbers are nearly equal to those of Black Caucus members, have vowed to counter agendas that they deem too liberal."

The Washington Times (11/16, DeBose, 88K) reports the CBC "expects at least five committee chairmanships and as many as 17 subcommittee chairmanships to be led by its members in the 110th Congress after a vote by the Democratic Caucus concludes shortly after noon today. But some said the numbers might not exactly reflect seniority alone on the subcommittee seats."

Norton Hopeful For Passage Of DC House Vote Bill. On MSNBC's Hardball (11/15, Matthews), Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton was asked about the prospects for a District of Columbia House vote bill this year. Norton said, "That would be a nice bipartisan to do in the lame-duck session but, look, we have only a week in December to get it through the House and the Senate. So I'm calling on my Senate colleagues to join us. After all, we've got Republicans and Democrats -- got it out of one committee. Almost equal number of Republicans and Democrats -- let's get it out of the House and the Senate in December."

Senate Democrats Planning Agenda For 110th Congress. Roll Call (11/16, Pierce) reports the Senate Democratic leadership team "plans a long, laborious slog for the Senate next year even as party leaders continue to formalize their legislative agenda for the 110th Congress — an agenda that already includes a couple of surprises." At a breakfast with reporters Tuesday, "incoming Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) warned that the 'do-nothing' Congress, as his party has labeled recent Republican rule in the chamber, will soon be over." Reid promised "to 'work long hours,'" saying, "We're going to work more than just Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday until noon." Roll Call adds Reid "outlined some of his top legislative priorities for next year, which include an effort to 'do everything we can to make elections more civil.' Principally, Reid said that would mean passing a bill to create criminal penalties for election fraud, including offenses such as voter misinformation campaigns carried out by robo-calls and misleading flyers." Reid also "indicated that he wants to rein in independent campaign expenditure groups, known as 527s, even though many of them have helped Democrats even out the edge in hard-dollar fundraising that Republicans have typically enjoyed." As they "assess the rest of their agenda — much of which they already have talked about in broad terms — Democratic Senators and aides said choices still have to be made about what specific legislation should be included under the rubric of their election-year themes of energy independence, modifying the Medicare prescription drug benefit, making college more affordable, raising the minimum wage, passing terrorism prevention measures and protecting employee pensions."

Sen. Patty Murray, appearing on MSNBC (11/15, O'Donnell), said, "There are obviously a number of challenges. Iraq is the elephant in the room. … There are a number of domestic items, too. We're being handed a budget that is very difficult to deal with, and there's tremendous domestic needs on the Medicare Prescription Drug Plan, on families' access to health insurance, on making sure that our students get access to college in an affordable way. Families are feeling the stress of pensions and just everyday, average concerns of Americans. And we'll be putting that agenda together and begin to move this country back on track so we address those concerns."

Narrow Majority To Put Reid To The Test. In his Washington Post column (11/16, A27), David Broder says the need for 60 votes in the Senate to move legislation "puts an enormous strain on Harry Reid, the Nevadan who has struggled these past two years to master the less arduous duties of Senate minority leader. The risk for Democrats is that Reid may not be up to the challenge. We saw how weakness in the majority leader could hurt a party in the recent example of Sen. Bill Frist. More than once Frist was unable to hold his own troops together on big issues or to thwart Reid and the Democrats when they built roadblocks to administration bills. Now the situation is reversed, and it is Reid who will be tested." The Senate is "chockablock with presidential wannabes," and Reid will also "have to contend with a few real mavericks and independent spirits in his caucus." As minority leader, Reid was "remarkably effective in keeping the Democratic caucus united but far less successful as a public spokesman for his party. His partisan comments were often too sharp, his television appearances less than commanding. In his new role, he will be far more exposed, and his flaws more conspicuous."

Samuelson Says Democrats Have Few Big Opportunities. In his Washington Post column (11/16, A27), Robert J. Samuelson says, "Even forgetting possible vetoes by President Bush, the Democrats have less leeway to alter policy than their rhetoric implies. Although Democrats didn't promise much -- they benefited heavily from unhappiness with the war in Iraq -- they still succumbed to exaggeration. Their sound bites ran ahead of plausible solutions." On "domestic policy, Democrats have few big opportunities. This creates a dilemma. They can either concentrate on symbolic acts (the minimum wage, the drug benefit) that sharpen their differences with Republicans. Or they can find less controversial matters, where cooperation seems possible, to advertise their fitness to govern and their credentials as centrists. It will be difficult to do both. There's only one solace -- the Republicans face the same dilemma."

Pension Agency Posts Smaller Deficit Than Last Year. The Washington Post/AP (11/16, D3, Aversa) reports, "The federal agency that insures private pension plans for millions of Americans logged a deficit of $18.1 billion this year, a big improvement from last year thanks to a new pension law." The ""narrower deficit for the 2006 fiscal year reported by the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp." yesterday "was down from a shortfall of $22.8 billion recorded in 2005 and a record $23.3 billion posted in 2004."

USDA Admits Making Over $2.8 Billion In Improper Payments. The AP (11/16, Quaid) reports, "The Agriculture Department on Wednesday acknowledged making improper payments to farmers worth more than $2.8 billion last year. Officials explained that most of the payments involved missing or incomplete paperwork." Chuck Christopherson, the department's chief financial officer, said, "We take this very seriously. … We know this is something that we can address and that we can fix." The AP adds, "The amount of improper payments in fiscal 2006 was about 11 percent of farm program payments, the department said. The fiscal year ended on Sept. 30."

Rodman Leaving Pentagon For Brookings. The AP (11/15) reports Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs Peter Rodman "is leaving his post, in the first announced Pentagon departure" since

Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's resignation. He "will join the Brookings Institution as a senior fellow."

Defense Department Travel Reservation System A "Fiasco." The AP (11/15, Margasak) reports the Defense Department's computerized travel reservation system "has turned into a half-billion-dollar fiasco, so flawed that only 17 percent of the travelers are using it as intended," according to the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations. The system "was designed as the Pentagon's version of an Internet travel site," but the probe found that 83% of DOD travelers "have been contacting professional travel agents first -- and then using the new system to book the travel afterward."

WSJournal Says Federal Relief For Auto Execs Won't Help. The Wall Street Journal (11/16, A18, 2.04M) editorializes, "Auto executives from the Big Three finally got their sit-down with President Bush this week, where they (surprise!) pleaded for federal relief." The Big Three "still dominate U.S. auto production, but foreign makers continue to gain market share, currently accounting for some 40% of all passenger cars and light trucks sold in the U.S." President Bush "had been resisting their overtures and appears to be standing his ground, agreeing to little more after this week's meeting than a 'continuing dialogue.'" However, with Democrats in control, "there's likely to be increased pressure for some kind of government aid." The President's "inconsistency on bailouts won't help matters," as airlines "have received between $15 billion and $20 billion in cash to help keep them afloat in the wake of 9/11." Detroit auto makers are "angling for a similar deal, but it would only retard the necessary if painful transformation that is currently taking place at the Big Three." Government intervention "in a market this healthy can only increase the chances that it won't stay that way."

Fed Concerned About Inflation, More Confident About Engineering Soft Landing. The Financial Times (11/16, Guha, Mackenzie) reports, "Federal Reserve policymakers are becoming a little more confident about their ability to engineer a soft landing for the US economy, minutes published on Wednesday reveal. The minutes, from the last Fed policy meeting on October 25, show that most Fed policymakers thought the downside risks to growth had "diminished a little" since the previous meeting, while some thought the upside risks to inflation had also declined, though 'only slightly.'" However, "the outlook for both inflation and growth remains very uncertain. … All members of the committee 'expressed concern about the outlook for inflation' and all 'agreed that the risks to achieving the anticipated reduction in inflation remained of the greatest concern.'"

The Wall Street Journal (11/16, lp, 2.04M) reports, "The minutes said FOMC members expect core inflation to decline, as the indirect effects of the retreat in energy prices feed through to other goods and services, and the cost of housing ceases to be a source of upward pressure." They also "said the decline in housing activity is unfolding as expected and that the 'risk of an even larger contraction in this sector had ebbed.' Some, however, fretted that it could yet spill over to other areas of consumer spending." USA Today (11/16, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) runs a similar report titled "Fed Bankers All Show Inflation Concerns," reporting the Fed "in particular noted that a tight labor market could lead to a 'sustained increase in wage pressure,' and thus inflation."

Stocks Hit New Records. The Wall Street Journal (11/16, McKay, 2.04M) reports, "Investors bid stocks to fresh highs, their hopes for a less-than-traumatic economic slowdown buoyed by newly released comments by Federal Reserve policymakers. … The Dow Jones Industrial Average rallied 33.70 points, or 0.3%, to a record 12251.71, up 14.3% on the year. … The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index crossed 1400 for the first time in more than six years but finished shy of that psychologically important number. The index ended 0.2% higher, up 3.35 points at 1396.57, its highest close since Nov. 9, 2000, and up 11.9% on the year. It still would have to rise more than 9% to top its record set in early 2000." The Nasdaq "rose 0.5%, or 12.09 points, to 2442.75, up 10.8% on the year. It was the best close since Feb. 15, 2001, though the index would have to more than double to reach a new record." NBC Nightly News (11/15, story 5, Williams, 9.87M) was the only network newscast that noted the stock numbers.

Miners' Union Aims For Revival As Coal Industry Makes Comeback. The Washington Post (11/16, Russakoff, 690K) reports from Southern Illinois that "global economic forces have realigned, and coal mining is back. And a new generation of miners is living the good life not seen here since coal was king." As the coal "industry withered east of the Mississippi River, so did the United Mine Workers of America -- from 167,000 active members in 1980 to 16,000 today. ... Now the union is trying to come back, too, beginning with an organizing campaign targeting Peabody Energy Corp., ... the world's largest coal company." The union "is struggling to bridge a gap between young workers ..., giddy over high wages in this long-depressed region, and older ones focused on pensions and gold-plated health care in retirement." The Post adds, "Coal's rebound here is a direct result of soaring U.S. demand for electricity, half of which currently comes from coal. The Bush administration is promoting coal as a 'freedom fuel' -- in contrast to foreign oil -- and utilities are on a coal binge, with 154 new coal-fired plants on the drawing board. ... [C]oal states and the industry are investing heavily in technologies to convert coal into liquid fuel to power cars and jet planes."

Urban Schools Behind Nation In Science Scores. The New York Times (11/16, Schemo, 1.16M) reports the National Assessment of Educational Progress shows that "at least half of eighth graders tested in science failed to demonstrate even a basic understanding of the subject in 9 of 10 major cities, and fourth graders, the only other group tested, fared little better." Further, "student performance in urban public schools was not only poor but also far short of science scores in the nation as a whole." Only Austin had a majority of 8th graders meet basic standards and only Austin, Charlotte and San Diego had a majority of 4th graders meet the basic standard.

The AP (11/16) reports, "Minorities in the city schools often performed similarly to students with the same backgrounds in the national sample." Nationwide, "just a little more than a quarter of students in both grades" met proficient standards while "34 percent of fourth-graders" were "unable to perform at even a 'basic' level."

KBR Will Trade As A Separate Stock. USA Today (11/16, Krantz, 2.27M) reports, "Today, KBR, which runs almost every aspect of the Iraq war except the fighting, will trade as a separate stock after an initial public offering. It raised $473.3 million Wednesday, after pricing the 27.8 million shares it's selling at $17 a share." Ben Holmes, publisher of MorningNotes.com, a market and IPO research firm, said that for investors, "KBR is the demon spawn of Halliburton." A Democratic Congress "may further investigate the company." Francis Gaskins of IPOdesktop said, "But KBR "has been broadening its business outside Iraq. Its backlog of business jumped 42% from last year to September, largely on non-Iraq jobs," but the backlog "is the salvation of a company that normally would struggle to win over investors. But it's unclear how profitable it is and whether investors are willing to pay up."

Democrats Have Good Chance To Expand Senate Majority In 2008. The Hill (11/16, Blake) reports Senate Democrats will "have a wider field of possibilities and probably more open seats available to expand their majority in 2008, though Senate Republicans will have several chances to pick off red-state Democrats." Of the "33 seats up for election two years from now, 21 are held by Republicans. Eight of those 21 were elected with 55 percent of the vote or less in 2002, and in seven of them the incumbent is a freshman. The party also faces several retirement questions." Democrats "might not lose any incumbents to retirement now that they are in the majority — a crucial first step to maintaining and growing that majority. Two big Democratic retirement risks, 82-year-old Sen. Frank Lautenberg (N.J.) and 69-year-old Sen. Jay Rockefeller (W.Va.), intend to run again in 2008, according to their offices." Sen. Tom Harkin (D-Iowa), Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), 72, "who has not decided," and Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), 64, "who did not respond to inquiries, may be re-energized by capturing prized committee chairmanships." Jennifer Duffy of the Cook Political Report "expects Democrats to skate into 2008 with all five of these potential retirees." On the Republican side, "Sens. Pat Roberts (Kan.), 70, Pete Domenici (N.M.), 74, and Ted Stevens (Alaska), who turns 83 on Saturday, have all told The Hill they intend to seek reelection. But speculation is rampant about Sens. John Warner (Va.), 79, and Wayne Allard (Colo.), who is at the tail end of a two-term-limit pledge." The "most vulnerable incumbents are Allard, Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) and Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.), according to the Cook Political Report. No races are yet listed as tossups."

Democrats Closed "Parent Gap" In Midterm Elections. The Washington Times (11/16, Wetzstein, 88K) reports Democrats "closed a so-called 'parent gap' in this month's election and should seize the moment by pushing family-friendly legislation, analysts told a Capitol Hill briefing yesterday." Married parents – "especially married mothers -- have voted Republican in recent years, partly because of a perception that Democrats don't care about family issues, said Michele Stockwell, a social policy analyst with the Progressive Policy Institute." The election results "show that Democrats 'closed this parent gap, at least temporarily,' she said. But the gap needs to be closed permanently by addressing families' concerns." The Times adds, "Some family advocates, however, expressed dismay at the lack of attention to family issues in Democratic platforms."
